Now let me get to something. This union is on record for the last five years that we do not believe that our industry is underfunded. We believe that one third of the public purse in any given industry—if it is inadequate, there is something wrong, because after all, the citizen does need roads and bridges and fire and police and all those other fine things. So we are not saying that this industry should be funded in a larger dollar degree. This is nothing new. We have been saying this for months. We do not believe any new money is needed if the current fiscal resources are properly distributed. I am going to tell you right now that I suspect my testimony will be a bit at odds with the Ontario Hospital Association. Quelle surprise, right?

I am going to leave with you with some really heavy questions. If I could have found the answers, I would have given you the answers as well, but I believe that the answers are only able to be accessed by government. You folks were elected to do for better, for worse, a lot like when you get married, only usually marriages—well, not lately. I was going to say they last longer than a government term.

[Laughter]

Ms Cole Slattry: What are you laughing about?

It is the distribution of the wealth, and there is wealth other than financial wealth. Human resources are far scarcer for any country in the world than money. You can steal money; you cannot steal human resources.

The province of Ontario has been on record since 1953—in case there is a Progressive Conservative member in the room who would like to be reminded, it was a government that said it believed in equal wages for women. Now we are pushing 40 years later and all three of you have had a shot at this. Somebody better get it right, I am going to start a feminist party and take the place of the one that did in Iceland.

Back to the 50%: My workers got a 50% wage increase in 1974 when they threatened a province-wide strike and since then they have got diddly. In fact, twice they were under an AIB and once they had their wages rolled back. For the NDP people here who represent workers, if you consider a 10% a year increase a wonderful increase, then that is what they got from the Simco award. They have had it, bottom line.

In the last three years, during boom times for this province, their wage was 4.4% per year for three years. What we are looking for in this contract round is 3% of the total health care budget. It would be a 30% raise over two years. Don't want to give it? No problem. They are going. They know they are essential services. They know they cannot strike. They are going, which is worse than if they struck. At least if they strike, they are standing around looking at you.

Beds are down. Staffing is down. First question: if admissions are not down, then the question is, has the quality disappeared? I suspect that it has. You should be aware that they are using second-year nursing students now and calling them staff in some hospitals in this province.

Now I am going to get down to the numbers and I suspect this is the reason why—this is page 10, January 1991 from the publication Hospital News. It is editorial notes. I will give you this because I thought if they knew I was going to use this here they might not have put it there. "Here are some hospital facts and figures to dazzle friends with." Stay tuned. I am about to dazzle you.

The 1990 budget for health care, according to Ted Bledsoe in a speech in October to the OHA seminar, was $15.5 billion. We had a hard time at our house wrapping our head around a billion dollars until somebody finally figured out a billion dollars is a thousand million, which made it a little bit more manageable in my mind. I am going to round this sucker off to $15 billion. Forget the $700 million that 0.7 means—just $15 billion.

According to the OHA, and I have taken it from this tiny little piece of paper here, the amount of the health care budget that they get is 44%, and 44% of $15 billion comes down to $6.6 billion. We need to keep these in mind. They say that the amount that goes to doctors is 32%, which is $4.8 billion. They say that other health services, and I suspect that is community health and what have you, is 20%, which is $3 billion, and senior prescription drugs is 4%, which is $0.6 billion.

Let's go back to their 44%, their $6.6 billion. That is a lot of money and that is not their total budget. I am going to tell you their total budget. They also say in the article that there are 110,000 total RNs in the province, which I suspect, a true figure, because it is our figure from the llage of nurses, but 25,000 of them do not work so just atch that right down really quickly to 85,000. I suspect at 10,000 of those people are nursing administrators or ch positions and 10,000 of them are educators, which ives 65,000 workers, of which 55,000 are in our union.

is 90% organized, is what I am leading to.

The total number of doctors—this is another important ure—is 18,000. The OHA says that the total number of ll-time employees is 130,000 and the total number of rt-time employees is 60,000, giving a total number of ople working in hospitals of 190,000. I have a question ark there and I will tell you why. Our statistics on our embership are very, very accurate because we bring in a avy due and we give back to the member at the local vel the local cost for education and travel. We keep salas and the whole bit. So we need to keep very accurate atistics on where our members are, whether they are full-ne or part-time or what have you, for local dues alloca-ons. We know that we have 55,000 and we know that we ive 24,294 full-time equivalents in the hospital sector.
e also have 24,622 part-time in the hospital sector.

For purposes of discussion, we chose to look at the rt-timers as each of them working two and a half days, aking up one full-time equivalent, so that leaves a total 36,605 FTE registered nurse category employees in the ospital. We have been told that for every nurse there is another worker in whatever other category, so if our statiscs are right and I know they are, then it is approximately 2,000 workers in all categories in the hospitals. My queson is, where did they get 190,000? I bet you 50 cents that e rest of it is their administrative staff. That is a joke.
ou are supposed to laugh.

Mr Christopherson: It is not funny. It happens too
ften.

Ms Cole Slattery: I know. Here are some statistics om your own government, a new study out. The average ge of a registered nurse in Ontario is 40. Nursing school rolments have declined, we hear, about 25%. It is imper-ive for this government, for the loyal opposition and for e third party to understand that for the entire industry to urvive the RNs who are in the system must not leave it. hey must not leave it or you have some problem. I do ot. I have lots of friends to take care of me if I get old, but ou guys will get old just like I do and you do not have at many friends to take care of you.

ONA's statistics show that decline in membership be-ins at step 5. We have a nine-step grid. Really, it is 10, ecause the start is the first step. It ends up at the ninth ep. Step 5 is where it goes down. I am going to pass this round when I am done. I did not give it to you now ecause you would look at it instead of listening to me. his is the 1990 grid. It gives the existing wage. It shows ou the existing span between years and it gives you the percentage of our membership at every level. You are not going to like it when you see those percentages. Steps 5 nd 7 show the smallest number of workers in the nine-ep grid. Step 9 shows almost 40% of our total workforce.
ne would believe that these numbers at step 9 will remain until retirement is reached. I suspect that the people, the women, in step 9 are well over 40.

The future manpower planning is seriously affected by the apparent decline in the RNs willing to enter the profession and stay in the workforce long enough to move though our grid. Over the past four years, many studies show, including ONA's, that women are dissatisfied with wages and conditions, between 5% and 7%, and were making plans to leave in 1988. The span between the steps very clearly shows a built-in lack of incentive.

In 1980, 35 cents per hour was put in shift and weekend premiums. In 1984 this was raised by 10 cents and in 1991 it remains at 45 cents an hour. This is totally unacceptable in a workforce that is summarily assigned by the boss 24 hours a day every day of the year including weekends and holidays. Longevity is totally ignored by the boss, even after 15 years at work, and RNs are still forced to rotate all three shifts, work weekends and holidays at the whim and will of the employer's representatives. That ain't going to go on any longer.

In some areas of the United States an RN gets $5,000 a year for working the second shift and $10,000 a year for working the third shift and that is on top of a healthy base.
Our workforce is assigned forced overtime on a regular basis, regardless of their family responsibilities and their own physical status. This is no longer acceptable to the workers. It is my belief that they will not strike or disrupt the system. They are beyond that. I believe, and I have been in their midst now for five years, that if the grid is not successful, if our wage demands are not met, the workers below step 9 will just quietly go on to other areas.

1020

If I cannot help them take control of their profession and find justice and remuneration within their—and it is their—industry then I will help them attain their life's goals in any way I can. They are bright, committed, energetic and decent. They deserve a job, somewhere in the world, that rewards those qualities. Becoming an RN does not mean you are an indentured servant. These men and women can retool and retrain and enter any workforce they want to. A hospital sells nursing care like a bank sells money or Beckers sells milk. If you take everyone but RNs out of the hospital, including the administration, you still have a hospital. If you leave everybody else in and take the RNs out, you have a very expensive hotel with bad food.

The costs for technology are staggering. What good to the taxpayer-patient are any of these machines if the RNs that interpret the generated data are not there? The machine does not run down the hall and say "Hey doc, this patient over here is going to die if you don't get here." The machine clicks along ad infinitum. It is no good to anybody unless there is a nurse there to interpret it. Why is there almost unlimited funds for machines and no funds for workers in this industry? Lots of funds for administration, lots of funds for technology and machines, no funds for workers.

Historically, politicians have been misled by hospital administrators on the so-called nursing service budget, which was always allowed to be interpreted as RNs' salaries. With all due respect, I would suggest that it would be interesting to see this budget if the so-called hotel charges were carved out and the actual dollar figure of RNs' staff salaries in aggregate was examined. No government in North America has been willing to do that, to the best of my knowledge, and I have been fielding this stuff now for almost 20 years.

Our demands at the bargaining table are generated by our membership through a "Have-A-Say" questionnaire that went out to 55,000 people. They have always done it this way. We structure our bargaining objectives from the members' responses. Membership sits on internal committees at every step of the process, up to and including the hospital central negotiating team which comes to the table with the staff. I am putting this in so you do not think it is just me. They have been doing it this way for 18 years. It is them. It is my belief that the wage demand we have on now—and I might add, nobody has asked me from the hospital side how this could be implemented, the wonderful way it could be implemented. I am well aware that the problem is 1 April 1991. I am well aware that the implementation, from the management and government standpoint, is, in many instances, more important than the amount. Nobody has asked me yet how I would do it.

It is my belief that our grid is the only way to retain seasoned workers currently in the system, and also draw back those seasoned workers who have left the industry. You would bring them back into the taxpaying workforce and you would end the current nursing shortage. Futuristically, it would also eventually attract young women and men into schools of nursing and guarantee a continued labour pool. You cannot add your continued labour pool.

It is 3.3% of the health care budget I am looking for.

Here is your first question. How is it fair—these are the Ontario Hospital Association's numbers—that 18,000 MDs get 32% of the provincial budget, which translates out to $4.8 billion. How is that fair? If I got every wildest dream imaginable, if I got everything I asked for the registered nurses, our wages would be $2 billion. How can anyone expect twice as many RNs to continue to work in the system if half as many MDs get twice the government funding? This means that for every 50 cents an RN gets, a doc gets 2 bucks. How can the doctors continue to work if the RNs leave? They will tell you they cannot, and they are right.

What would happen to care for citizens, even if, as it appears, no concern is given to quality of care and safety of patients? It ain't the machine that watches you, and it ain't the doc. It is us.

I told the OHA last week that if it had treated us fairly over the past 18 years, if it had brought us along in the same way it had guaranteed its own salary progressions, instead of stiff-arming and demeaning and disdaining us, then there would be labour-management harmony today rather than an angry and frustrated workforce that totally distrusts the goodwill of the boss. They have themselves an industry at the brink of collapse.

I am coming down to my last couple of questions, which really are the most interesting questions: The OHA generates 19% of its income itself. It says so in their little paper. If they get $6.6 billion from the government they generate $2 billion, that is $8.6 billion. If I say, and do say, that the wildest dreams of the nurses could be realized for $2 billion—you are already paying them $4 billion—and if the statement I have heard is true, that there is another worker for every nurse, and those workers are not at our wage level, but let's say they are: put another $2 billion, $4 billion for wages, in an industry that has $8.6 billion at its disposal. Where is the beef? Where is the other $4.6 billion? That is a question that only the seasoned majority can find out.

While some of you in this room are businessmen, many of you in this room are trade unionists and you know what it is to look at a wage grid. You know every body's single largest item on his deficit is the wages, as wages should be. Who does the work? The people do the work. Here is an industry with $8.6 billion, and in the wildest possible stretch of anybody's imagination, I will say, only $4 billion for wages; where is the other $4.6 billion?

Thank you for your attention.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for that presentation. I have a few questions, because I can see over the next two months the possibility of a fair bit of conflict. I think all of us want to avoid that.

By the way, I will declare a bit of a conflict: my brother is a nurse.

Ms Cole Slattery: If I had known that when you were the Minister of Labour, I would have made you let me in. You never let me in to talk to you.

Mr Phillips: I was open. There was never anybody who wanted to see me who could not see me, ever, ever.

Ms Cole Slattery: Oh, do not say that. That is totally true. You may not have been aware I wanted to talk to you, but I was not successful in getting in.

Mr Phillips: I saw groups all day long, all the time. The question is this: When the OHA was in, they said my numbers are correct—first, the grants will be announced to hospitals in the next couple of weeks. I will give you a series of questions. I would like your comment on what that grant level should be, because I could see that is going to be a major determinant in your negotiations.

Ms Cole Slattery: Why are you throwing grants away after bad? Why would you give them more money when you cannot find out what the hell they did with the money you gave them last year? As far as the grants are concerned, they want a 13% increase here. They were funded under your government, sir, with—I forget—the percentage of cost of living or whatever it was. It did not roll.

Mr Phillips: It was 9%.

Ms Cole Slattery: And your government brought down pay equity. They were told to lay aside 1% of wages ever. Three years later, we have seen zip. And you know what? I expect we are going to see zip. They have not been fiscally accountable for what they knew were going to be—I tell you, I have a staff and they know they are going to work next year for what they worked for this ood lord, everybody knows that. Is anybody in this room going to? You probably will, because you do not want the public flak for raising your salaries. This is ridiculous. You have more and more and more money to do what? Go and spend that $4.5 billion. Anyway, if they got another $10 billion in grants, we would not see it.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to get my question out. The grants will be announced in the next couple of weeks. The OHA, when it was in here, said that 75% of its expenditures went to nurses and other staff, unionized staff. I think they said that roughly 36% or 37% was for nurses and the remainder for their other unionized staff. They suggested to us that, because of arbitration, the pattern had been set with their other organized staff at around the 8% level, so that was the basis on which they were looking for their 13% grant. I am just saying that I can see coming in the next couple of weeks the grants to the hospitals, and if the grants are not what the hospitals need they will say: 'Well, we cannot possibly provide what I think'—

Ms Cole Slattery: Good, and you will be saving a lot of money because you will be able to padlock half of them. If you think my workers, having gotten zip for almost 15 years, are going to settle for 8%—that is not going to be.

Mr Phillips: I am trying to support you here, Glenna. I am with you. I think you are suggesting that the range of request will be 30% over two years. That is what I think you said in your opening remarks.

Ms Cole Slattery: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I just want to be sure, now that we are in the role of the loyal opposition, that when the grants come out I have some idea of how the nurses, the ONA, will respond to them, because that will be the pattern set for negotiations. That is my first question.

My second one is in terms of pay equity, because I can see that that will also be, "Well, you'll get your just reward under the Pay Equity Commission." I would like your response to that. Is that what you would accept as an answer, or really is it going to take place at the negotiating table?

Ms Cole Slattery: First, we are at the table. We are at the table with the OHA, we have a bargaining session next week, and we go into mediation conciliation the week after that, and then we are off.

My membership is going to call this shot: 8% ain't going to do it. Pay equity is over here, wage negotiations are over here, and it is so stated in the legislation. I will only do one thing at a time. I tried to do pay equity for three years and I got stiff-armed and stopped everywhere, including by the Attorney General of Ontario under your administration, sir, after I had won that debate at the tribunal and at the Divisional Court. The government that passed the bill came in and opposed it in the appellate court. So I have a bit of a problem with what I am ever going to get out of pay equity.

So that is over there. That is a philosophy that this union can afford to pursue. Our wage demands are practical realities that the government ignores at their peril. These women are smart. They like what they do.

Mr Phillips: Some men.

Ms Cole Slattery: Some men. Two per cent, two out of a hundred. God love them, and they must be braver than lions to be there. The fact of the matter is, unfortunately, for the majority, you are facing an angry white-collar professional group whose anger has been 18 years being born. This has been a long gestation, but it is born. I think it is totally justified.

We never got any money in boom times. Dr Martin Barkin told a group I was part of at one time that the interesting thing about the health care industry is that it is recession-proof, because legs do break and babies do get born and stomachs do get holes in them and have to be taken out. So it is business as usual for health care.

And another thing: We do not feel guilty. What the OHA does with the rest of its workers is the OHA's business and the unions that represent those workers. But I am getting sick and tired of having people try and make our workforce feel guilty if we get 29 cents more than somebody else has managed to negotiate. I am telling you, without us you ain't got an industry.

One of the things I am going to give you—and we will bring over before your session is over this afternoon the president's remarks. I brought the 1990 wage grid. Actually, the proposed grid was at the bottom of it, but I thought, well, after next week I can share that with more people than the OHA.

There are two things of interest here to trade unionists in the room and to any elected official, because I am showing you with numbers. The centre line is the existing wage grid that is in place today and has been in place since 1 April 1990. It is that which disappears 1 April 1991. The line above it is the span. I start out at start, and I am 21 years old, and I work until I am 30 or 40 or 50 or, God forbid, 60—although I will be 60 next summer so that may not be so bad. The ninth step is it. That is it, that is as good as it gets no matter how old you are.

You will see at the top line the span between the grids, in other words, what coaxes the Carol Helmstadters with three or four degrees. This woman used to be a neurological nurse over at Wellesley. What coaxes this woman who works in the operating room up in Parry Sound or that fine young woman, well, that nice lady from Thunder Bay, who is an ex-OR nurse? She has a baccalaureate and used to teach. At one point in time she serviced every bargaining unit north of the 401 for our union. She was on board long before the union was even a union. Would this bottom line keep us? We are all quite smart. I am sure you can see that.

What is interesting to you is the percentage of our members at each step of this grid. You are not going to be happy campers.

Mr Phillips: You have already won the point on the increase. The Premier has promised that.

Ms Cole Slattery: No. The Premier of Ontario has promised my union nothing. His government, as well as when he was in opposition, has made very firm commitments to women's equality, women's empowerment and women's wages. I expect he is an honourable man and I expect I am better off with him at this particular stage in the life of my union than anybody else in the world, but he has not shook my hand and said, "You've got it, Glenna." Because I am not negotiating with him. I am telling the representatives of the seated government that I think you are all being jerked around by the OHA. I have got no quarrel with the Premier—yet.

Mr Phillips: We are trying to figure out where the money should go. You are saying the money is already there in the hospitals, just reallocate it.

Ms Cole Slattery: That is what I am saying. Find out where the $4.8 billion is if the $4 billion is wages.

Mr Phillips: I think we should get that number if we can. The OHA said three quarters of its budget went to nurses remuneration and the rest of the unionized staff. You are saying that if it is 50% you would be surprised.

Ms Cole Slattery: I developed these statistics at the high upper end, but I can tell you exactly how much the existing payroll for RNs is today as we sit and speak: $1,545,780,000. This is based on 41,000 workers. I have already told you that I only have 36,000, but I threw in the other 5,000 for the nurses who work in this province who are not in my union at the staff nurse level.

The Chair: I am going to interject at this point. I am going to give you about two minutes and we will have to wrap this up, because we have other presentations this morning.

Mr Sutherland: You have said that there is enough money in the system. I want to talk to you specifically about the area of management of the health care system. I want you to give comments about where you feel there are some specific areas where changes can be made in terms of the money, the $4.8 billion. You are asking where it goes, but obviously your membership knows where some of those savings can be made. I want you to focus that in terms of nurses' roles in the decision-making process and what progress has been there and what more progress do you feel needs to be made?

Ms Cole Slattery: First, I think they spend an unconscionable amount of money on consultants. There is hardly a hospital that belches without the consultants' approval. I would take a hard look at that. The technology has turned into competitive warfare: "My hospital is better than your hospital." Excuse me? You are four blocks away for God's sake, and you both have a machine that costs $1.5 billion and there are only three of us in the province who need it? I mean, something has to be done. That is the most poor planning. I have said it for years. You turn the industry over to the staff members because we give the place the care for half the price. Very top-heavy administration. Carpet on the administrator's floor, another parking lot—they need another parking lot. You know, this goes on. There is money for everything but the nurses.

Now, the last part of your question was—

Mr Sutherland: About nurses' roles in the decision-making process.

Ms Cole Slattery: You are talking about the right. Mrs Caplan, God love her heart, gave us rights so that we could get duly elected as staff nurses to every committee the hospitals. Forget that. I do not think 15% have complied. In fact, a couple of weeks ago, or a month now, had a nurse up in Peterborough who was duly elected and went to a committee escorted out by the director of nursing service at the request of the physician chairing the committee. What was really funny was the press was allowed stay.

So we have real sexist problems in this industry, but we were involved more—I suspect you would find Carol Helmstadter and myself and Mary Hodder and Leen Davidson are not unique. You are looking at it. You have thousands of them like us. We are not unique. The people are the people who are doing the work.

At the public hospital steering committee a week ago had a real problem. They are opening the Public Hospital Act and the steering committee is going to give recommendations to government. They are going to take all power away from the doctors. Good. They are going to give it to the hospital administrators. Not so good.

You know, this is a sexist system that is built on male, white hierarchy, which I am looking at right now absent this fine gentlewoman. Excuse me Mr. Curling did not see you down there. But you know, years ago I saw the only thing the women's movement did was put a black man in the white woman's place and put the white woman one step below, because white men are more comfortable with black men than they are with white women.

The fact of the matter is that we are 98% female. It is a labour-intensive industry. The entire industry is 80% female and it is one third of the public purse. You got a problem.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your very animated presentation this morning. I would like to thank you for coming.

Ms Cole Slattery: My pleasure. Thank you for letting us come. I appreciate that. We do not always get invited to dances. It does not necessarily mean we do not come, but it is nicer to come with an invitation.

The Chair: Thank you for responding to it.

MUNICIPAL ELECTRIC ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is by the Municipal Electric Association: Frank Hueston, chairman; Jo Wiersma, president; Tony Jennings, chief executive officer. We are awake now. We are focused.

Mr Hueston: Mr Chairman, I would comment that I have copies of my introductory remarks for each member of the committee and what I have to say will not be exacted in what is in the written word. In an effort to leave some time for questions and answers I have shortened up the written text to some extent. I suspect that you are quite familiar with the gentleman on my right, Mr. Wiersma, not only president of the Municipal Electric Association but general manager of Pickering Hydro; myself as chairman of the Municipal Electric Association and as chairman of the hydro electric commission of the town of Port Hope; the chairpeople from the association coming from the political or elected side; the president, vice-president coming from professional staff.

Mr Chairman, I am pleased that we have the opportunity to speak before this committee. The Municipal Electric Association represents 315 municipal electric utilities in the province of Ontario. Ontario's community-based electric utilities are publicly owned and supply electricity to villages, towns and cities on a full cost-recovery but not-for-profit basis. Together, they serve 2.7 million customers, delivering 70% of the power, representing $5.6 billion used in the province, to some 75% of the customers.

Throughout this century, Ontario has gained from the commitment of the principles of public power at cost. No other public service is financially self-supporting. Ontario Hydro and the municipal electric utilities have a unique wholesale-retail relationship which provides the citizens with the highest level of reliability and service while introducing no tax burden.

The Municipal Electric Association provides the means for the member utilities to take joint action. Much of this effort is focused on joint development of standards and practices to better serve the customer or to respond to the legislative and other changes in the working environment.

The Municipal Electric Association also represents the common concerns of the members.

The Municipal Electric Association has five recommendations it wishes to make to the Legislature and the Government of Ontario.

1. The goods and services tax: Despite representation by committees of both the House of Commons and the Senate, the federal government has insisted that electricity be the subject of the goods and services tax. Other countries have introduced value added taxes that have provided special treatment for electricity. Notwithstanding that some have felt that similar special treatment had to be extended to other home-heating fuels, electricity's importance was recognized.

In Canada, exemptions or zero rating has been extended to other services. Is publicly supplied water any more critical than electricity to life in the 1990s? Food consumed in the home is not taxed. Is it consistent to tax refrigeration, the means of preserving such food? Medical services are not taxed, so why is electricity to run a home dialysis machine any different?

The federal government provides tax rebates to other services and yet this public service, which is the only one that is self-financing, is expected to bear the tax burden. It is treated on the same footing as profit-oriented, privately delivered energy forms. Why is electricity singled out? Correspondence from the federal government would suggest that this is largely because the books are separate and its taxation is easy, as opposed to other public services where funding is mixed in the general tax revenue.

The goods and services tax was to be offset by the removal of pre-existing federal sales taxes of up to 13%, yet Statistics Canada data suggest that federal sales tax content in public utilities is no more than 1% and therefore the net effect to the individual ratepayer is a 6% increase.

Except in adding unproductive work, the goods and services tax does not affect municipal utilities. They, like other businesses, must pass the cost along to the consumer. The ratepayer is the one who suffers.

Despite the general tax relief cited by the federal government, this approach strikes the rich and poor alike. How severe is this regressiveness? It is interesting to note that those who can afford to invest in energy-saving strategies can reduce the tax impact.

We should return to the principle of power at cost.

It is therefore recommended that the Legislature of Ontario and the government of Ontario in their dealings with the federal government should continue to oppose the taxation of electricity through the goods and services tax.

2. Ontario's retail sales tax: The new government has expressed its strong dissatisfaction with the goods and services tax strategy. In speaking about the increase in Ontario Hydro's rates for wholesale power, the Honourable Jenny Carter, our Minister of Energy, expressed specific concern over the impact of the GST on consumers of electricity.

1050

Precisely the same concerns that applied to the GST apply to any extension of the retail sales tax to electricity. The current economic situation gives the government of Ontario a challenge which will not be easy. The temptation to follow the lead and tax services may be difficult to resist.

Public electricity affects virtually every citizen and resident in the province, and it is therefore recommended that the provincial sales tax should not be extended to electricity.

3. Water rentals: Public power in Ontario was established in this province to secure for Ontarians the benefits of their indigenous sources of energy at the cost of supplying that energy. There were to be neither tax-based funding to assist in this regard nor profits or other extraneous charges. The basic principles of power at cost have been eroded by ever-increasing levels of water rentals. As ratepayers of this province, through our publicly held generating and transmission company, Ontario Hydro, we pay to briefly rent water moving through the generators and turbines. Our public, non-profit company pays rents to our government. Rent implies the landlord has associated costs. In this case, there are none. Is this power at cost?

The concept of taxation of an agency owned by the public for use of a publicly owned resource is fundamentally indefensible. The current government has called for increased attention to Ontario Hydro's proposals for new power generation. Such rents on the use of public waters affect the economic viability and competitiveness of water power.

The members of MEA have long sought to have water rentals eliminated, yet we recognize that this may not be the time to ask the government to forgo a long-standing source of income which its predecessors have enjoyed. It is therefore recommended that the level of water rentals charged to Ontario Hydro not be increased.

4. The debt guarantee charge on Ontario Hydro: The debt guarantee charge does not fall into the same category. Introduced in the 1989 budget, this charge does not represent even a temporary use of resources, nor does it recoup a cost incurred by the province on Ontario Hydro's behalf.

Ontario Hydro borrows with the approval of the government. The province normally guarantees Ontario Hydro's debt. This notional transaction has carried on for years. But suddenly in 1989, this service was to cost half a per cent of the outstanding debt. The introduction of the debt guarantee charge increased by over 2% the rate which Ontario citizens pay for electricity.

Is this a tax? It certainly does not reflect a provincial cost nor, given the assets of Ontario Hydro, does it reflect any actuarially sound prediction against the likelihood that the guarantee would be called into play. There is a notion that, without the guarantee, Ontario Hydro's cost of borrowing would go up by this amount. There is no evidence of such an increase. A half a per cent increase is highly unlikely, given Ontario Hydro's assets and its reputation in the market. The only valid test would be to let Ontario Hydro borrow without the guarantee. Let the marketplace put a value on the guarantee, if there is one. Particularly when the new government is expecting Ontario Hydro to undertake new expenses for critical energy management activities, the Legislature and the government should seize this opportunity. We should minimize such impacts on the province's electricity consumers and, at the same time, right a recent wrong.

It is therefore recommended that the debt guarantee charge on Ontario Hydro should be withdrawn.

5. The cost of public hearings: A growing cost of supplying electricity in Ontario is the cost of participation in public hearings on rate reviews or environmental matters under various Ontario statutes. In most municipalities in Ontario, a hydroelectric or public utility commission is elected by the voters to ensure that reliable, low-cost electricity is supplied to its community. Through the Municipal Electric Association, they take part in these hearings to ensure appropriate consideration of the concerns of the electrical consumers they represent.

Utility commissioners support due process and thorough review, yet they are rapidly coming to question the cost-effectiveness of some of the current processes. The Ontario Legislature and the Ontario government should also be concerned, particularly when the proponent appearing before the tribunal is itself from the public sector.

Ontario Hydro undergoes an annual rate review. Is this annual process necessary? Is the increasing amount of evidence and detail and the broadening scope of the Ontario Energy Board's interest appropriate?

After a year of preliminary steps, the environmental assessment hearing on Ontario Hydro's demand supply plan is about to commence, or at least it is likely to, some time in the spring. The hearing, by general consensus, will last at least two years. Some of our members look with great worry at the ongoing experience of the environmental assessment for timber management on crown lands in Ontario: conceived in 1986, initiated in 1987, under way in 1988 and now likely not to produce a report before 1992. In that case, the proponent is the Ministry of Natural Resources—the government of Ontario itself. Millions of dollars are being spent on consultants and lawyers' fees, dollars that will come from the pockets of taxpayers and consumers.

The intervenor funding panel for the Environmental Assessment Board has recently released its report regarding Ontario Hydro's demand/supply hearing. Over $1 million worth of funding was awarded. Some cost award may also follow. As the proponent, Ontario Hydro will have to bear these costs. They will be passed on through the cost of power to municipal utilities and ultimately to the consumer. Appropriate public input should improve decisions. The question is, how much, and does the end justify the means?

This hearing is examining the need and rationale for certain projects which form the early parts of Ontario Hydro's demand/supply plan for the next 25 years. Subsequently, specific site hearings will be required.

The member utilities from the Municipal Electric Association do not want to skimp on any steps necessary to ensure an adequate, sustainable development strategy for Ontario's electrical supply. As locally elected men and women, they share with the members of the Legislature and the government concern for the environmentally and economically sound future of this great province. They question the time and moneys involved in the current process. Do these expensive processes significantly improve the quality of the decisions that we are elected to make?

One thing is for sure: Decisions from this process will not be made quickly. One must remember that "no decision" is in fact a decision, possibly the worst one. Does it matter how quickly these decisions are made? That depends. It will depend on how long the current recession lasts, how quickly the economy will recover afterwards, how successful we are at economic energy conservation, how fast the population grows, how much our mix of businesses and energy uses change, how fast our current generating facilities deteriorate and, eventually, how long it takes to build appropriate, new—environmentally and economically best—generation.

Intervenor funding awards are spent largely for expert witnesses and lawyers. How much does this funding of competing lawyers and competing experts improve the result? Of equal importance, what does it do to the ability of the concerned individual to take part in the process? Surely there must be a better way.

It is therefore recommended that the Legislature and the government of Ontario should monitor the cost-effectiveness of major public hearings more closely and should take steps to reduce the costs and time delays resulting from them.

1100

The issues that the Municipal Electric Association raises before you are not new. While they may be politically different, and the current climate may raise financial problems, our recommendations are matters of principle. Ontario led the world in its strategy for delivering electricity. It was one of the few jurisdictions that recognized early the importance of reliability, public control and cost.

Ontario established the concepts of public power and power at cost. Please join the commissioners and staff e municipal electric utilities throughout the province in supporting these valued principles.

Mrs Sullivan: I am quite interested in your brief. I have heard many of the points made by the MEA before. I think, as you know, that the Liberal government took chances on some of these areas. To some, the new government has yet to speak. The major speaking, really, into electricity so far has been done to the questions of nuclear from the new government, and I suppose we are all interested to see what it will have to say latterly.

On the first issue, I just want to suggest to you that you may or may not have noticed that the new government has been leading the revolt against the GST, we are told—

Mr Curling: Revolution.

Mrs Sullivan: A revolution.

Mr Stockwell: How is it going?

Mrs Sullivan: We have not heard how it is going, but we understand that it is doing it.

Interjection.

Mrs Sullivan: That is right.

The Chair: Move it along a little, please, so we can get to the question.

Mrs Sullivan: Well, you noticed there is a revolt, but that is only the first part of the question. I want to turn to the cost-effectiveness of public hearings and also, in doing that, talk about some of the other points you have made, including cost of water rentals and so on in which the environmental and social costs are factored into the discussions. These of course have been major parts of discussions in the past. Indeed, there is some view that environmental and social costs are not adequately factored into some of the pricings.

In terms of public hearings costs, I wonder if you are aware that in addition to the awards that have been made by the panel of $21 million for intervenor funding on the OSPA, Ontario Hydro itself has set aside $60 million for intervenor funding. In fact it is encouraging intervenors to come forward and is looking, for example, at some of the hydro projects in the north, waiting for decisions to come out of the Ministry of the Environment for those processes to go ahead so that the intervenors can be funded.

Mr Hueston: Well, $65 million was originally requested. The one-member panel recognized $21 million of that $65 million—

Mrs Sullivan: As part of the environmental assessment process.

Mr Hueston: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: But within Ontario Hydro's budget for the EA process there is an additional $60 million which Ontario Hydro itself is making available for intervenors.

Mr Hueston: I should also point out that in addition to that $21 million, some intervenors, we being one, are putting up their own funds as well. We won intervenor funding, but it was on the basis that we cover a part of our costs with our own funding.

Mr Wiersma: There is a significant indirect cost involved on the part of Ontario Hydro for the commitment of its staff and so on, which is not funded in any way. That is perhaps what is being referred to in the $60 million of Ontario Hydro's cost, for its staff to participate in this process.

Mrs Sullivan: Hydro will be offering direct grants to groups as well. Certainly one of the things that the previous government had started to do and the new government is doing is reviewing the environmental assessment process to clean it up, make it faster, while still maintaining the integrity of that process. It is one of the things they have done that I concur with and speaks directly to your point.

The cost of intervenor funding is something that I think everyone in all parties sees as a very appropriate part of the public process leading to decisions. That is not really a question, but—

The Chair: A good throwaway.

Mrs Sullivan: I think every party thinks it is a valid and valuable part of the process in reaching decisions.

Mr Hueston: We are very concerned about the cost of power. I think most Ontarians think that power is cheap in Ontario. It is not getting to be cheap any more. I can give you an example that I picked up very recently. The average urban residential cost for power in Ontario is about seven cents a kilowatt-hour based on 1,000 kilowatt-hours per month per house. I recently was at a seminar and was told that the residential cost for power in Takoma Park, Washington is less than four cents. That is US money, but that is significantly less than Ontario. Of course, you get into the whole Tennessee Valley Authority in the United States and power is under five cents.

I think people up here tend to look at the New England Power Pool and New York City where power is 15 or 16 cents a kilowatt-hour and say Ontario is cheap. It is compared to that, but when we are competing for industry, you are not seeing industry going into New York City; you are seeing it going into Tennessee, Kentucky and places like that. Those are the places that Ontario has to compete with to get industry.

Mr Stockwell: Maybe mine is more of a comment as well. I think all parties would agree with the openness the public hearing brings. I think the length of time these processes take is absolutely insane. It is absolutely nuts, especially when it comes to the environmental assessment hearings for, let's talk about, the landfill sites. The last one took 11 years from start to finish.

Mrs Sullivan: My riding.

Mr Stockwell: There you go; 11 years. That is absolutely insane. Nobody can plan on an 11-year basis. I guess that is really what you are suggesting.

The question I am asking you is that the general consensus on your demand-supply plan suggests it is going to take two years. I think that is a laugh. It is going to take considerably more than two years, in my opinion.

Mr Jennings: If I may, it is at least two years. That is what everybody has decided to base budgets on because nobody knows how long it is going to take.

Mr Stockwell: They can base budgets on two years, but the fact of the matter is it is going to be more than two years and you are going to go over budget on all of them.

The Chair: If it is really quick, I will let Mr Sutherland have his question and then you can have yours, but we must move along.

Mr Sutherland: Mine was more a comment. I met with a local group last week. You talked about the long process and the costs in intervenor funding, and you talked about the other experts, but the reality of the situation is that many people out there in the public who are concerned about what is going on environmentally in these other things do not have the knowledge or background to totally comprehend everything that is being presented, particularly when they have a sense that it is only one-sided. I think the process is there to allow the public to have faith in the process, that both sides can be heard and that they can have a full comprehension of what is being proposed.

Mr Jennings: If I can respond to Mr Sutherland's comments from a personal standpoint which I think is shared by an awful lot of the elected commissioners in the Municipal Electric Association and the staff, it is only referred to in a very limited way in our brief but one of the issues is how those local people take part in a process that is focused largely on very expensive experts and very expensive lawyers.

I sit as an executive member of the Conservation Council of Ontario and I look at a number of our member organizations that are trying to appear there. Some of them have chosen not to ask for intervenor funding because they do not want to hire lawyers. They just want to come to make a case. But they are dealing in a very peculiar environment for that kind of input.

Mr B. Ward: I have a follow-up, first of all, so I am clear that there was mention about the tax as well as everything else. Is your suggestion that we should be encouraged to continue our opposition to the GST, specific to the taxation of electricity through the GST? You are encouraging us to continue our opposition?

Mr Jennings: Yes.

Mr B. Ward: Could you speak to that?

Mr Jennings: Because the responsibility—

Mr B. Ward: My question, if I may, is following up on Mr Sutherland's comments on the public process. I think your concern is the cost of public process, the delays, the needed high-cost lawyers and experts who seem to get involved on both sides, and at times even government against government, so to speak. In your opinion, how did that system evolve from the concept of open and honest hearings where the general public is allowed to dialogue with the various departments? How did it evolve to get where we are today where it seems to be a necessity that a high-priced lawyer or a high-priced expert has to be there, otherwise things are not discussed? I was wondering if you could comment briefly on how we seemed to get in the mess we are in.

Mr Hueston: I got to thinking that it is kind of competition. The previous people, the nurses, commented on the fact that you had to be bigger and better—"My hospital's going to be better than yours"—and I think we fell into the same sort of situation. I will let Mr Jennings comment.

Mr Jennings: Let me respond to that by saying that there is no way of knowing from the outside. I think there was an intent at goodwill in trying to make sure that everybody had an unfettered chance to have his say. You are dealing in this hearing, just like the timber management, one that was referred to, in fairly sophisticated technical areas, so you try to help the people by providing them with the funding to get experts. But inevitably, because it is a process that is removed from government, it is more—allow me to express a personal opinion—an American style checks and balances approach rather than the government accepting the responsibility for its decisions. I do not think it is any one government; that has been developed—

Mr B. Ward: Just a natural evolution, I guess.

Mr Jennings: —over two dozen years that I have seen our society moving and wanting to have some kind of arm's-length, decision-making process removed from government. So you end up with a quasi-judicial type of approach. I think our members are seeing a lot of money spent and are wondering not that the issue should not be raised, but if there cannot be a better way that is less costly and less delay.

Mr B. Ward: Time to review the process.

Mr Hueston: I think the thing that concerns us—if we look at the timber management situation, at least the trees continue to grow while this ongoing hearing carries forth, whereas what we are sitting on here in energy is that progress towards the development and design of new generation plants is at a standstill. That is a significant difference.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee I would like to thank you for your presentation this morning.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC REAL ESTATE COMPANIES

The Chair: Our next presentation is by the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies: executive director, Ronald Daniel, accompanied by Ross Cullingworth and Peter Goring. We are trying to keep a tight schedule today, so you have half an hour.

Mr Cullingworth: Thank you for giving us the opportunity to come before you. I am Ross Cullingworth, president of Coscan Development Corp and president of CIPREC. Ron Daniel is the executive director of CIPREC. Peter Goring is chief financial officer of Bramalea Ltd.

CIPREC is the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, an organization that has approximately 400 members. They are the larger developers in the country, predominantly involved in commercial, retail and industrial activity. Some members—it just so happens that we are probably the two—Bramalea and Coscan, are also fairly involved in the residential side. As an organization have significant property holdings. The companies in the association have significant holdings in Ontario.

For the period 1984 through to 1989, inclusive, our industry was one of the very significant contributors to the growth in the province, and our industry probably represented a very significant percentage of the new jobs that were being created, because construction activity was running into very high levels.

I would like to give you just a quick overview. We have submitted a short brief. I presume you have had that and I am trying not to concentrate on that at all, but to touch on a few other things and then give you the opportunity to ask us any questions you might have.

I would like to give you what we see as an overview of our industry, our business now. On the commercial, retail and industrial side, all are in a significant oversupply situation. With the current decline in jobs that we are experiencing and the difficulties that manufacturing is having, particularly the problems it is having on the export side, exports are being hurt by the high level of the Canadian dollar, but another very significant factor that is influencing the problems on export is the cost of doing business in Ontario.

There is no impetus with this decline of activity to stimulate any new construction. These sectors of the economy, we believe, will be a negative contributor to growth in 1991.

As projects are completed—there are a number that are still going up—there will be very little new ones started to pick up the employment. We can see the example of the recent capping occurring on the Bay-Adelaide Centre.

It is our view that jobs in Ontario will continue to be lost in 1991 in our industry.

On the residential side, it is also in an oversupply position. There are a significant number of units in inventory on the condominium side. On the low-rise side, there is not what you would call a lot of standing inventory. There is definitely some. However, the resale market has a very significant oversupply and so we think that the level of construction on the residential side will also be low and therefore have the same impact on the economy as the commercial, retail and industrial.

Over the past number of years the provinces have reduced financial support and transfers to municipalities. These actions have caused a surge of new taxes on business in general and real estate in particular.

A recent article in the Globe and Mail made the point that municipal real estate taxes in Canada increased by 18.8% a year during 1983-89. Between 1987 and 1989 property tax increases exceeded inflation by 73%. These increases are in the traditional real estate municipal assessment base and do not include some of the additional taxes that are now being extracted, the recent new taxes such as the Ontario commercial concentration tax, the development charges tax which is significantly increasing levies across the province, and the increased land transfer costs.

It should be understood that in office and retail space, the commercial leases provide for the landlord to pass new and/or increased taxes on as additional rent to tenants. Tenants, in turn, will assess the impact of their costs on their business and decide whether they can pass it on to their customers. The point there is just generally that it is not the organizations that pay the tax bill that bears the cost, but the end user. It is the consumer who ends up paying for these increases in taxes.

There is a tremendous tendency for governments to like to look at the development industry, we have experienced it many times before, and say, "Let's tax that industry more." You are not going to tax the industry more to any great extent. It will get passed through to the consumer. It makes the cost of doing business that much higher and thus the increase is falling on the consumer and it is making it much more difficult for businesses to be able to operate, particularly with the impact of free trade.

In summary, we do not see really what sector will lead the economy out of the recession. Presumably it will be consumer spending. However, in our industry we still have sufficient inventory to absorb that. If the consumers do come back into the market a little stronger, even if housing starts to increase, this is not likely to translate itself into a lot of jobs.

It could be, therefore, a little more severe a recession than most people are predicting. We are having more people now suggesting that it might be a little longer recession. However, if we look at some of these things on a historical basis, we know that our industry has always been one that has helped, or tended to be one that helped to bring the economy out of a recession. We are saying this time we are not sure that that is factored into many of those forecasts correctly. The real estate industry is one of the larger employers in our economy and we respond to demand. We see very little demand for our products in 1991, particularly in light of the current oversupply.

Our recommendations to governments, and we do make these same points to the federal government—in fact we obviously add a few more things because of its influence both on the cost of the dollar and interest rates—but the government must deal with the structural problems that have been created in the economy.

The cost of doing business in Ontario is inordinately high from provincial deficits and, as I said, for that matter, deficits throughout the country, high interest rates, excessive taxation at all levels, artificial trade barriers within Canada, the cost of creating industrial facilities as compared to the cost across the border, all of which serve to inhibit productivity and job creation and obviate the benefits that we do expect to achieve over the long term with free trade.

The deficits: To deal with deficits, governments—federal, provincial and municipal—cannot increase taxation in this environment. In this environment, this will lead to a reduction in international competitiveness and probably a reduction of industrial activity and job creation. Fundamentally, our levels of taxation should be decreased to keep our industries competitive in the world market.

At the end of the day we in our industry have probably the same underlying objective that we think the government has, and that is a stable, productive economy and one that is probably providing a reasonable level of growth, not an excessive level of growth, but something that is controlled and does not stimulate price increases.

The government must reduce spending in absolute terms and redirect spending to support economic activity, reduce spending in areas of business regulation and the bureaucracies involved, in duplication of services such as the collection of taxes. In social and cultural programs, make social programs more user-pay as a method of forcing the cost down and make social programs more targeted and less universal.

Those were just some of the general comments. If anyone has any questions at all, we would be more than happy to try to deal with them.

Mr Curling: We had a presentation yesterday from the Toronto Home Builders' Association and they are giving me the opposite message, or maybe I am hearing wrong. They are saying that we should stimulate the construction industry, that is what I am hearing from them; as a matter of fact, they are the ones who are building and you are selling. You are saying that the market itself is oversupplied, both the commercial and residential market now, so therefore there should be no more put on the market. Am I hearing you right?

Mr Cullingworth: That is correct. It is definitely oversupplied in commercial, retail and industrial. On the residential side it is oversupplied at the current market prices, but I would have to say that there is very little product. Because it cannot be produced at current land prices and current costs of production, there is very little product for the affordable level. Anything below $140,000 is very difficult to produce in Toronto.

Now, that does not apply in other communities. If you go outside of Toronto—and I do not mean just outside of Toronto, because the Barries and the Oshawas are also influenced by the Toronto pricing—if you go to Kitchener and London, you will find there is an oversupply of housing in most ranges and they do not have the same affordability issue. But quite definitely, there is a market and there is very little product because of the increases in pricing that have occurred in the last few years in affordable housing in the greater Toronto area.

Mr Curling: I would be presumptuous to even ask you to comment on their presentation, although you did not hear it, because you have worked very closely with them. The overinflated price of that product—when I hear about available, I say it is overinflated, because the price of homes is going up so fast, and I am talking about residential, for instance—that sometimes they could not even catch up with the price. What they have done is take some of the facilities, the accessories out of the house. You do not get lights, you do not get a fridge, you do not get a stove and all of a sudden the prices keep going up but you are getting less.

Now, the affordability can be addressed, would you not say? Basically, there is a price in there somewhere. I am talking about the builders and the real estate people who are saying, "A willing buyer and a willing seller," that kind of game; people were then confident of getting homes. Would you then say how far down you feel the prices will drop with this oversupply of unaffordable houses that will come down almost to affordable?

Mr Cullingworth: Peter and I might have different answers to that. Peter, do you want to try that?

Mr Goring: That is what democracy is all about. You can start.

Mr Cullingworth: The decline in prices, I believe, is probably much greater than reflected by the normal resale information that you see. We know in many cases builders have a tremendous tendency not to reduce their prices and that is why there is very little selling. They have a tremendous tendency not to reduce their prices for a number of very natural reasons. They might have a lot of people already in a community who have bought at a different price and they do not want to be the ones who significantly reduce the price to sell. However, there is no action occurring.

In the resale market there is some action occurring. We have seen many examples of prices today that sell for anywhere from 30% to 40% less than the price they sold for a year and a half or two years ago, and you have to go back close to two years to get to the peak.

On the land side, I have seen many examples of land prices, and I am talking now about the serviced lot. Because of the leverage involved, this would be a higher number than if you came to raw land. On the land side we have seen declines of similar amounts, 30% to 40%.

I think that is at the high end of the scale. As you come down the scale, so that your pricing is coming down into the lower price—I am talking there about some of these single-family houses that were moving up into the $500,000 to $600,000 range—there has been a very significant shift down in those and there is virtually no market for them. In the lower range, if you get down into the $200,000 product, we probably have seen something in the order of a 20% to 25% decline in values at this point in time.

Mr Curling: You do not want to comment?

Mr Goring: No, I just concur with that. It is like trying to sell fridges at the North Pole. The era of consumer orgies is gone and nobody wants those big houses. You obviously have to bring them down a lot more, because people just do not want them. The houses that are more appropriate to today's taste, I think 20%, 25% is the right number.

Mr Cullingworth: But again, I think there is very little product at all in the GTA that falls in at a $140,000 price. If one converts that into the level of income a family must have to support buying, we have removed a very significant proportion of the people who did not have houses, we have removed them from the capability of coming into the housing market.

Mr Goring: And to some extent, the advent of those houses is going to be delayed because of the lags in the zoning process. If you have a piece of land that you were thinking of putting into 50- or 60-foot lots, and you went up to where the market was and decided you had better t changing them in mid-process back to 28- and 32-month lots to put more affordable housing on them, it is going to take 18 to 24 months to get that new product on the market. I think that is why we have seen a bit of a gap. The product people want to buy cannot be delivered and will not be able to be delivered for another six to 12 months, except for stuff that just happened to be there.

Mr Phillips: Mr Curling asked part of my question. I think a lot of committee members, myself included, have been quite taken with the fact that the professional forecasters, the banks, the Conference Board of Canada, Inmetrica—I see today that the University of Toronto has completed a study—all are predicting that we are only months away from coming out of the recession. Mid- to late 1991 I think is what virtually every forecaster has predicted for us.

You said today that you may see things slightly differently from your perspective. I wonder if I might ask on what you base that conclusion. I also think you may be closer than many of us are to measuring a kind of belief that some people have that some industry is leaving Ontario. I wonder if you might just comment on the basis on which you have reached your conclusion that the recession may be a little bit longer than the professionals', not that you are not a professional forecaster—the other forecasters'.

Mr Cullingworth: I am not a professional forecaster. I said it could be that it will be a little longer recession than a lot of the forecasters are predicting. It seems to me that very often the housing industry has been one of the industries that tended to be the leader of the economy out of a recession. The economy turns a little, house building moves up and that creates a lot of jobs. We are a very labour-intensive industry. I think if what many of the forecasters are doing is looking at a lot of the historic numbers, then they might not be factoring in the full impact of what is going to happen in the housing industry.

However, having said that, I do know that most of the forecasters are forecasting lower housing starts in Ontario in 1991 than we had in 1990. So from that perspective, it should be in there. I guess we are in an industry right now, particularly centred in Toronto, where there are an incredible number of negatives. So we might be a little more pessimistic than many people because we have both issues, declining business, declining activity, seeing that last for a period of time, and declining values wrung into the business at the same time. We do not have many up days when we go into the office and maybe that is influencing us.

Mr Phillips: I think that is the same thing we feel here. The forecasters, who seem to step back from it somehow or other and forecast the weather, say the storm is going to end and those of us who are in the middle of the storm cannot see the end of the clouds.

Mr Daniel: Maybe I could add that in our brief we indicated there may well be various sectors of the economy that will recover, but it is not in the cards for real estate to recover in 1991 and we do not see major recovery until 1993. There will be a continuing decline in Ontario of new investment in the commercial construction field through 1991 and again in 1992.

Mr Phillips: Where is that?

Mr Daniel: It is in our brief, but it is Data Com, which specializes in construction forecasts. That is the problem. In other recessions, as Ross Cullingworth has pointed out, the construction of commercial space and residential housing has led the various economies across the country out of the recession. We do not believe it is going to happen this time.

Mrs Sullivan: I am also interested in the predictions that you make, and particularly that oversupply at this time will mean that housing and other construction starts really will not be a trigger for reflation. I wonder if we are moving into a time when indeed there ought to be less emphasis placed on housing and other construction starts as a key economic indicator. So much of our gross domestic product in recent years has been based on a measure in terms of housing starts, and with demographic change I wonder if in fact we are not looking at a permanent restructuring in the real estate industry in all of the four sectors.

Mr Cullingworth: It has been predicted, actually, for the last 10 years that demographics will reduce the activity in the industry and it has not occurred. One of the main reasons for it is that we are first of all a shifting population. The Toronto area is a very attractive area, has been an attractive area. We are concerned about its ongoing attractiveness to business and industry and we have a significant change in the level of immigration into the country, a high proportion of which moves into the Toronto area.

You go back five or six years and we were talking about immigration of 70,000 and 80,000 people a year. Now we are up to 200,000, moving to 250,000. If you factor that in, immigration is a direct demand for housing or accommodation. It does not matter whether it is rental or ownership, but it is housing. If you factor that in, I think you will find that as long as Ontario continues to grow and create jobs, it will attract those people into the community and the demand will probably stay very close to the 200,000 level for the next number of years in Canada.

Peter, did you want to touch on the—

Mr Goring: I want to make a comment on the industry. To me, there is one demographic change in here. As we went through a period of prosperity the average family size shrank dramatically, which increased the number of units. I do not know how many of your children are coming home.

Mrs Sullivan: They all are.

Mr Goring: We will see that change, I think, over the next four or five years, but I agree with Ross that it is the immigration that has been driving this market. I think we are having a serious problem with industry in this province. I do not know if that is news to anybody on this committee, because I think you are all aware of it.

As you know, our home base is Bramalea. About five years ago it looked like they were not going to get, I cannot even remember what it was, an American Motors plant, I think, originally. We actually said we would make the big sacrifice and, in quotation marks, "give away" some land in our industrial park so American Motors could build a plant.

But that will be okay because we are going to have all these suppliers who will want to be really close to the plant. We understand they are having this new just-in-time inventory and everyone will want to be on their doorstep so when they want a widget in five hours they can walk across the street with it.

When we went out and canvassed the industry we tried to bring those people here. This was as long as five years ago. We found (a) how far a truck could drive in 24 hours and (b) that even then the tax burden and the costs, as opposed to being somewhere in Kentucky, were just totally uncompetitive, even including driving time. Although we did not gain anything, we are now actually at the point where we are seeing plants move and those suppliers are going south of the border.

Also the other impact: Anyone who lives in the Niagara Peninsula feels the loss of shoppers and eventually jobs across the border. Hopefully, as the federal government moves to start collecting the GST, some of that will disappear, but for those of you who are in the Niagara Peninsula and other border points especially, I think it is a large problem which will affect seriously the retailing side of industry in Ontario.

Mr Sterling: I have been concerned about the non-productive part of the rise of costs of real estate in Ontario over the past five years. I guess I am concerned about our planning process and whether or not it is serving the function it was intended to serve. I think most politicians agree with the function, regardless of party, whatever, but it seems to have created a monopolistic system, which in my view has not led to extraordinary good planning overall. I am not sure the price our people have paid is worth the overall planning system. That might sound strange from somebody who drafted the Niagara Escarpment plan, but notwithstanding that, I am concerned about the overall impact of our planning system.

In a time of recession and when real estate properties have been devalued and prices are softer, I imagine the pressure on municipal governments for new development is much less. It probably is the best time to alter our planning system, because people have more time to think about what our overall goals are without the immediate pressures on us. Have you any comments on that end of it?

Mr Cullingworth: You would have no difficulty getting a few comments from us on the complication, the difficulty in the system. There are some things that the system does that people probably do not quite realize. It clearly provides everyone the opportunity to object and delay activity, but there are other side-effects.

The system is so complicated and so long, and the municipalities are put into the position of constraining themselves, only allowing a certain amount of land to be developed in a year, because of a number of elements.

It could be the fact that they knew they were only going to have two schools or were only going to process the land that accommodates two schools. They have all their own departments to worry about. They have the engineering departments, their planning departments, the plumbing departments, their whole infrastructure, the garbage departments. They do not want to throw them all out of whack in terms of a normal process. They do not want to find that one year they processed 2,000 acres, to find out that the next year they really only are going to process 300 or 400 acres, because then they have all sorts of people on staff who they are not even in theory extracting, because they do take a lot of the costs for those out of levies.

What happens then is they have a tendency to have a relatively normal position in terms of what they process but the market does not work that way. Whatever it is that they are moving through the system, it takes four to five years to move through the system. Automatically, if there is a spurt in demand, which we had starting in 1985, but much higher in 1986 and 1987, had a huge spurt in demand, maybe a lot of it motivated by speculation, that is definitely a possibility, but it pushed up the demand for land processing and it was not changed in terms of its pace.

There became an absolute scarcity of land currently available for building. In fact we all know that many builders were selling product on land that they did not even have approved. They were selling houses, saying, "We are going to deliver it in a year and a half out ahead of ourselves." That was really dealing with next year's land any event. That put a force into the system that drove prices up.

I know there are a lot of people who would like to take a different position, but I am a very strong believer that the house-pricing increases in Toronto were motivated 100 per cent by a scarcity of land being available for the market to deal with. Therefore the system does have its rigid and negative impacts on the buyer.

Mr Sterling: I would just like a short answer because we have to move on. Can you tell me if there have been any studies done by your group on comparing—I think it is very important that we compare—systems in New York or Michigan, because they are becoming more and more our competitors as we move towards a global economy on this matter. Have there been any studies done on comparison of delivering costs of developed and undeveloped land in both those, comparing their jurisdiction to our jurisdiction and their timing process to our timing process and their safeguards, etc.

Mr Cullingworth: We have not undertaken any specific studies of that nature. I am not sure whether there have been any.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: Our next presentation is by the Canadian Federation of Labour: Jim McCambly, president; Robert Begg, president of Working Ventures Canadian Fund; Robert Conrad, secretary-treasurer of the Ontario Provincial Council of Labour.

While we are waiting for them to set up, some of the questions have started to range over a wide variety of topics that do not seem to deal directly with pre-budgetary commendations. We have a very tight timetable for day. We are sitting practically the entire day, and if we could restrict our questions solely to that area of expertise and one question per person very quickly, we will be able to get through today's agenda. But we do have a very full agenda with the Treasurer coming in the next 45 minutes so.

Mr McCambly: It looks like we have pretty much got the mechanism in order, so I would try to make haste in order to utilize your time to the best advantage. I welcome the opportunity for the chance to make this presentation. I want to try to go through, relatively quickly, a presentation and open the opportunity for some questions and answers, and maybe with some presentation, I might discipline myself.

Ron Begg, on my left, is the president of Working Ventures Canadian Fund, and Reg Conrad, on my right, is the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Federation of Labour's council for the province of Ontario.

The Working Ventures Canadian Fund is sponsored by the Canadian Federation of Labour, and I guess it is the first national venture capital fund sponsored by labour. It is national in scope for economies of scale, but it is committed to reinvestment in each province.

Working Ventures was established under federal legislation. It is up and running. We are selling shares. We are ready and seeking investment opportunities. We have a federal 20% tax credit for any investor up to $3,500 anywhere in Canada. We have a $15-million grant that is payable to the fund over a seven-year period. We are just at the end of the second year of that now and we have about five years to go. It is RRSP eligible, but I do not want to exaggerate that. What that essentially means is that some people who are now committing their RRSP money to guaranteed investment, if they have a pension fund, if they have a sound RRSP plan, may take part of that and put it into equity capital that does not currently exist.

Of course, what we are here for today is to request your support to have Ontario consider participating with a matching tax credit. Just at a glance you can see here that the structure of the fund is very much like a mutual fund. We are looking to create the opportunity for thousands of individual people, particularly working class people, to participate in the fund, to pool their activity, energies and money to be managed professionally into promising growth businesses.

In order to emphasize that we are gearing this whole thing to average people, average Canadians, and not millionaires or corporate investors such as has previously been the case, our objectives are to make the economy grow, to have people working to make the economy grow, to create jobs and strengthen the economy by people participating in the risks and rewards, and really pride, I think, is also an important issue, the average person participating in his national and provincial economy.

A bit of an introduction of the management team that we have hired, and these people have been selected on a national scope from the best we could find in Canada: On my left is President Begg, who has lengthy experience as an entrepreneur and a manager of business and is a very energetic, dedicated leader of the fund.

Jim Hall, the VP of investment, has just been cleared by Ontario and every other securities commission in Canada to enable us as an investment advisor to be able to make investments in small and medium business. He has tremendous credentials, has managed up to $400 million of funds in his track record.

Peter Pressey, a chartered accountant, is VP of administration and a computer expert and a person who we hired from a very large Toronto business and are fortunate to have.

Julie Makepeace was a marketing manager for one of the chartered banks and is particularly familiar with things such as RRSPs and different instruments that were similar to our fund.

We have a board of directors which is worth mentioning; many you would recognize. In addition to President Begg, Geoff Styles is a recently retired vice-chairman of a national chartered bank. Pierre Lortie was with Bombardier Financial and was previously chairman of the Montreal Stock Exchange. George Fells is sometimes called the dean of venture capital. Wendy Dobson, of course of the University of Toronto and a local person most of you would know. Lloyd Barber is from the University of Regina. There are directors who are appointed from the unions, but it is only a majority of one. You can see that the power and influence of these people is very welcome and very important to the direction of our fund.

The operating principles are really important for you to understand. We want to operate this fund on sound management principles. We have identified that it is professionally managed. It is not managed by the unions; it is managed by the best professionals we can find. We operate with strict fiduciary responsibility to shareholders, and of course one of our main objectives is job creation. One of the ways we would look to do that is by going out and backing potentially successful enterprises, enterprises that have the potential for growth, have the potential for exports, have commitment to excellent quality in competitive Canadian products, both for the domestic market and for international markets, whether it be manufactured products or whether it be services.

The matter of productivity is something that is very important, I think, a contribution that we can make in trying to develop greater positive labour-management co-operation. The fund and others see us as a more patient long-term investor than other types of capital funds that are looking for private investments to go public very quickly, forcing them into difficult situations. We see it basically as a very big, giant step in the free enterprise system for labour getting involved and working with and helping businesses to succeed.

The diversification of the fund is important. It is across all provincial boundaries, although we will get into the individual investment in the province. It is across all industrial sectors. It is able to invest in any stage or type of investment, whether it be expansion of existing businesses, turnaround, startup, restructuring. Of course we want to help workers or businesses in employee share ownerships. Where that occurs, we can assist them, advising and getting involved in that way.

We are more interested in incremental tech instead of just high tech. Naturally that is a more risky type of investment. We are not so keen at the moment, at least, on getting into high risks. We are more prepared to take lower rewards and a little lower risk, looking for higher labour content, and certainly to be able to put value added to both the investees and the products that are created rather than exploiting resources.

The commitment to participating provinces is really crucial. We have circulated material to you that includes the prospectus. I have taken an excerpt from the material that was given to the Premier and ministers which reflects the commitment we give to any participating provinces. This is something you can cut your wrist and sign in blood if you need to, because it is our commitment to our membership, to everyone, that when a province gets involved, we want to see things happen in the province so that people can have a share in and participate in. It is not just the 80%. It could be 100% or 120%, because the province also has access to any other uncommitted money in the fund for investment in the province.

First, our prime objective is to invest in businesses, as we talked about before, and until such investments are available we would put them in government paper. It might be Ontario Hydro. It might be other types of paper that would be approved in the province of Ontario. The national office is in Ontario, right here in Toronto. We can give quarterly—or monthly, if necessary—detailed financial reporting to the province. We want to go with strategic sector advice that the government is interested in, and to try to tie to that also in terms of the areas. Ontario is a lot more than Toronto or Hamilton. We are also very interested in the Sudburies, Sault Ste Maries, Sarnias or whatever, and Renfrew or other parts of the province where potential investment exists.

The impact—for your benefit very important—is that for every 20 cents of provincial support, we will have $1 to invest in small and medium business. Carrying that forward, for every $2 million of provincial tax credit, we will have $10 million to invest.

If you extrapolate that, with a $10-million investment, here are just some examples. The material we have on this really comes from Working Ventures here in Toronto, which is the Canadian expert, if you like, on this type of investment. I just took a couple of examples. That kind of investment in three years, they estimate conservatively, would create or promote or support 1,500 jobs. By year five, it would be 2,800. Important for you, as a finance committee, is the recommendation or decision on behalf of the taxpayer, and that is the return in revenue, and this is only taking personal revenue, not from a business or corporate return. By year three, the year should produce $1.6 million in tax revenue, and by year five, $3.1 million. So the compounding effect of the incentive is huge for the benefit of the province and the taxpayer base.

There are details in our submission on exports and research and development, which are all available to you if you wish. Again it is the matching credit and the involvement of the province that we are really looking for, and your support, your recommendation and consideration which I hope are some of the more important issues that you will be dealing with, your committee. You get thousands of Ontario people involved in looking to the future and supporting the investment and a bright future in Ontario, I guess the indication is now there is no better time to have some equity money available to support some businesses, some of which are very desperate for equity capital at the moment.

To close, it essentially is a matter of government leadership that will enable us to promote what we see as a dynamic co-operation between business and labour to really make some things happen and help average people to make things happen so that they do not just have to wait for large investors to make decisions within the economy.

I would be happy to try to respond to any questions Mr Chairman, that you and the committee might have, or the president of Working Ventures, or Mr Conrad. Thank you.

Mr Hansen: Maybe I missed the slide, but if this is proposed and comes in, would the small business be applying to your outfit or would it be applying to the government and wind up working through your funds?

Mr McCambly: All applications for any sort of capital go through the machinery of the fund. Due diligence needs to be done, searching of whether they have the management, whether they have a market, whether they have a product. All that is done by President Begg and the vice-president of investment, Jim Hall. He is responsible for that. Only after they are satisfied that there is a potential for investment would they come back to a committee of the board or the board itself to say, "We are recommending investment in this enterprise." So it is run as an investment business in that respect.

If the province or the government has a desire to support certain industries or certain areas or something, we would ask you to take a look in those areas to see what might be done that would coincide with the objectives of the government of the day, but it would definitely be the initial responsibility is with the directors, with the company, to make sure those investments are prudent.

Mr Phillips: I am intrigued by the idea. I will make a prediction that, in some form or other, something like this will be considered in the very near term. My own judgment is Quebec kind of figured out a lot of stuff and this is one of them, that we are going to be looking at creative ways to foster new forms of partnerships. That will be kind of the jargon of the future, and what you are seeing in Algoma right now, in some form or another, will drive it to the suspect.

The Chair: Are you going to patent the phrase?

Mr Phillips: What is that?

The Chair: "Fostering partnership."

Mr Phillips: That is a cliché already, and it will be a cornerstone of the future—that is another jargon—all which leads me to say that this group has been working on it for some time. I think the OFL has had some difficulty with it, and I think it is split on it. I predict that in some form or another that will change, because if we want to look at the future, we will need some repartnership. So I guess I just say to the government that I would hope it could kind of look at this as a—if it is not the perfect model, it is something very close to this, and as I said, the goma thing may drive at least the thinking around new repartnership. President Begg, I think, was the entrepreneur the year one year in Canada, developing a world product out of nothing, which sells now around the world. I think you do have a good staff on hand there that has kind of bowed the way a little bit.

I am repeating myself. I do not know whether this is the perfect model, but I would urge the new government to take a look at this and see if we cannot drive it forward in some form to help with that.

Mr Sterling: I just want to ask a couple of specific questions. Does the federal government presently give a grant for this kind of thing? If you got the provincial government to agree, you would be getting 40%, or the investor would be getting 40%.

Mr McCambly: Yes.

Mr Sterling: Who gets the 40%, the investor?

Mr McCambly: The investor.

Mr Sterling: So he gets 40% kickback.

Mr McCambly: Yes, 40% tax credit. It is exactly the same as what is provided now for the solidarity fund in Quebec and it is exactly the same as the province of British Columbia is offering—although it has no takers for what it is proposing in British Columbia, and it is no wonder, but I will not get into that—and it is exactly the same as what we currently have in the province of Saskatchewan. I might say it is going great. I tell you, things are happening there and we are very pleased with the response. Mind you, they acted and created retroactive legislation.

Mr Sterling: We had in this province, brought in two governments ago, the small business development corporations, which I believe provided a 30% kickback for the shareholders. But there were limitations on the type of investment.

Mr McCambly: Yes.

Mr Sterling: How does this differ from that?

Mr McCambly: The big difference with this fund and most other types of proposals is that there is a limit to the amount of tax credit you can get. The maximum investment is $3,500 a year or less. But the average is more like $500 to $800. We are talking about average people here. Of all the people who invest in anything, only 17% or 18% invest in any kind of equity. So what we are starting from is, the first thing that anybody who is going to invest says, "What's the guarantee?" If you are going to invest in this kind of thing, there is not a guarantee. What we are talking about is getting people involved in making the economy work, having a piece of the action, seeing something happen.

I used to rent a cottage and then I bought it. When I rented it, I only cut the grass. Now I never quit working. I work on it continually. I sympathize and I am not in any way critical of some unions which have the notion that this is a bit of a conflict of interest. We have soul-searched on this. We do not think so. We think it is time for labour to move in a new direction, to be a new player in the economy, not to control the economy, but to really help to make things happen.

Mr Sterling: Could I ask a few more questions on specific details? I am always interested in having people invest. This would be open to anybody in the public?

Mr McCambly: Everybody.

Mr Sterling: Everybody in the public?

Mr McCambly: Yes.

Mr Sterling: What would control the administration costs of the plan? I am always concerned. I think that with SBDCs we had a number of people who set the SBDCs up, but basically the 30% became an administration cost, which was extremely high for what they were really doing. What guarantees are there to the government that you are really not creating—excuse me for being a bit probing, but I would be concerned if that 40% all went down to pay highly paid executives' salaries.

Mr McCambly: I can tell you, we are just as concerned as you are. I will let President Begg respond to that because he is the person who has to answer to the board of directors to keep those costs in line on behalf of the shareholders.

Mr Begg: I think the model that Working Ventures is pursuing is that we are very much like an equity mutual fund and the cost of administering that fund will be similar. Unlike the SBDC, which involved a relatively small number of relatively high-network individuals with larger investments, this is directed like an equity mutual fund to a rather large number of discrete investors, particularly average wage earners.

We have gone to market, unlike the SBDCs, under the full prospectus route. We have received our final receipt on our prospectus from the Ontario Securities Commission and securities commissions across the country, and one of the elements discussed in the prospectus, of course, is the administration costs of the fund. In the prospectus, there is the commitment that administration expenses will not exceed 5% of the fund. As a practical matter, our operating expenses are substantially lower than that to date and forecast for the next year. One of the reasons, of course, that this is possible during the startup phase is that we are enjoying the federal grant which underwrites the startup costs, so the individual average wage earner who is investing in the fund is not going to see heavy administration expenses.

Mr Sterling: One last question. Would investment be based on the fact that it was a union-run shop?

Mr McCambly: No. I think that deserves an answer from me because it is a question that is always asked and is a good question. We are not limiting or directing this to unionized firms. We are sure going to look at requests from unionized firms and we do not want to invest in firms that are anti-union or that are not interested in good relationships. We are talking about starting up businesses and so on that have never heard of a union and a lot of times that is not necessarily unionized.

The Chair: I am going to interject here at this point. We have the Treasurer coming in approximately 20 minutes, during which time we have to have lunch. Now I have three more people who would like to ask questions.

Mr Stockwell: I am fine, I will not ask a question.

Mr Hansen: I have a question. If we are talking Algonoma, that is $800 million. That is the top, but we are getting down to, what level would you be investing in a business?

Mr McCambly: A quick answer.

Mr Hansen: If a person needed $10,000 to get a business going, or $50,000, or $100,000, as we know here in Canada now that at least 95% of the people are employed in small business, is this the area that you are looking at, small business, or are you looking at large business?

Mr McCambly: We have sort of indicated, at least for the start, although we have not started that investment mode, but about $100,000 initial would be about—you would not go lower than that, for sure. But our limits are set under the regulations that we established federally and those are, 500 employees or less, $10 million net or less, $35 million gross or less, so that gives us a pretty large size.

Let me tell you that one of the business directors said: "One of the first things we've got to do is raise that limit. We've got to be able to back bigger enterprises." That is now the rule. I just tell you that.

Mr Hansen: Okay, good.

Mr Curling: I am going to make a comment more than a question. I know that you are trying to attract ordinary people to invest in their own province and all that and I am going to just make a comment. Maybe at the first blush I would see the aspect of employment equity. I would like to see some visible minorities and see a woman. At a glance at your board I saw one Wendy there. That is some effort to be made because people, when they invest, want to feel a part of it, that they see people reflecting the kind of society that they are in. That is just my comment. Maybe you have attended to that, but I think it is a very serious matter that should be addressed.

Mr Begg: To comment on that, I spend half my life these days dealing with the investment community and the other half out dealing in the union halls with, you know, average wage earners. The kind of dialogue that this is stimulating and the kind of participation that we are getting by people right across the country is really exciting.

The investment community is coming to understand that unions are interested in increasing productivity and building stronger businesses and working people out in the union halls are taking a look at the effects of investment in productive businesses and the need to participate in this increase their stake in the free enterprise system. It is a very exciting thing, quite apart from the merits of the project in terms of employment creation and building strong companies.

Mr Stockwell: Sounds real exciting. I am looking for some cheap money.

Mr Begg: Thank you. Here is my card.

Mr McCambly: I will just try to wrap it, to say thank you. There are a number of other provinces that are not looking actively at something similar to what you are doing, similar to what Saskatchewan is doing. Of course, I live in Ontario, but Ontario is a leader and I think your government has an opportunity to do something here that is really going to have a major, lasting effect. We are talking about Canadians who are not going to leave Canada. The money is not leaving Canada; the money is not leaving this province. We would really encourage and request your support in this endeavour that we think is big for the future.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

At this point I would ask the clerk to bring in order for lunch. I will recess the meeting until the minister gets here. He will be about 10 minutes late, so it will be about 12:40.

The committee recessed at 1214.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1234.

TREASURER OF ONTARIO

The Chair: I would like to reconvene the hearings for this afternoon. We have before us again the Treasurer of Ontario, the Honourable Floyd Laughren. I would like to turn it over to the Treasurer.

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. I am pleased to be here, I think, so far. As you know, Ontario Finances came out yesterday and I do not think there were too many surprises for people who are observers of the fiscal scene in Ontario. As the Finances will show—and I think all members have copies of it—we still think we are going to be able, despite dropping revenues and increasing expenditures, to maintain our deficit level at about $2.5 billion for this fiscal year.

It is not magic; it is a case of having some revenues that we did not really think we were going to get because of the settlement of Ontario taxes collected by the federal government basically for 1989 that are now coming in. We are substantially higher, almost $1 billion higher, than we thought, so that has allowed us to stay within the deficit number of $2.5 billion. We are pleased that the numbers have shaken down that way.

At the same time, we are not kidding ourselves that we had much to do with that. But at the same time we are concerned about the year coming up, about what level revenues will be at. Of course that is not, I do not think, the discussion for today, so I really should not get into it, I suppose. But in terms of the third-quarter finances, you can see the numbers that are quite clearly outlined. In revenues, the big numbers that have affected us are, the retail sales tax came down $672 million from the budget plan back in the spring; the corporation tax being down $775 million; gasoline tax $102 million, and land transfer tax $240 million. Compensating for that was the increased personal income tax, which I talked about, which is up $937 million. That still means that our revenues are down $883 million from what was budgeted in the budget plan.

On expenditures, you can see it is not complicated either: the Ministry of Community and Social Services up $554 million. That is quite simply the dramatic increase in welfare case loads. The other is the Ministry of Health, the open-ended programs in Health such as access to the health care system and the Ontario drug benefit plan being up $136 million. The contingency fund was $389 million, which was used to transfer to various ministries, and then of course the UTDC guarantee, $400 million. When you take into consideration all of those changes, you end up with the $2.5-billion deficit for 1990-91.

We are now in, of course, the final quarter, January, February and March, and we are expecting the recession to continue this quarter. Most people still seem to think that the recession will turn around in the latter part of calendar 1991 but that when we come out of the recession it will not be a big rebound, it will be a flatter rebound than it was in 1982-83. So that it is going to be perhaps at a plateau that will not be as high as the plateau from which we found ourselves after 1982-83. We are somewhat concerned about that, but at the same time we are doing what we can.

I think that, looking back a couple of months, I am really pleased now that we went ahead with the capital works project, the $700-million program, because I think at least it was some kind of response to the recession and I think it was the right kind of response. It did not build in expensive programs that have annualized costs for many years. It was a case of doing some rebuilding of our infrastructure that needed to be done anyway. At some point those dollars would have to be spent and it is probably cheaper to do them now than later; also, of course, the creation of about 14,000 person-year jobs. It will be more than 14,000, because a lot of the jobs will not last a year.

There was a story in the press this morning, along with a great picture, which indicated that the capital works program was tied up in red tape. I have never complained about media coverage, because I have been blessed that way, but it really was not a proper reflection of what I was at least trying to say. What I was trying to say was that when we announced the $700-million program we said that, of the $700 million, we were going to put it in place as quickly as we could because we were into the recession already but that it takes time to consult with our partners out there at the local level, whether it is municipalities or school boards or even line ministries across the province and that as soon as we could get the jobs going, they would be going and they would be paid for.

Once you even assign a job, and you have heard of some of them already being announced, as soon as that is announced, then you have to go through the process of getting people on the job and then there is the process of paying for them and so forth, so there is always a lag when you are launching a program like this. To my knowledge, it is not bogged down in any kind of red tape. It is just a normal process of getting jobs started, and then as the bills come in, you pay them. I think it is not a case that it is bogged down. There is absolutely no attempt to slow down the process of those jobs. We want them out there as quickly as we can and we want most of the jobs to be completed by the end of 1991, because we believe we are coming out of the recession and that this was supposed to be a capital works project that would help us cope with the recession basically in 1991. So far, I think we are doing all right with it.

We have invited the federal government to come on board and participate, but so far it has refused to do it. We had a meeting this Monday past with the other finance ministers across Canada and with Mr Wilson. Mr Wilson is preoccupied with high interest rates and inflation. I tried to impress upon him the fact that in December, the last month I saw the figures, Ontario had a consumer price increase of 4.4%. I hardly think that is worthy of a single-minded monetary policy based on anti-inflation and that it is time, since he is in a war mood anyway, to swivel his guns on the problem of the recession and away from inflation. But he is determined to continue to keep interest rates up there at what I think is an unreasonably high level and talk about the problems with inflation in the economy rather than the problems of the recession. That is not helping us in our struggle in Ontario, but I do not know what else we can do to convince Mr Wilson that we have a problem. It is moving into the other provinces as well, although Ontario's numbers are more serious than those of the other provinces.

I know you did not come to hear me speak for an hour, Mr Chair. If I could leave with those few introductory remarks, I have to leave at 1:30, but I would be pleased to try to answer any questions you have, and there are people here from Treasury who will help me.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the Treasurer's being here and I would not mind at some stage just if we could look at next year too, but maybe it is impossible. I guess two or three things. One is, I am quite curious about the $1-billion windfall. You may recall a little exchange you and I had in the House where you said I was too partisan by suggesting that there may be something coming.

Hon Mr Laughren: I do not remember that.

Mr Phillips: It is what it says here. I said, "I will say that a little side bet might be the previous Treasurer's estimate of revenue for the fiscal year may be closer than the current Treasurer's." You said, "Oh, you're so partisan."

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay. Now I remember.

Mr Phillips: It does have some impact in terms of thinking ahead, because I know that when you made your statement in early October about the deficit, at the same time I think the federal government was recording, I think, about a 24% increase in personal income tax revenues. I am curious about when we, the provincial government, would have found out about the coming windfall, because I gather we had a similar windfall the previous year.

Hon Mr Laughren: Surprisingly similar numbers too, I believe.

Mr Phillips: It just seems unusual that the federal government was reporting this for the period April to September, and the lines of communication were not, I gather, as swift as they might be, and that is the base on which I was saying to you in the House that I thought the revenues were going to be higher.

Another part of the question is, we now have the third quarter in and I would not mind some feeling from you about the fourth quarter. Are we likely to see these numbers stay the same? I am thinking about revenue and expenses. I know how tough that is, but if revenues come in higher, would we expect therefore the deficit to be lower or the spending to go up to keep to the $2.5 billion?

The last one is, I know that you were remarking that the Treasurer last year used the windfall to prepay some expenses. The good thing about next year is that we will have $600 million or $700 million worth of expenses—UTDC and whatever you put in for SkyDome. I know you do not want to say what it is, but whatever is in there are kind of one-time expenses this year that we will not incur next year.

Again, if you are looking to this committee to give you some advice on the budget, I just want to make sure of those things. One is when we found out about the billion-dollar windfall; as I say, when the feds were reporting earlier. The second one is, I guess the answer is this is your best cut of what we will get for the fourth quarter, but next year it seemed to me it was another little bit of windfall that came even later than this point in time. The last one is, just, have we prepaid—you do not have to give the exact number—somewhere around $500 or $600 million of expenses in this year's budget that will be of a non-recurring nature?

Hon Mr Laughren: You mentioned the UTDC. That is the only one I am aware of.

Mr Phillips: The SkyDome—I am sorry. I know you do not want to give that number, but in your previous answer you said you provided in the contingency plan.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is correct. That has not been paid yet.

Mr Phillips: But there is money somewhere.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is built in there. The second point I would caution you on is when it comes to preflows. The preflows that come into this fiscal year, 1991, are what I would call—this probably is not a technically correct way of saying it, but almost a false $1-billion revenue base, which means that next year we are starting off $1 billion less in natural revenue base than we would otherwise, because 1991 was inflated by $1 billion. I do not see this in a critical way, just that putting that $1 billion in 1991 meant that there was a higher base in 1991, so in 1991-92, we do not have that billion, almost a billion, that was there from the preflow in personal income tax revenues from the federal government. This year, if we had kept this billion dollars—$922 million, is it?

Mr Phillips: Thirty-seven.

Hon Mr Laughren: If we had kept the $937 million and did not build it into this year's numbers, I suppose you could argue we could have a deficit of $3.5 million and preflow it into next year, but I do not think that makes much sense. Not only that, the auditor already is a little bit testy with Treasury for doing it last year, so I would keep that in mind when you are thinking of the base of revenues this year compared to the base of revenue next year.

Mr Phillips: I was wondering when we found out about the billion dollars.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, I was going to get to that. I am going to ask Tony Salerno to help me with that because I quite honestly do not know. You had better take a seat because the mike will pick you up. This is Tony Salerno.

Mr Salerno: The federal government started giving an indication that the transfers to the province would be revised in November, as an early indication. The revision is a composition of prior-year assessments and revision of the current year's collections.

Hon Mr Laughren: I think you ended too abruptly for Gerry to cope with.

The Chair: That is the shortest answer we have received in this committee hearing in two weeks.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the final quarter, I am just trying to—because I think last year there was kind of a series of windfalls. Are the windfalls over now?

Mr Salerno: What we have done in our estimation at you see in the third-quarter Ontario Finances is try to anticipate any further revisions. We will not know the actual number to the dollar until March, frankly. What we have done is try to anticipate what that final number will be, and we feel that is the best number. We do not anticipate any significant change from that number that we are reporting in the third quarter.

Hon Mr Laughren: Or in expenditures, to answer your question. But even if there was a windfall in the fourth quarter—

The Chair: Would you just speak a little closer to the microphone? We want to record all of this.

Hon Mr Laughren: Sorry. Even if there was an increase in some kind of windfall in the fourth quarter, we would not be looking for ways to spend that.

Mr Phillips: Okay, good. On the other one, I know you do not want to give the SkyDome number because that is a matter of negotiations, but there is $400 million.

Hon Mr Laughren: There are also negotiations going on with the doctors as well, so if we started putting down individual numbers—

Mr Phillips: But those would be ongoing expenses.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, no. I am talking about negotiations with the doctors who have not settled. The province has not settled with them since 1988, I believe.

Mr Phillips: But the $400 million is a one-time expense that will not be incurred next year. The SkyDome would be a one-time expense that will not be incurred. I am just looking for offsetting ones. I know you are concerned about the prepayment the previous Treasurer had for the three areas. I am just looking for other prepayments that you will not incur next year, one-time expenses, this $400 and whatever is in there for SkyDome.

Mr Salerno: There is a certain amount as well for the settlement of doctors that is in fact retroactive to 1989.

Hon Mr Laughren: Then it becomes annual.

Mr Phillips: That is my point. I am just looking for things that will not be incurred next year, you can just take them right out of the budget.

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay, but if there is a retroactive aspect to it, that part is what—

Mr Phillips: I understand that; you would have to fund that. But it is $400 million plus SkyDome, the non-recurring expenses.

Hon Mr Laughren: You persist in saying that, but you are not quite right. It is $400 million for UTDC, plus the SkyDome, plus part of the doctors' settlement, assuming we arrive at a settlement. The retroactive aspect of it which is not an annualized cost is a one-time shot.

Mr Phillips: I understand, but I am just—

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay, I think you understand.

Mrs Sullivan: My questions follow through from the third-quarter financial report leading into budget planning for the next year. It seems to me that as you are starting budget planning for the next year, you can really start, as the Treasurer, with a clean slate with all sorts of options. They may be a balanced budget, they may be a deficit, they may be revenue moves, they may be expenditure moves.

Many of the changes that you have already made, particularly on the expenditure side, will affect the 1991 budget. As you look at, with no revenue moves, about $120 million a day coming in in revenue and an operating surplus that you talk about in the third-quarter report of $669 million, you do have room to move this fiscal year and you have done so and some of the moves that you have made will in fact carry over to next year. I am thinking of things like $500 million, no retail sales tax on top of the GST; capital projects, $665 million left for next year; social assistance rate changes, $365 million for next year; nurses—who knows?—but there has clearly been a promise made; this morning an announcement of $52 million on child care. So you have some room to move and in fact you have already made some decisions affecting the budget next year.

One of the things that you have not done which has affected the municipalities is to announce the transfers and get your reflation fund, if you like, the $700-million fund, of which $34 million is coming out of this fiscal year and depends on municipal participation. I wonder where the municipalities' share will come from and when those transfer payments will be made.

The other thing I am wondering about in terms of reflation is, why has the water and sewage corporation not been taken up and acted upon. That agency was deliberately structured so that it could lever additional capital into the economy to deal with necessary environmental projects.

School capital has been placed over a period of three or four years in terms of announcement. Some of those could perhaps have come on stream earlier.

On the revenue side, we have talked about some of the expenses you have newly brought in to the 1991 budget. I wonder, as you are planning that budget, if there are revenue moves that you are deliberately leaving out of your calculation, including additional new payroll taxes.

Hon Mr Laughren: Perhaps I could start at the top of your list. I think your first basic question had to do with transfer payments. Correct me if I miss one here.

Transfer payments: We have been doing some fine-tuning, partly because of the numbers changing and so forth, on transfer payments and we are basically ready to go now. We are trying to get it ready for the next—I keep saying dates and having to backtrack from them, but certainly within two weeks we hope to have the transfer payments. I thought they would be out before now, quite frankly. I was a little disappointed in that.

Mrs Sullivan: Are you holding back because of the date of the federal budget?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, absolutely not. Mr Wilson did not give us a date for the federal budget the other day when we met, but I got the impression he is not going to delay it very long. The last date I saw flown around, not a specific date, was some time in February. I would not hold him to a particular week or anything like that.

My impression was he still hoped to do it around the end of February, but he did not give a date. He did not make that commitment, I hasten to add. It is more a case of making sure we had all the right numbers and consulted with the various ministers who were involved with the transfer agencies. We are quite anxious to get that out as quickly as we can.

On the water and sewage corporation, I think there has already been an announcement on the assignment of a deputy minister to help provide some muscle to that, Mr Pitura. It should be an indication that we are not trying to stall on that. We are taking that quite seriously, but there is still some review of what that whole role should be.

On the revenue side, I was not very clear. I did not understand your question about payroll taxes. Was there some reason why you selected payroll taxes for the question, or were you just using that as an example?

Mrs Sullivan: I think that at a time of deflation in the economy, a recession, it is in the interest of the business community to know whether it ought to be anticipating new payroll taxes in the next budget.

Hon Mr Laughren: I see. I think you know the budgetary process around this place as well as I do. I will be very honest with you, though. I am not trying to be vague or to obfuscate. There has been no decision on tax moves at this point. The consultations with the interest groups all across the province have really just started—that is where I just came from now as a matter of fact—with this committee. I am quite serious about looking forward to hearing from the committee because you are hearing from lots of groups and we are too.

It is a new experience, but it really is quite edifying.

Mrs Sullivan: But would you rule out payroll taxes?

Hon Mr Laughren: I would not rule out anything. I do not think it would be fair to start going through a checklist and ruling out certain ones, but I hope you appreciate the fact that that means it would not automatically rule them in either.

Mrs Sullivan: The other question was, where will the municipal share on the reflation projects come from?

Hon Mr Laughren: A project is one in which the municipality normally has a share. They would continue to have that share and would be up to them whether or not they picked up that particular project and went along with it. If they decided no because they did not want to assign their resources to that particular project, that is fine. But that would be the normal process of sharing.

That is why we said when we made the announcement that it was $700 million of provincial money and that if all of the projects that we thought were out there would be accepted by the municipalities and school boards, because they were their projects, the total input into the economy would be about $1 billion if they pick up the local share, add the local share into the provincial share.

So there was that built-in assumption right from the beginning. But I think you would have to commend us for not saying that it was $1 billion of money. It was really $700 million of a provincial commitment that only becomes $1 billion if the local government picks up its share, the municipalities and school boards.

Mrs Sullivan: But you have cut back already in your estimate of what you would be flowing this fiscal year.

Hon Mr Laughren: Wait a minute now. It was not cut back. I think we started out with around $40 million, $41 million or something and it is back to $34 million.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, $41 million to $34 million.

Hon Mr Laughren: But that is not because we cut it back. As those projects can be taken up and approved—I mean a lot more than that have gone through the operations committee that is dealing with this. It is just a case of that is how much we think will actually be able to be spent in 1991, before the end of March, not because we are cutting back on it at all. We would spend $50 million, $60 million, $70 million. The ceiling is there of $700 million and so there is no attempt whatsoever to reduce that number in this fiscal year—none. It does not make any difference to us whether $30 million, $40 million or $50 million go this year versus 1991-92.

Mrs Sullivan: That will make a difference to your 1991 fiscal year. We are talking $700 million in static and you have dropped already from $41 million to $34 million, and possibly by year-end, if you cannot churn these projects in, it could be $25 million.

Hon Mr Laughren: I suppose.

Mrs Sullivan: The impact on the next fiscal year is also going to be significant.

Hon Mr Laughren: But on a $45-billion or whatever billion-dollar budget, it is not going to alter our fiscal position very much in 1991-92.

Mrs Sullivan: But it may alter the impact of the reflationary funding, the impact of the projects themselves in terms of economic turnaround, given that all of the economists, including from Treasury, are suggesting that the need for the reflationary impact is before the third quarter of the next fiscal year.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is a good point. That is why we are doing what we can to push them out there. The faster they get out there, the happier we are.

Mr Stockwell: I am concentrating on three specific areas today.

First, preliminary revenue projections for next fiscal year: I am certain you have some. Last year, the then Liberal government provided those preliminary revenue projections to this committee. We cannot seem to get them. How come? If so, when will you give them to us?

Second, on the deficit, you have suggested a couple of times that your next fiscal year's deficit is going to be higher. You have said numbers do not fuss you; they do not I think "scare" was the word you used. You have taken a long hard look at that, I assume, and you know it is going to be higher and you have accepted the fact it is going to be higher. Have you looked at the other side of the equation, maybe wage and price freezes, some hold-the-line areas in the government where you could generate some revenue to offset some of the tax increases or increasing the deficit?

Third, when your Fair Tax Commission was announced, it was going to come back to you with some real important recommendations, preliminary recommendations in fact. It was not going to be a long-term, ongoing, for-ever-and-a-day commission. It was going to come back and give some serious recommendations reasonably quickly. Well, in a very short period of time, it appears to have taken on a life of its own. Originally, it was 12 months. Now we are talking 36 months as to when you will get a recommendation back.

Is the Fair Tax Commission your first plank for re-election come 1995? It does not seem to me, if you are going to get this report back in three or four years, you are going to have any opportunity to implement any of these concepts and ideas, and An Agenda for People will be put on hold because every time anyone asks you about that, you just refer them to your Fair Tax Commission.

Those three areas really interest me, particularly the deficit, and how soon your Fair Tax Commission is going to talk to you.

Mr Laughren: Thank you, Mr Stockwell. First of all, I do not know where you get the year 1995 from. We are considering a very early election.

Mr Stockwell: Consult with Mr Peterson.

Mr Laughren: Never mind, never mind.

I know you probably will not like this answer on the revenue projections, but I have no intentions of providing revenue projections until I have thought about what kind of tax changes, if any, we are going to put in place for 1991-92. I would be simply second-guessing myself if I did that. We are aware, however, that tax revenues are going to be relatively flat—I do not mean flat-line so much as relatively flat in 1991-92. Other than that, I cannot give you a number on revenue projections.

On the deficit, once again, it is basically the same answer. Until we have done our revenue projections and taken a hard look at the kind of expenditure controls we want to put in place, it would be pretty hard to give you a very precise number on the deficit. You asked a question about wage and price controls. I assume you meant across the entire economy.

Mr Stockwell: Within the province at least.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, but private and public sector?

Mr Stockwell: I was specifically speaking about the government.

Hon Mr Laughren: Oh, you are talking public sector.

Mr Stockwell: Yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: Why am I not surprised?

Mr Stockwell: Why do I feel like I know your answer?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, but you raise an interesting question. At the federal provincial meeting which is still fresh in my mind from Monday, the federal government is expressing concerns about settlements in the public sector all across Canada, not just in Ontario and in the federal public sector as well. I certainly do not see that as the cause of our problems. If we have problems in Ontario with revenues and expenditures and subsequently deficit, they are caused by the recession. You would be pretty hard pressed to point a finger at anything other than a recession which is not simply an Ontario recession. You could say it is a made-in-Canada recession. I would be inclined to agree with you if you said that, Mr Stockwell.

Mr Stockwell: I did not say that.

Hon Mr Laughren: But I think that the answer is to get the economy moving again, and Mr Wilson could have a major say in getting the economy moving again. For those reasons, no, I have not even thought about your suggestion.

On the Fair Tax Commission, we are tidying up, if you will, the final selection of all of the commissioners. We hope to make a formal announcement in the next two or three weeks. You will recall that we are going to ask the standing committee on agencies, boards and commissions if it wishes to review that selection of commissioners. That was raised in the Legislature at one point by Mr Harris. We want to make sure that there is an opportunity for that to take place.

We have been slower getting this thing started. I am not blaming the standing committee for this. The potential for the standing committee to slow the process down is there too, for up to about 60 days or 65 days, I think, while they have an opportunity to review the names that are submitted to them. We will make the announcement of names the same day that they are referred to the standing committee. That means that if the standing committee was to, say, deal with it that day or that week, then that is one thing. They may very well decide that they have got other priorities and will not deal with it. They have to deal with it within I think—I do not know why I keep saying 65 days but something like that anyway. If that is the case, then they would not really be able to become commissioners until their names have been vetted through that process. That will slow it down a little bit but we do not know how much since a part of that is up to the committee.

Mr Stockwell: Just one quick supplementary. It is very difficult when you are dealing with questions to yourself, but the fact of the matter is every time you get a difficult question, you pass it off to the Fair Tax Commission.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, that is not true. Ask me a tough question.

Mr Stockwell: What I would like to know is when I will learn more about the Fair Tax Commission. When are we going to hear back from the Fair Tax Commission?

You are telling me it has slowed down. Originally, when you announced this, it was 12 months.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I am sorry. I did not address that part of your question.

Mr Stockwell: So when are we going to hear back from it? There was a tough question. Sometimes you do not even answer them.

Hon Mr Laughren: We want information from the tax commission to be on an ongoing basis back to us. We are not going to be paralysed on matters of taxation, because we have appointed the Fair Tax Commission. We want to get advice from them as they carry on and we reserve the right to take action as well. The Fair Tax Commission is a commission that is going to advise us on making the tax system in Ontario fairer than I think most people feel it is now. I do not want to, on the other hand, pre-empt their role by moving on a wide array of taxes as we appoint them to do their job, so there is a line we walk with getting advice from them and not being paralysed and not taking any action on tax measures.

Mr Stockwell: Is the original date still in place, 12 to 18 months?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I do not think you ever heard the 12-month figure from me.

Mr Stockwell: No, 12 to 18 months.

Hon Mr Laughren: If they completed their work in 12 to 18 months, I would be happy but I would be surprised if they can. I do not want to tell them their schedule.

Mr Sterling: I would like to follow up on Mr Stockwell's question. In terms of your concern with the federal interest rate policies and that kind of thing, we have had evidence in front of this committee that the inflationary pressures on the private sector are coming from the high wage settlements in the public sector. You say to the federal government, "What can we do as the government of Ontario to influence you to bring down interest rates?" You know interest rates are intimately tied to the inflation rate and that, if the inflation rate drops, then Mr Crow has more room to drop the interest rate. I understand that public sector wage settlements are 1.5 to 2 points above the rate of inflation in Ontario at this time. Does it not make sense to you to consider wage controls in the public sector in order to bring that down so that Mr Crow would have some room to drop the interest rates?

Hon Mr Laughren: First of all, I do not think that is correct. I stand to be corrected by Mr Salerno, but I thought that the public sector wages in the last quarter or two in Ontario were actually running below the private sector. I stand to be corrected on those statistics.

Dr Christie: The private sector settlements have been varying with respect to the public sector counterpart. In late 1989 they tended to be higher. This year it has moved around from quarter to quarter; there has not been a clear trend, although on average public sector settlements have been higher. Settlements have been declining and inflation has been declining, although one of the things that has been noted has been the role of anticipation with respect to the GST in terms of making settlements arrived at now for next year somewhat different than the ongoing rate of inflation now, because people are anticipating an impact the GST.

Hon Mr Laughren: I might add to what Mr Christie said. By the way, I have a correction on what I said about the Fair Tax Commission. The legislative committee has 35 days to notify us, when we send in the names, if they want to review the appointments and then another 30 days to do so, to review them. That information will make clear.

Mr Wilson brings in the GST, which we think adds at least a point, I think more, to the rate of inflation. I do not think many people would say it was below one. People might say it was not 1.5, which we had built into our numbers. But I can tell you that it is a bit strange to bring in a tax that increases the rate of inflation by a point and then complain about us causing inflation. I mean, he cannot have it both ways. Also, I have never heard Mr Wilson nor Mr Crow—by the way, did you convince Mr Crow to come before the committee yet?

Mr Stockwell: Yes, he said the day you give us your revenue projections.

Hon Mr Laughren: I see. In other words, no.

Mr Stockwell: That is what we got about your revenue projections.

Hon Mr Laughren: He has never told anybody I cannot think of that anything the province would do, that he would then make a commitment to lower the rate of inflation and subsequently the value of the Canadian dollar, which Mr Sterling points out.

Mr Sterling: But there was a significant difference between the GST driving the rate of inflation up and a wage settlement which is in excess of the rate of inflation, because it is compounding every year. It was pointed out by several of the economists who appeared in front of this committee that while the GST drove the rate of inflation up by 1% that is 1% for ever and it does not feed upon itself. You are not willing, then, to consider doing anything to assist Mr Wilson in dropping the interest rate?

Hon Mr Laughren: Absolutely. We will co-operate with Mr Wilson in most ways.

Mr Sterling: What ways?

Hon Mr Laughren: We engage in bargaining with the public sector. That is one of the ways in which we try to control the expenditures of the province. Do not forget as well that there are such things as arbitration awards which can go beyond the settlements as well, so you have to keep that in mind.

Mr Jamison: Last week reference was made to your concern about the federal transfer payments to the province and the possibility of further decline from the federal government in payments to the province. Could you expand on that and what effect you would see there?

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Wilson has indicated that he is going through the same process we are with trying to plan his budget, only he is closer to the date than we are. But he is not about to tell us any of his budgetary decisions at this point. He certainly did not tell us at our meeting.

possible to get signals and vibes and I certainly am very unhappy with what the federal government has done to us in transfer payments, not just now, for the last several years.

Just next year we think that what they call the cap on the Canada assistance plan, which is being challenged in the courts, is going to cost us over $500 million and the squeeze on the expenditures on the established program financing over $500 million as well, so that our revenues from the federal government will be down over $1 billion, believe, $1.3 billion to be precise. So that hurts in our ability to absorb expenditures as well and in particular when we are going through a fairly difficult time. I did try to make that point to Mr Wilson at the meeting, as you might expect, because that is my job, but he was not overly sympathetic.

Mrs Sullivan: Can we just have clarification on that? Is it $1.3 billion that you are anticipating in the cutback in transfers for 1991? Is that on top of existing cutbacks?

Hon Mr Laughren: No.

Mrs Sullivan: That would be the accumulated total.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay. Thank you.

Hon Mr Laughren: But actually if you go back to 1982-83, the reduction, correct me if I am wrong here, but at the same level of transfer payments from the federal government were in place today as back in 1982-83, we are not talking a billion, we are talking probably $6 billion or $7 billion lower than they would otherwise have been.

Mr Salerno: If I may add, the $1.3 billion is only the impact of the 1990 federal budget modes.

Mr Christie: Federal budget modes, right.

Mrs Sullivan: So in February there was an additional one. We could be seeing an impact to the 1991 budget of well over $2 billion depending on what might be—

Mr Salerno: Depending on what they may do; who knows?

Mrs Sullivan: In that particular fiscal year.

Hon Mr Laughren: Our feeling is that it is going to be a smaller pie overall from which to distribute to all the provinces and that we will be as one of the so-called "have" provinces—I do not like that term—but so called because of equalization payments. You can imagine we are a fair target. Sorry, Mr Jamison.

Mr Curling: Minister, I am going to follow up on the transfer payments. Immigrant groups have come before us here and are extremely concerned, and as we have the Ontario-Canada agreement and transfer payments coming across they feel that while two parents are quibbling around the money, they will be shortfalled on the amount of money they will get for programs like ESL training and a number of things while we have the increased immigrants here. Could you assure us, whether it is a shortfall coming from the feds or so, that I could say to these immigrant groups as they are coming in that the Treasurer came in and said: "Don't worry about that. That fight is between the feds and us. Your money will be coming so your programs will be in place," and they do not have to close down their organizations and can continue the kinds of services they have done so well over the past years?

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay, but could you help with a clarification of your question? Built into your question, are you arguing for a higher deficit or more taxes? I am little confused.

Mr Curling: The clarification I am having is that if you do not get the money from the feds for that ESL program, if you will say to them, "I'd love to give it to you but that bad Mr Wilson or that bad federal government hasn't given me the money so I can't give it to you," they are saying, "I want you to reassure me that you'll tell them that yes, that fight is between us but your money will be found someplace else."

Hon Mr Laughren: Stop repeating the part of the question I understand. It is the part I do not understand that I want you to enlarge on. What are you building into your question, a higher deficit or more taxes?

Mr Curling: No. That is your problem about a higher deficit.

Hon Mr Laughren: But you would agree that one of those two is built into your question.

Mr Curling: Well, listen. I will go along, Minister, and say that you are not concerned about a greater deficit as long as the services of those people are looked after, because you see, as again the saying goes, these are the people who are last to hire, first to fire and also that any services that are coming to them they have got to wait a little longer and the burdens will be greater on the system.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Curling, I am not trying to trivialize your question, believe me. We are very much aware of that. I do not know what kind of line we will end up walking on that, but you are quite right. It is a very tough decision when you have cutbacks coming at the federal level, as we think there are, when we have revenues that are pretty flat and some expenditures that are very high. That is a decision that has to be made and that is part of the budget process which has not been completed: To what extent do we allow the go up and how high, and to what extent in the middle of a recession can you impose new taxes on individuals and the private sector? I mean, you put the dilemma in your question. It is built in, the difficulty of the process, and I know you are quite right, that is our problem.

Mr Curling: The dilemma is not in my question either. The dilemma is in their finding that they will not have programs.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, no. I understand that and we will try.

Mr Phillips: A couple of real themes have emerged in our hearings so far. Almost every professional forecaster—the banks, the Conference Board, I think Informetrica—I think it is fair to say, and I think your Treasury people as well have said, that we should see mid to late this calendar year the end of the recession or the coming out of the recession.

the municipal sector. There are a number of examples where the province has felt that it wants to retreat from an activity or that a municipality would be the better vehicle to carry out these activities and, therefore, it has been transferred. An example of that would be court security, which was a hot potato last year. We saw how that was transferred to municipalities without proper and full consideration of the impact upon the municipal budget.

This has a fiscal impact upon municipalities and the municipal sector cannot readily absorb these increased costs. We therefore ask that the impact for municipalities be properly considered when making changes or implementing new programs. It is our submission that responsible government should consider all corollary impacts, and this of course means that in provincial actions the municipal impact should be considered. This appears to have the support of some members of cabinet and, therefore, we would ask that this be considered and perhaps carried out by the government in the budget process.

The second thing I want to touch upon is our position with regard to the funding of social services. It is our position that the property tax revenues are obviously an inadequate and inappropriate tax base for social assistance. Social assistance is a program for redistribution of income and an equitable base for such comes from tax sources other than property taxes. We have seen reforms in social assistance and these were long overdue and welcome, but to an extent these are being conducted upon the back of the municipalities.

As a result of some programs, the case loads have increased within municipalities by about 50% across the province. For many municipalities these payments have greatly exceeded their budgets as the impact could not be properly foreseen. Our brief outlines statistics printed by the Ontario Municipal Social Services Association earlier in 1990.

I will just mention again our experience in Kent county as an example to show that county case loads have almost doubled and our expenditures were about $2 million over budget. In Kent county that meant that even if the county froze all expenditures in 1991, it would still require a 12% increase in county levy to meet that deficit which resulted from the social assistance changes. The case loads are still increasing and, as unemployment rises in areas such as Kent county and throughout this province, we will see more recipients of these programs and this will be a municipal expense on taxpayers who can ill afford the expense required to meet these costs.

There have been a number of reports done in the past dealing with the issue, the latest being the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review. Our brief echoes what municipalities across the province are saying, that this is a provincial jurisdiction with the need for provincial resources to back up these programs and municipalities should not be a funder of these programs.

Now the government has indicated its commitment to reform of the system, and this reform should include the funding of the system. Other aspects of these programs are suffering as a result of the maintained municipal involvement. For example, special assistance budgets within municipal general welfare assistance budgets are suffering. Municipalities are reducing special assistance budgets because they can no longer afford it. This is at the expense of the recipients of social assistance.

The Treasurer had a recent announcement involving assistance in funding to deal with the latest increase and this was a welcome step in this direction. I would urge you to continue the process in the 1991 budget to show the government's commitment to reform of the social assistance system. At this point I will turn it over to Mr Richards.

Mr Richards: Good afternoon. I speak to you as chair of AMO's fiscal policy committee and as treasurer and commissioner of finance of the region of Peel and treasurer of the Peel Non-Profit Housing Corp.

AMO would like to see the province's 1991 budget acknowledge the need for an examination at least of alternative sources of revenue for municipalities. You will recall a prior provincial budget which imposed a $5-per-ton tax for the disposal of tires which went into the provincial coffers while leaving the disposal of tires a municipal responsibility. We would like to see similar ingenuity directed to the municipal revenue stream.

The second point I would like to make is that AMO well fully supports the reintroduction of Bill 229, a bill that will take municipal investment and borrowing in Ontario out of what have to be called the Dark Ages. It is, for example, illegal for me as a treasurer to use a computer to record certain debt transactions. Clearly, there is an immediate need for reform of municipal investment and borrowing in this province. Back to you.

Mr Hopcroft: We all acknowledge that this coming budget will be a difficult one for a number of reasons, the economy and the transition being two of probably the most prominent features. Municipalities have been rightly concerned about the direction of the province in the past in terms of what was expected of them other than continual looking to increased responsibilities without the means to finance those responsibilities.

The first budget and the impending transfer payments I think, will be a key indication to municipalities as to the philosophy that the new government will have towards the municipal sector. We would hope that whatever action the government takes, it reflects the recognition of the importance of the role of municipal government and also respects the autonomy of municipalities as indeed a legitimate form of government with legitimate roles and responsibilities.

We would like to see those roles and responsibilities restructured. We would like to see some clear indication in the coming budget of the province's commitment towards that re-evaluation of the existing relationship and movement towards one that I think would recognize the significant areas of influence and interest and also the revenue sources available to the two levels of government.

As long as municipalities continue to have some of the responsibilities that they do, there is a clear need for revenue-sharing between the province and municipalities in terms of funding some of the very substantive socprograms that municipalities have been funding over the last few years, welfare obviously being a significant one.

As our president indicated we would leave, we hope, a significant period of time for questions, we welcome questions from the committee at this point.

Mr Jamison: I know that in our own area there is a significant burden right now on the welfare and social assistance programs and this is reflected, as I see, right across the province. What kind of impact do you see in the next fiscal year there?

Mr Harrison: The answer to that question is always sort of episodic. We can say that it is going to be bad across the board, but we all have our own horror story. In the Malden-Norfolk region, which delivers GWA at that level in our area, budgeted in 1990 for a 25% increase in our costs for GWA over 1989. We are in fact coming in at about a 65% increase, which is 40% over what we had budgeted for. Luckily, we did at least provide for a 25% increase, and our commissioner is indicating to us that we should be looking for a further 65% increase in our budget in 1991.

The problem that we have with social assistance is simply this: It is clearly a provincial government program. All of the decisions in regard to welfare are made here in this building on this hill. None of them are made substantially at the local level. But every time the province decides that there is going to be an increase in GWA, we carry 20% of the can. Every extra dollar that goes out in GWA is 30 cents yours, 50 cents the feds' and 20% ours. So you people are making decisions that are costing us a tremendous amount of money. That is our basic problem with GWA.

We do not object to enhancements to the program. We do not for a moment question the idea that there has to be a net for people to fall into when they get outside the normal income stream, but we think that if we are not going to have the authority to make any of the decisions and all those decisions are going to be made at the provincial level, that has to become a provincial program 100% provincially funded.

Mr Sutherland: I can certainly understand the concern over the welfare issues. I just wonder if we can get a little more specific about some of the other programs, because we have had several groups here who have come and requested funding but they also talked about community standards and reflecting the needs of specific communities. I get a sense that it is very difficult to have all strictly provincially run programs and then be able to meet those community standards. I was wondering if you could comment on that process in relation to some of the things Mr Hopcroft was saying about disentanglement.

Mr Harrison: Let me say maybe to begin with, it is not the position of our association, and I do not think it is the position of the municipal sector generally, that the province should take over all these funding responsibilities and somehow give us a windfall. Whenever we have spoken to the government, we have always acknowledged the fact that if the province is going to take over a funding responsibility, for example like GWA, we have to find a way to have a mirror transfer back to the municipal sector of a funding responsibility.

The first time I spoke to the Premier and the first time I spoke to the Treasurer, the first thing I said to them was, "We are not here for a cheque; we are here to find a way to disentangle our relationship so that you pay for your programs and we pay for our programs and the net effect is a zero-sum balance."

Let's look at some local programs, for example. Local roads is an issue that might well be transferred back to the local level; policing, to a certain extent; provision of sewer and water facilities; perhaps local public health. There are all sorts of them.

Mr Hopcroft is better at this than I. Grant, give me a couple more that we might be willing to take on further responsibility for.

Mr Hopcroft: I think looking at perhaps a broad policy framework, generally our position has been that if it is an income support program that has as its goal redistribution of income to the less advantaged in our society, that should be a provincial responsibility in terms of funding from the provincial, and to a lesser extent from the federal, income tax under the Canada assistance plan.

We would like to see more responsibility, and of course it goes with it that we would be prepared to pay in those areas where there is not an overriding provincial interest to ensure consistency across the province. It really should not be a matter for the province to dictate to municipalities the standard for a local street that may have 8 or 10 houses on it. We certainly understand that there is a provincial interest in ensuring that provincial highways and major roads between municipalities and between areas of municipalities are maintained to a certain standard that the public can come to expect and rely on with some degree of assurance. I do not think we want to pin down at this point any firm positions, other than trying to come to something within those broad policy guidelines.

Mr Sutherland: Is there a set percentage figure increase that you think the majority of your members are looking for or feel would be comfortable to kind of start turning the tide this year?

Mr Hopcroft: I think in terms of the unconditional transfers we are looking for at least a minimum equal to the rate of inflation. As I had indicated, we are expecting an inflation rate of somewhere between 5% and 6%. I think municipalities, on the unconditional side, are looking at that type of transfer. On the conditional side, obviously the costs of various programs have gone up more than others. We are obviously pleased to see the movement that has been indicated already in terms of the province picking up the additional cost to the welfare rate increase over the 5%. That is certainly a welcome sign. It obviously still does not go anywhere close to the 100% provincial funding that we would be looking at.

We really feel that the province should recognize, as has been referred to already, the fact that many municipal budgets have been severely impacted by increases well above the rate of inflation, and in fact well above the astronomical increases that many of us budgeted for last year. When our welfare and social services people came to us a year ago and said, "We're budgeting 35%, 45% increases in this program area," we figured, "Gee, we hope it does not go this high," and in fact in some cases it has almost been double that. It has been a real strain and municipalities have had to cut a lot of local programs to meet those kind of expenditures.

Mr Harrison: One thing that I guess we should say in regard to that as well is that the committee has to keep in mind that we statutorily cannot deficit finance. We cannot deficit finance our operating, so when we run a deficit in a program area like GWA, we either have to cut that money out in that year from some other program that we decided to do, or alternatively we are faced in the next budget year with, "The first thing we have to do is cover that deficit." So we have municipalities where the first thing they are going to have to do in 1991, before they even consider maintaining the same level of service, is pick up a deficit that was generated in 1990 by the overruns in GWA.

The province, of course, is not in that position. If your Treasurer unfortunately has a deficit, it just gets capitalized and you do not have to automatically pick up that amount of money in the next fiscal year.

Mr Hopcroft: We are certainly not recommending that municipalities be given that option.

Mr Harrison: No. We are just pointing out that it is really a double whammy when something like this does happen.

Mr Phillips: You answered part of my question, which is, as we look at just the short-term—in the next few weeks I guess you will be getting your grant announcements—and the way we should think about them, is inflation on the unconditional and something that reflects your cost increase on the others? My question for the longer term is, I would not mind from AMO something you have not touched on, and that is just how municipalities are seeing the economy, just to give us any advice in terms of another perspective on the economy.

Interjection.

Mr Phillips: Let me just finish. You were here earlier. I think you heard that we have heard from the professional forecasters that things look relatively good over the short term.

The second one is just a comment. I think the debate that the province will have with municipalities will be interesting just in terms of devolution and not unlike the debate, in a different way, that is going to occur nationally, which is responsibilities and those sorts of things in a different sense, but it will be a very worthwhile debate that has begun now and that we will simply look forward to over the next few years. I got my answer on the grants, but can you give us any advice on how municipalities are seeing things?

Mr Richards: I think you should know up front that municipalities do not have the macroeconomic economists that—

Mr Phillips: You have had enough of them.

Mr Richards: We just see what we see. We see housing starts down. We see literally riots at some of Peel's welfare assistance offices. We have had police there now most days just to keep order. We see revenues from building starts down. I am talking from the perspective of a municipality that most of you would think is rich, being the region of Peel. We know we are in a recession. We are on the front lines. My staff know we are in a recession. We have two staff in charge of shutting off people's water for lack of payment and they are working around the clock.

Mr Phillips: That is amazing to me.

Mr Richards: In terms of what is down the road, I know of what I read, and I deal daily with all the Bay Street firms. We are in a recession and it is going to get a little bit worse before it gets better. We are hoping for a pullout of this thing by the end of 1991, but we are really battenning down the hatches. The sad point is, as has been discussed, we are trying to deliver a budget that is going to come in at 4%, 5% for our taxpayers. We are starting at 4% because of welfare, so it is well nigh impossible for us to give the taxpayers what they want because of factors we cannot control. In one of the richer municipalities in this province, we have a 4% tax rate, before we start, just for welfare.

Mr Phillips: That is the increase in the mill rate, not expenditures.

Mr Richards: That is the increase in the mill rate. That is the little thing you get in the mail. You open it up and you say, "Holy cow, the region of Peel did it," and we cannot put a videotape in there saying, "We didn't do it. Look somewhere else."

Mr Phillips: You put all the words in there; you just do not put the video in.

Mr Richards: People do not read it. They pick all the words, put it in the garbage, and they see the name and they start to yell. Municipal politicians are going to lose their jobs for things they cannot control.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in some of the list that you indicated could be turned over to municipalities completely. You included water and sewer in that list, which is kind of found surprising, and left the whole waste management area, which perhaps has been taken over by the Minister of the Environment, or perhaps has not. But in many ways you are talking about longer-term funding matters. I was interested in your questions or proposals that there be changes in the ability of municipalities in the investing and borrowing area. I wonder if you could tell us, first of all, in more detail where you see some of those changes and second, what level of borrowing are municipalities at now. Are they at pretty close to the 20% that they are allowed under the Ontario Municipal Board?

Mr Richards: It varies. If you read budget paper E a couple of years ago, we could buy small countries out with our debt capacity. If you look at individual municipalities episodically, there are some that are right up against it and should not be borrowing any more. There are some very large ones that are doing very well debtwise; however re is a tradeoff. You may have very low debt but very high taxes because you choose to charge taxes as opposed to borrowing, and I have heard some provincial staff try to download capacity or the level of reserves as ammunition for not helping, but you have to look at the entire picture plus what is coming down the road.

To use an example close to home, the region of Peel has about $100 million in its reserve just for waste. We do not know we have hundreds of millions of dollars coming down the road, so are we well off or not? You have to do it on a case-by-case basis. If you do all the aggregates, we will probably be better off than the province of Ontario in terms of debt capacity. Our tax rates, though, are outstripping yours annually, so it depends on where you look and whose ox is being gored.

Mrs Sullivan: You have not mentioned in your paper who pays in terms of waste management and the very serious problems that are coming forward in terms of recycling programs and the other two Rs. Where do you see that moving?

Mr Harrison: As an association, and as I talk to my friends in the municipal sector, I think that there is a commitment in the municipal sector—and some of these people may disagree with me—to be the lead agency in terms of waste management. We do not have a problem with the concept that waste management is a municipal responsibility and should be funded municipally. We are going to have to change, as municipalities, some of the ways we do it. We are going to have to have some help, certainly in the short term, in terms of our recycling programs. We have made representations in regard to ongoing provincial subsidization of the recycling programs, but fundamentally we are satisfied that waste management is a municipal responsibility.

Mr Hopcroft: Residential, and we do not want to get into hazardous wastes. We recognize that is something that needs to be co-ordinated on a provincial basis. I guess if I can add one thing it is that if we are to have that responsibility, there really needs to be some substantive change to the way that waste management is handled and there is an overriding need for the province to be involved in terms of regulations regarding things as simple as packaging to ensure that in fact we do not have excessive waste going into municipal waste management systems.

We also would, I think, state very strongly, for those areas that we do have an interest in, that we not be left out of the negotiations as we have so many times in the past between the province and the industrial sector. The recycling cost-sharing formula which is in place right now we feel is a perfect example where a deal was made that was not to the benefit, long term or short term, of municipalities and really did not have polluters paying the costs that they should.

Mrs Sullivan: So for this fiscal year, you have not included it in here, but in fact you will be seeking funding to assist in the implementation of existing and future recycling programs.

Mr Harrison: The existing system is that for start-up recycling programs the capital costs are borne one third by the municipality and one third by the private sector and one third by the province. The operating costs in the first year are 50% provincial, 50% municipal, and decreasing over five years to being entirely municipal. Our position is that we should have a new regime whereby any net operating loss in a recycling program should be borne one third provincially, one third private sector and one third municipal.

Mr Christopherson: I have no questions really. Having spent five years on city and regional council and being a former colleague of the presenters, I am clear on the issues. I am clear on the position of AMO. Just a statement, though, if I could to acknowledge how focused and clear the report is. I think in particular the members on this side of the committee room, if you will, are impressed with the fact that it is not just a question of laying out a whole host of demand items with a price tag on it. Certainly there are many groups that are doing just that, and justified in their own right, but I think there is more that needs to be done between municipalities and the provincial government and I think they may have gotten lost in that kind of firestorm, if I can use that term.

In addition to the new economic relationship which a lot of us made as part of our election campaign and are hoping to see instituted as part of the new government, is also a commitment to the relationship itself. I was at that first-ever emergency meeting as a delegate on behalf of Hamilton to talk about what was going on provincially and municipally at the time of the transfer of the police out of the courtrooms, all the taxes that were suddenly being dumped on. I think that is when we kind of reached the limit.

I think that you have offered up a document that helps set the stage. I know that your private discussions with ministers and members of the cabinet are going very well and they are being very well received. I think you are feeling that too in their response to you.

As one member of this committee and as the assistant to the Treasurer, as well as a former colleague, I suggest to you that I think you have made an excellent first formal step today in your presentation. You have outlined the issues and I hope that by the end of our term in office you feel that we have been able to effect the kind of changes that you are looking for, which I quite frankly think are necessary if we are going to have a proper positive future, especially in light of some of the other relationship problems that we have within Canada right now. Thank you very much for your presentation, for your brief.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for your presentation.

Mr Harrison: Thank you.

CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
ONTARIO DIVISION

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Ontario division, Eric G. Owen, director of taxation; John Marczynski, director of taxation, Stelco; John Carlos, director of taxation, Du Pont. Thank you for coming this afternoon. We are trying to stick to our time limit today, half an hour for presentation and questions, if you would begin, please.

Mr Owen: It is a pleasure to appear before this committee to outline CMA Ontario's pre-budget submission to the Treasurer of Ontario, and copies have been provided. With me today are John Marczynski, who is with Stelco. He is the taxation chairman of CMA Ontario. He is on my left. John Carlos is the director of taxation, Du Pont Canada.

To start, I would like to point out that CMA Ontario represents approximately two thirds of the total national CMA membership and our members account for about 75% of the total manufacturing output in this province of Ontario.

The importance of the manufacturing sector in Ontario is reflected in the fact that manufacturers provide approximately 35% of direct and indirect jobs in Ontario. The manufacturing spectrum which we represent includes, among others, transportation equipment, food, chemical, electrical and electronic products, primary metals, paper products, machinery and equipment, printing and a variety of consumer goods. Manufacturing, as I am trying to offer to you, is big business in Ontario.

I would like to turn the microphone over to Mr Marczynski, who can outline for you what is in the the CMA's pre-budget submission.

Mr Marczynski: I would like to make a statement. Ontario manufacturers are facing the 1990s with the recognition that this decade will bring the toughest competition they have ever faced. We mean that. The globalization of world trade and manufacturing, the harmonization of the European trading system, combined with rapid technological change and product/process innovation will challenge manufacturers to adapt to changing markets. How Ontario manufacturers perform over this coming decade will significantly determine the province's future employment prospects and standard of living.

While the manufacturing sector has shown great strength over the latter half of the 1980s, Ontario's relative competitiveness has declined over this period, and in particular since 1986. There have been many articles, papers and studies performed in this area by more capable and knowledgeable professionals than us who have overwhelmingly concluded the same. This fact is based on Ontario's rapidly increasing tax burden, increasing government intervention in all areas of business affairs, and the punitively high cost of capital that is determined both by high interest rates and the worsening tax treatment of capital investments in Canada and in Ontario.

For example, since the mid-1980s the deduction for new capital investment in Ontario manufacturing has moved from a significant competitive advantage to a small disadvantage when compared with an equivalent US manufacturer. Let me just point something out: Years ago manufacturers, prior to stage 1 of federal tax reform, could write their equipment off in two or three years. That has been moved to roughly 12 years, so you do not need a computer to figure out the big edge we have lost.

It is recognized that the policy initiative of the Ontario government by itself has not created this situation, nor will it correct it alone. However, reversing these damaging trends and reviving Ontario's relative competitiveness is essential to maintaining a strong manufacturing base. While the free trade agreement has opened new markets in which we can effectively compete, the removal of trade barriers and tariffs has resulted in investment strategies focusing more attention on the costs imposed by the relative tax systems on the manufacturing sector and the impact it has on the return on investment capital.

Ontario manufacturers have demonstrated in the past that they can compete and capture effectively both domestic and export customers. However, the ability to continue to be successful is in question since the proportion of tax from the manufacturing sector has increased at a greater pace since 1980 than increases in their profits. This has resulted in a significant drag on Ontario manufacturing ability to fund new technology, plants and business systems in order to even hold on to existing customers.

Ontario manufacturers challenge the government to adopt the goal of and be a leader in making Ontario one of the most competitive and attractive investment destinations in North America. Pursuing this objective requires placing a much higher priority on the competitive impact of all current and future legislation. Ontario manufacturers will take the leading role in creating a more aggressive export-oriented manufacturing sector. However, government policies must show a stronger commitment to the goal of competitiveness if a favourable climate for manufacturing investment and production is to exist through the 1990s.

We believe that the following recommendations, which we have made to the Treasurer of Ontario on Ontario taxation policy, will help build a stronger and more competitive manufacturing sector and will help promote sustained economic and employment growth in the 1990s. We made six major recommendations to the Treasurer and I would just like to read them into the record.

The first one was to delete the Ontario current cost adjustment sunset clause. It was a major piece of tax legislation that offset the damaging effects of federal tax reforms and that is set to expire at the end of 1991. We would like that sunset clause removed, so that we can continue investing in new capital with the support of the province and the taxpayers of this province. It is an investment in our manufacturing facilities. It is an investment in jobs. It should not be looked upon as an expenditure.

Mr Christopherson: That is 30%?

Mr Marczynski: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: It was 15% and went to 30%?

Mr Marczynski: Yes, that is right.

The second recommendation: The Ontario and federal governments should co-operate to ensure that they do not tax each others incentives.

Three, no introduction of new taxes or tax increases. There have been a lot of rumours about energy taxes, green taxes, carbon taxes, training taxes. We think there are other alternatives the government should be looking her than putting additional burdens on a sector that is bleeding right at this point in time.

The others are, ensure that the Fair Tax Commission has balanced representation, harmonize federal and provincial consumption taxes, and perform a competitive impact analysis on all legislation.

These are detailed in our submission. I would like to open it up now for your questions.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for the presentation. I will give you a personal opinion. I think this is going to be the issue of the 1990s, but I will give you another personal opinion: I do not think people realize it yet, so it is going to be very difficult for you to achieve your objectives, in my opinion, until the problem is clear. I think personally that the problem is just on the horizon, and for the country we are going to have to come to grips with it a very fundamental issue here. With all due respect to you, there are other groups that are able to make their case right now a lot better, but I am with you on it. I really think you are going to see this as a significant issue, but it is going to be challenging to move on it in the short-term, I suspect.

My questions really are these: One is that I have a perception that the economists do not share, that we may be seeing manufacturing leaving the province and the country at a significant rate. By the way, on the numbers you show of 70,000, I think if you look at the numbers at the end of December in manufacturing, it is 110,000. That's 11%, I think, of the manufacturing jobs gone over a 12-month period. The economists tell us: "That's just sort of natural attrition and what not. When the economy gets rolling, just tramp the accelerator and away it will go." I wonder if you can be of any help on whether the economists are right that this is the case or whether we are seeing significant manufacturing jobs leaving the province and the country.

My second one is, again the economists have told us that they think the end of the recession is not far off, a matter of months, some time in calendar 1991. I think all of us believe that, the Treasury and what not. What does the CMA or the CMA Ontario branch feel about that? I would appreciate your comments on it.

Mr Owen: I think it is a very interesting proposition that you have said about the misunderstanding of the importance of manufacturing in Canada and in Ontario in particular. We in Ontario look at manufacturing as the engine of growth. We look at manufacturing as the creation of wealth in Canada.

Mr Phillips: I agree with that.

Mr Owen: If, for example, you were solely to rely on services, it just will not happen, from the point of view that we will find there will be bleeding of our wealth into other areas and that we are not creating any further wealth in Canada.

This leads to the point, and it is one of the points John Marczynski did make about the competitive edge for manufacturers, that I would like it on the record at this time that we are not asking to be equal with anybody else; we want to be better than everybody else. What I mean by that is that we want to have a better competitive edge. Just making us equal is not good enough, because money flows where it is easiest, and if there is just one little edge, if the tax environment is equal and there is one little edge, you will find money will go where that little edge is. So we have to give Ontario manufacturers a better than even chance to actually respond to that.

Looking at manufacturers leaving, indeed you are quite right when you say that we have said the employment fell 70,000 in the 12 months ending in November 1990. We put this pre-budget submission to bed in time to get it to the Treasury—you must understand that—and we have recognized that there has been further attrition since that time.

Regarding manufacturing leaving the province, yes, I would say manufacturing is leaving the province. It is not solely, however, because of free trade. A lot of people like to point and say, "It's free trade."

Mr Phillips: I did not say that.

Mr Owen: I know you did not, but the thing is that you have to look at it very closely and see where the best rate of return can be expected, and that is the where money goes. I am not suggesting that we will find manufacturers will just up and leave the province. They have already a great investment in Ontario and as such it is fallacious to think that they will walk away from this. That will not happen. However, what we are looking at here is new investment, and this is the key to the whole equation.

Regarding the length of the recession, we do say here in the document 1991, but then from the point of view, you have to realize that manufacturers have been screaming the R word. According to Mr Wilson you do not say the R word, but the thing is that we have been screaming the R word for longer than it has been acknowledged by the federal government. We have been screaming the problems of manufacturers for more than two years.

Do any of my colleagues wish to make any comments?

Mr Marczynski: The R word: We may be starting to play with the D word in certain sectors of the manufacturing community. You see what has happened in the Sault and—

Mr Phillips: What sectors?

Mr Marczynski: Steel: There are really serious problems in that industry. We are not just talking about jobs moving south of the border; we are talking about companies going bankrupt, where nothing is going anywhere. That is what we are dealing with. And the recession for the manufacturing sector started much sooner than for the rest of the economy.

Mr Sutherland: My question is kind of picking up on Mr Phillips and talking about the significant changes that are going to be occurring in the next decade in manufacturing. I want to focus specifically on skills development. I know the CMA had some representation on the Premier's Council on skills development. I was wondering if you could give some comment as to where you think the specific focus should be going on that. It would seem to me that if we are going to have manufacturing rebounding, then the strong emphasis is going to have to go in that way.

I would appreciate maybe some short-term advice, whether you think there are any budget implications that way for this year and then over the longer term.

Mr Owen: Again, I recognize the importance of the question. I do not believe this group is oriented to industrial relations. Indeed, we do have a group that is looking at skills development. We in the manufacturing sector have been very very concerned over the years about the actual fall-off of skilled tradesmen in the manufacturing community. We do not wish to just have jobs where people go and press a button hour after hour. We are looking for enrichment. We are looking for the betterment of the standard of living for the manufacturing community. We do recognize that we are downscaling or downsizing in terms of job creation in manufacturing. However, this in large part relies upon technology advances and this type of thing.

What we want to do and what we are at this time doing, with the development of the Premier's Council, is that we have made comments on that. We also are looking at working with the federal government to create skills training programs. This is something that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is well into and we hope to have this on the road at least by the middle of this year. We hope that this will certainly encourage people in the schools, who will come out and recognize manufacturing as a viable career. This is one of the things we do believe it to be. I think that is the best I can say at this time.

Mr Christopherson: A couple of questions, if I can: One, the OCCA that was referred to, John, that you talked about—since you made your presentation and I got on the speakers' list, I have had a chance to read what is here. Maybe you could just expand on the reason here why you would like to see it extended, in the context that the initial reports I am hearing are that there was not quite the pickup on this that we had thought might happen. I realize you are suggesting that it might have been the time frame, that it is just not long enough for those kinds of decisions to kick in. I would like to hear that also for the record, because that is an area of discussion in the Treasury.

Mr Carlos: Maybe I could answer that for you. We are talking, number one, about new capital investment and this is where the Ontario current cost adjustment has its greatest impact. The capital expenditure would be of a duration, depending on the size, of three to four years, from the time a decision would be made to invest to the time we have our first piece of production.

Therefore, recognizing that time frame, if for example today I was going to make a decision to build a new fibres plant or if Stelco was going to build a new steel rolling mill, the investment would take quite some time. The impact of the OCCA, being sunsetted by the end of this year, would really have very little consequence on the investment decision. So if I had the opportunity to invest either in Hamilton or in Kingston versus, let's say, in Oklahoma or the state of New Jersey, I would therefore be competing with a similar kind of investment decision with other strategists, and they would be looking at their ability to depreciate or write off their investment and we would be looking at ours, and they would have that small advantage that John mentioned earlier, where at one time we had significant advantage.

What I am saying is, the sunset will have virtually no impact on major new investment if the Ontario current cost adjustment is sunsetted by the end of 1991.

Mr Marczynski: It is very important. The big project that companies get involved in do take that long. One of the problems we have here is that some business decisions have been made on the basis that the OCCA would be 30% for the future. There are some corporations that are very concerned right now that they have been sort of short-changed, because they have worked out the economics for their project on that assumption and we have changed the rules again midstream.

You have to go back to why it was put in in the first place, and that was basically to offset the removal of the fast write-offs at the federal level. That gave Canadian manufacturers a significant advantage over the US. Right now the US can write its equipment off in seven years. It probably takes us 10 to 12 under the new rules.

It was playing a very important role. You also have to realize we are going into a recession right now. I think one of the strategies with sunsetting it at the end of 1991 was to see if we can get businesses to dig into their pockets and spend in a hurry.

There is just no cash there right now. You pick up the paper every day and there is someone saying he is slashing his capital spending by 50% or eliminating it totally.

With due respect to the Treasurer of Ontario, I would suggest that strategy will not work right now. We need the plan in place during that period of recovery. That is going to take a number of years.

Mr Owen: If I could add one comment to that, I did note that you referred to it during the overview, that you asked the question, was it the 15% that went to 30%? Yes, that was indeed the OCCA that we are referring to.

However, you have to realize that it was only enacted into law this month under Bill 10. As such, a lot of corporations, especially the big, shall we say, mother corporations of the United States—because of the regime under which they work in the United States, and perhaps some of the Canadian companies—would be a little more aggressive, but the American companies would not move at all until that was actually in law.

What you have actually seen now is that we have not sunset clause on something that has been in place for three years; we have a sunset clause on something that was put in place as of January of this year and it is going out as of December this year. In other words, what we are talking about is a 12-month span. That perhaps is one of the reasons why the Treasurer did not see the impact of aggressive tax planning. The planning was going on, but the actual investment was not going on because until it is in place—we are very sceptical from the point of view; we do not have a lot of money—we have to direct it in those areas we think are the best areas. We can look along those lines.

Mr Marczynski: One thing I would also point out the problems in Quebec. They are really getting behind the manufacturing sector. They have a 100% write-off now on manufacturing equipment. When you get into manpower training. They are not talking about slapping taxes on employers. They are encouraging them to run training programs and have developed a refundable tax credit system here. They are also reviewing the provincial capital tax with a view of possibly eliminating it for manufacturers.

We have found former governments to be very supportive of manufacturers. When Allan MacEachen and others were hurting certain sectors of the manufacturing community, the former provincial treasurers were down here in Ottawa telling them they were going the wrong way. The OCCA was a message to the business community in Ontario that, "We support you, the federal government may not." It is important to realize what is going on in the world outside of Ontario and also to look at what manufacturers are doing in Japan and Europe. In some sectors they are spending at twice the rate that we are here. If that pace keeps up, we are going to be sliding in that you will not have a manufacturing sector, a strong one anyhow.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you. With your indulgence, Mr Chair, a quick question on the economy. Everybody is telling us they expect the dollar to be going down somewhat, and who knows how much, the same with interest rates, if that happens, nominally to the best-case scenario, but it does happen. However, if there is still a sense that there is a weak economy—perhaps the war is still under way; the American economy has not bottomed out—some people feel it has—do you think that would still be enough of a catalyst for the manufacturers to be pulling some projects or beginning to invest some of the money they are currently hanging on to?

Mr Owen: If they are currently hanging on, it is by their actual fingertips because what we are seeing, and we have reflected this in the submission, is that interest costs are really hurting badly. We find we had a 1981-82 recession and we were looking at leverage as being one of the big problems. People were going bankrupt all the time because of the high interest costs which were due and it was not dividends versus interest. We did see a great amount of restructuring since that time. However, it still is not as, shall we say, healthy as it was. There is still a lot of leverage out there. It is high impossible to get equity funds these days. People still have to go out and look for leverage funds.

Looking at the interest costs, according to our calculations, the costs now amount to 2.8% of total manufacturers' operating expenses, compared to 1.8% in the fourth quarter of 1987. That is very considerable. Also, looking at this from the point of view that this has reduced our profits and cash-flow and our ability to invest, we are hanging on by our fingertips along those lines.

The Canadian dollar, we again have reflected and referred to this in here, we do believe is now worth, in US dollars, about, 77 cents in terms of its true economic purchasing power. We look at this and we say if that is the case and it is only 77 cents, this is the equivalent of a 12% export tax or indeed for imports coming into the country, a 12% discount on imports coming into the country. I do not know any Canadian who manufactures imports coming into Canada. We have to look very, very closely at the jobs that are in Canada. We have to make sure our ability to compete with the exports in the global economy is there. We have to look at it very, very closely.

Mr Marczynski mentioned Quebec as being one of our major competitors. This is something we do not look at. Perhaps something that is not apparent right now is that Quebec has been the first Canadian province to harmonize its consumption taxes with the federal government. Where we in Ontario will be able to take back from a GST, for the point of manufacturing, seven percentage points, in 1982 Quebec will have a 15-point edge whereas we only have seven. This is a further eight-percentage-point widening. We cannot afford that; if we want the jobs to go to Quebec, that is fine, just stay where we are, but from the point of view of wanting to keep the jobs, which we do believe we want to keep the jobs in Ontario. We have a very good province of Ontario. Over the years we have had a very good life here. Let's keep this.

We challenge, in our paper here, the Ontario government to be a partner with us because this is something we do believe in. We believe what we are looking for is to align our resources, to look at manufacturing as the engine of growth—spend on offence. We as Canadians see this all the time. We see Canadians saying: "We are not very aggressive. Let's start being aggressive." These are some of the things that we are starting to do. Let's make governments competitive. These are the things we are looking at. We are looking at an environment in which interest rates are low, savings rates are high, government expenditures are in balance and the tax system makes industrial restructuring feasible and attractive. This is what we want. This is what we hope the new government of Ontario will really take to heart and that it will look at the jobs that can be created, the standard of living that not only can be maintained but also increased and take into consideration those people who are feeling the burden of the recession right now. It is bad out there. You do not have to tell us it is bad. We know it.

This is what we want to offset as well.

Ms M. Ward: I appreciate your comments about the interest rates and the exchange rate. That may be part of your answer to the question I am going to ask.

I was struck by two comments made a little time apart that sort of took me down memory lane to about 1987 or so. You were talking about manufacturing leaving the province and saying it is not all due to free trade. I appreciate it is not all due to free trade.

Then you mentioned that we might actually be in a depression in some areas; you mentioned steel. What I was remembering then was that the big selling feature of the free trade agreement when it first started to be talked about was the steel industry, that we had to have the free trade agreement to save the steel industry.

I am wondering if you can answer, what went wrong? What is the cause of the problem in the steel industry today?

Mr Marczynski: There are a number of problems that have nothing to do with the free trade agreement.

Ms M. Ward: It was supposed to save it. That is why I am asking the question.

Mr Marczynski: The US market is very important to our industry. Right now, because of the exchange rate, it is hard to access that market. You lose your edge right there.

The Americans have supported their industry quite well there. They have laundered them through the chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings. They have the concessions they need from their state and local governments, from their employees and they are very competitive right now. Unless the dollars drops in value, it is very difficult for our industry to access that market.

But just worldwide, globally, there is an excess supply of steel out there. The steel industry cannot get the price increases. Our costs keep going up. It is just a continual squeeze. That is the fundamental problem.

There is a glut of steel out there. There are a lot of Third World countries that have come on the scene building steel mills, not worrying about the economics of supply, demand, price and competition. They just subsidize them. They wanted a steel industry and they dumped all this steel into North America. That is the problem.

The free trade was going to help us maybe to access that market in the States that was very important to us.

Ms M. Ward: It was planned to be sort of a saviour, the dollar.

Mr Marczynski: Yes, the dollar is the big thing right now.

Mr Carlos: If I could add something from a personal perspective, this would be from a Dupont perspective. We made certain investment decisions anticipating the free trade agreement or something like it would come some day, and we were very successful in competing with other investment decisions around the world and put some investments in place. Now we are bearing the fruits of them. If you look at the numbers that are coming out the pot right now, even though many of our markets are very weak right now our strongest segment is in fact in exports. We have tremendous increases in our exports primarily to the US. That was because of investment decisions we made a number of years ago.

Now we want to be able to compete for the next series of investments. That is where the problem arises. As you look at the global pie for investment, we have to compete with everyone else out there. As the barriers to trade fall down and tariffs fall down and other things fall down, the strategists' focus goes right to the tax system and it becomes a very important, strategic aspect of the decision-making process.

The steel folk and the chemical folk have done very well competing with the best in the world in developing technology, converting technology into good-quality products, servicing our customers very well, but if a system keeps increasing and the bite of the fruits of labour are not piled back into plants, machinery, equipment and new technology we might as well just join the caravan going south.

Ms M. Ward: So you think we do not really have completely free access, there are some barriers.

Mr Marczynski: The whole problem there with Canadian steel producers trying to ship their products south—we had modernized our plants, we were very efficient, etc. The US steel industry was really bleeding in the 1980s. The fallout there was much more dramatic than what we experienced in the 1981-82 recession. There were massive plant shutdowns only because they did not stay world class like the Canadian steel industry. The Canadian steel industry did much better than the US in getting out of the recession, so the Americans got very protectionist and they wanted to put voluntary restraint agreements on the Canadian steel industry. We lobbied against those effectively. Washington agreed to exempt Canada from the voluntary restraint agreements but we needed the free trade agreement to help sort out some of the trade disputes to leave the door open for us to continue shipping into the States. What has taken over now are broader economic forces that are not necessarily determined here in Canada and Japan, but over the world. Why do we have the dollar where it is? Why are interest rates so high here? It is a very complicated thing we are dealing with.

The Chair: We are really running behind time. We could sort of wrap this up.

Mr Owen: May I make one comment, please, Mr Chairman. We are distressed about what is happening in Algoma, for example, no doubt at all about that. We do not want a live example of the efficacy or the primacy of manufacturing within the framework of a community. What we are saying is, and I have said this to Mr Christopherson, we are going to see downsizing within the manufacturing community. I did make that comment there.

However, what I have to say is that the service sector off from the manufacturing more than offsets some of the job losses within the framework of the manufacturing, and this is what we have to look at as the weak creator and as the service organizations which are clinging together with the manufacturing community. It is interdependence; it is not a dependence, it is an interdependence. I think Algoma, sad as this may seem, is going to show that the interdependence is there and not only will we lose the 7,000 jobs if Algoma does go, but you will find all of the other peripheral jobs for the service industry, the small retail stores and all this, belly up as well and that is a sad state of affairs. This, I do believe, shows the primacy and the wants of future wealth development within the manufacturing community.

The Chair: Okay, I think we should wrap up with that and any further questions maybe you could address later. Thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

TORONTO BOARD OF EDUCATION

The Chair: I would like to call on the Toronto Board of Education; Beare Weatherup, chair; Tam Goossen, vice-chair; Ann Vanstone, chair of the education finance committee, and Ron Trbovich, comptroller of finance.

Thank you for coming. Again, we would like to try to stick as close to the half-hour presentation time as we can. Now the onus of responsibility for that is on the committee members as it is on you to give expedited answers. All right?

Mr Weatherup: We do appreciate the opportunity to present our views to the standing committee here in respect of the forthcoming budget of the Ontario government. It is safe to say that our board and our ratepayers are very optimistic because during the provincial election campaign we know very well the New Democrats were lying—

Interjections.

Mr Weatherup: Well, we still like it. They said: "New Democrats propose raising the provincial share of education costs to 60% over five years, providing a solid base for a better education system and lifting some of the load off property taxes. The cost of this initiative over the next two years would be $1.5 billion."

Premier Bob Rae in his 30 August 1990 response to the chair of the Metropolitan Toronto School Board, in response to a questionnaire we sent him, said, "New Democrats would seek to restore Metro's funding to at least the 1981 level of 21%." He added that: "An NDP government could increase the per-pupil grants. Given that 90% of the public school boards spent more than the ceilings set by the provincial government, New Democrats believe that it is time to establish more realistic ceilings."

During the election campaign, Premier Bob spoke about a number of other issues, the most important of which was the question of integrity. We feel that the Toronto Board of Education and its ratepayers expect the premier and his government to keep that promise and allow time for a full consultation with the educational community.

In taking this position, we acknowledge that the provincial government is faced with an unforeseen deficit, a deepening recession and the resulting increased public expenditures such as welfare and falling provincial revenues because of increased unemployment. Given this reality, we expect the Treasurer to set a budget that is fiscally responsible while at the same time addressing the needs of those most directly affected by the recession.

As school trustees, we will also be prudent in setting our budget, being mindful that many of our property taxpayers are also facing harsh economic circumstances. In fact, I was at a meeting this morning where a young Portuguese student, who is 15, was requesting permission to leave school. Her father was unemployed, they face a combined mortgage bill and tax bill of $3,000 a month. There was nothing I could do. We wanted to keep her in school but she felt her duty towards the family was to go out and work.

I think that when you have to go through that on a regular basis, you realize the pressure the property tax puts on people, and it does not measure their ability to pay. We do have a concern and we are sure you are concerned when you look at the budget.

Ms Vanstone: In November 1989 the then Treasurer of Ontario announced an 8.7% increase or $363 million more in operating grants to school boards for 1991. That announcement was very short on specifics and for good reason. The Treasurer knew that the transfer payment was inadequate and the school boards across the province would be expected to increase their mill rates on average by 12%, and school boards did so in response to the limited or no funding for inflation, enrolment growth, the employer health care tax, pay equity and other costly provincially mandated initiatives. You have heard school boards complaining about this for the last little while.

The Ontario Public School Boards' Association has stated that Ontario school boards need at least an 11% increase in operating grants from the provincial government, or $500 million more in 1991. Anything less will surely result in a third straight year of double-digit mill rate increases across Ontario.

Education cost escalation factors are well known. Province-wide enrolment will increase by 1.9%, necessitating the hiring of more teachers. Average teacher contract settlements are approximately 6.3%. Inflation is in the order of 4.5%. The federal goods and services tax will increase school boards' expenditures by 1.2%. Increased immigration will increase English-language instruction costs, which will likely rise to more than $55 million. Pay equity calls for a rise substantially over the next two years, including the appropriate funding of internal equity issues. All of these factors and more will apply in the trustees' consideration of the Toronto Board of Education's budget.

For example, each year Metropolitan Toronto receives nearly 25% of all immigrants who choose Canada as their new home. Many of these families and their children become part of our school communities in the city of Toronto. The cost in teachers' salaries alone to deliver English-as-a-second-language programs is in excess of $20 million a year. As immigration accelerates in response to federal initiatives, these costs will continue to rise dramatically. Without federal and provincial support, Toronto property taxpayers will continue to fund these extraordinary costs.

When the 1991-92 transfer payment announcement is finally made, we expect the Treasurer of Ontario and the Minister of Education to fully disclose the impact of the increase in operating grants on school board mill rates. In the interests of public accountability and integrity, it is the least we can expect from the provincial government.

In the past two years, the province has contributed less than three fifths of 1% to the Metropolitan Toronto School Board's budget. Metro's budget in 1990 amounted to approximately $1.9 billion. The Toronto board's share of that budget was $516 million. Last year, the Toronto board held its mill rate increase to 10.8%—the provincial average was 12%—but only after significantly cutting its operating and capital budgets. It is likely for 1991 that Metropolitan Toronto public school boards will again receive no financial operating grants or capital grants. In other words, the entire cost of public education in Metropolitan Toronto will continue to be borne by the property taxpayers of its eight public school boards.

It is the position of the Toronto Board of Education that the province has forced it to rely upon the property tax as the sole source of revenue to fund its educational programs and services. This provincial action discriminates against the public school taxpayers of Toronto. It is unfair. We agree with the new government that the general legislative grant formula is broken. It was never intended that the cost of education should be solely borne by property taxpayers. The funding of education requires a major overhaul.

Toronto taxpayers have contributed hundreds of millions of dollars to the province's consolidated revenue fund in the form of consumption and income taxes. The province has a duty to return some of these taxes to Toronto's public education system in the form of operating and capital grants, and through a mechanism that provides direct relief to property taxpayers.

It is recognized that meaningful reform of the education finance system will take time, effort, consultation and support. The Toronto Board of Education is fully committed to this effort and wishes to participate fully with the province by contributing its ideas and expertise. In the interim, the Toronto Board of Education must deal with its property tax system, which is undergoing a number of developments and which is beset with serious problems.

Ms Goossen: The Metropolitan Toronto School Board has the largest tax base of any school board in Ontario. Relatively speaking, we are commercial-assessment rich. To a limited extent, this allows the MTSB to have the highest per-pupil expenditure in all of Ontario. So it should surprise no one that the Toronto public education system is considered one of the very best urban education systems in all of North America.

Toronto's public education system has many achievements. For example: pioneered the benchmarks program that documents a student's progress to parents; a leader in curriculum development in respect of race relations, drug and AIDS education and other program areas; initiated junior kindergarten and full-day senior kindergarten programs; pilot project on destreaming; started heritage language and ESL programs; initiated day cares in schools; developed a successful special education program; introduced inner-city programs; maintains high standards for schools that are safe, clean, healthy learning environments; developed alternative schools and programs throughout the system to meet the individual needs of our students.

We are very proud of the achievements of our students and teachers, but it should be made very clear that a quality education system comes at a price. In this regard, every expenditure of the Toronto board is geared to achieving excellence in the classroom to graduate students who are critical thinkers, lifelong learners and major contributors to the social, economic and political fabric of this province.

In order to sustain our programs and achieve these results, we must be assured of an appropriate level of funding. We have grave concerns about our property tax base, our only source of funding. Toronto's property tax base not grown at the same rate as the provincial average of to 4% for the past few years. To illustrate that, between years 1986 and 1990 the growth varies from a low of 1.2% to a high of 2.8%, and in 1990-91 the growth was 0

1510

While new assessment dollars have been added to tax rolls, these increases have been eroded through loss in commercial and industrial assessment appeals. Residential property taxpayers in Toronto have had to bear increased taxes that otherwise would have been borne by corporate ratepayers who successfully appealed their assessments. In any event, real growth in Toronto's property tax base has been less than the provincial average, and our residential ratepayers have been hard hit as a result. It is interesting to note that, with coterminous pooling, Metropolitan Roman Catholic Separate School Board's assessment base grew by 6% in 1989-90 and 9.8% in 1990-91.

Beyond this, our property tax system is riddled with inequities. For example, property taxes on rental apartments range from three times to six times the average burden on single-family homes. Commercial and industrial properties are assessed at a lower rate of market value than apartments. The bottom line is that property taxes on apartments are passed directly through to tenants as part of their rents. It is a hidden and unfair form of taxation.

Metropolitan Toronto council's market-value-based assessment scheme is scheduled for implementation in 1993. In the Toronto Board of Education's view, the scheme is badly flawed and will further exacerbate inequities within and between property classes. The Toronto Board requests that the Ontario government take no steps to implement Metropolitan Toronto council's reassessment scheme, but instead that it be referred to the Fair Tax Commission for study, along with other proposals to reform property taxation in Metropolitan Toronto.

This recommendation is premised on the legitimate assumption that public education will have a representative on the commission. It should be noted that the Toronto Board of Education has the largest stake in the property tax base, whereby education costs account for more than 50% of the property tax bill levied in the city of Toronto. This represents the fact that our board has not been consulted by Metropolitan Toronto council nor the province in the development of our property tax system. We expect that to change.

The Toronto Board of Education is very concerned about the number of successful appeals of the property assessments of large corporations. These corporations are able to afford to hire expert consultants and lawyers to reduce their property tax contributions. These successful appeals over the last dozen years have had the effect of reducing the overall tax burden of the commercial property tax base and shifting the taxes forgone through successful appeals to all other ratepayers.

This trend must be stopped, indeed reversed. For the first time, the Toronto Board of Education has appealed the property assessments of ten large commercial enterprises in the city of Toronto as being assessed too low. We intend prosecute these appeals to restore their assessments to levels where these corporate property owners are paying their fair share. The SkyDome, the Toronto Star building, the Eaton Centre, the Toronto-Dominion Bank towers, the 100 St. Canadian Place and the Dufferin Mall are some of the properties whose assessments we have appealed.

As well, the Toronto Board of Education views with concern the property tax burden on low- and moderate-income families, seniors and other people on fixed incomes.

The province provides two measures to help offset the burden of property taxes on these groups: the Ontario tax credits claimable as part of the federal income tax return and Ontario's property tax grant for seniors. Since the previous government took office, the Treasurer had not adjusted the Ontario tax credit provision to reflect the increasing magnitude of the property tax in personal budgets. While the Ontario property tax grant for seniors has increased in 1985 from $500 to $600, today this amount is woefully inadequate.

The Toronto Board of Education strongly recommends that this Treasurer increase to realistic levels, without delay, the Ontario tax credits and grants for seniors and low- and moderate-income families.

Mr Weatherup: In an article in the Globe and Mail, January 1991, the Minister of Education indicated "that the government wants to find a way of controlling discretionary spending by local school boards as part of its move to 60% funding. 'The government must be sure that we have some control over our costs. We can't be saying that we'll go ahead and increase up to any amount that they decide to spend.'"

The Toronto Board of Education is concerned that in moving the province's rate of support for the cost of education from its current level of 41.7% to 60%, the government may attempt to introduce two measures that will significantly undermine a local board's autonomy. One such measure is the imposition of province-wide expenditure controls. A second one is likely some form of province-wide pooling of corporate assessment.

Expenditure controls were imposed in the early 1970s and did not work. They were crude instruments, insensitive to local conditions and needs. Similarly, pooling corporate assessment and redistributing it among the assessment-poor boards in the name of achieving 60% provincial rate of support is a sham similar to that now imposed by Premier Vander Zalm in British Columbia. Corporate property taxes are local taxes and should remain with local municipalities and school boards. By reducing a school board's access to its local tax base, local autonomy and accountability are severely compromised. Beyond this, the quality of education programs in Toronto and its ability to be innovative will be seriously eroded.

In pursuing a fair education finance system, we should be seeking new solutions. There is sufficient evidence that the old ideas of draconian proportions, such as expenditure controls and pooling, do not work. We must first agree on the fundamental principles and objectives of an ideal education funding system before attaching ourselves to those outdated ideas.

Ms Vanstone: The next section is on capital needs of our school board. You will note at the top of page 8 a list of projects that will be coming up in the next few years. It is usually considered that the city of Toronto is a fully developed city. In the last several years, most capital programs have gone to Scarborough, which has been a growth board, and most of Metro's capital dollars have gone that way.

You will note under "A" a list of new developments in the downtown Toronto core. I would point out, although it is not pointed out here, to give you some idea of the scope, we are creating in downtown Toronto a community the size of Barrie. Barrie has 14 elementary schools and several secondary schools. Those are just new developments.

The board has also defined substantial accommodation requirements in various schools across the system which at a minimum will require 117 rooms by 1994. These are critical needs. Average annual requirement over the next four years, $5 million.

All-day kindergarten: That was an announcement by the province a couple of years ago. We knew we did not have room. However, we have done an assessment of it now and you will see we have identified a requirement for 133 classrooms. If we do not do the all-day kindergartens until 1994, the number of classrooms would increase to 200. In a three-year phase-in period, $33 million.

Child care: A 1989-90 evaluation of the child care facilities has identified 16 elementary and 19 secondary schools which do not provide child care. Bill 30, which may receive royal assent in 1991, would permit boards to provide child care facilities, presumably out of property taxes as well. For an initial phase, it is proposed that schools without child care facilities introduce this program over a two-year period at an annual cost of approximately $9 million. In addition, there are 80 child care facilities presently located in substandard spaces—for example, basements, play spaces and storage areas—which should be relocated. If this was addressed over a five-year period, the annual cost would be $8 million.

School sites: In order to address the number of spaces required, it is estimated that approximately 50 acres will be required. This is estimated at $325 million, and if a 10-year program of land acquisition was contemplated, this would require $32.5 million a year.

Our buildings are very old in the city of Toronto. That is becoming the case in all of Metropolitan Toronto. A modest renovation/replacement program would include a complete replacement every 100 years, together with major renovations every 35 years and minor renovations every 20 years, at a cost of $19.5 million, $12.3 million and $3.9 million. Therefore, the total annual requirement for this item would be $35.7 million. This would not address the current backlog, estimated at $240 million. To address this backlog, a yearly requirement is estimated at $6.8 million.

If both of the above programs were introduced, the requirement identified to the board in 1988 for additional funding for maintenance needs would be addressed, that is, $6 million annually. It will also address the funding currently identified in the Metropolitan Toronto School Board capital building program of roof restructuring and thermal upgrade under the category "advanced renovations."

Building codes and safety standards: For the past few years, projects such as fire safety improvements and barrier-free access have been identified on the Metropolitan Toronto School Board capital program with a requirement of approximately $3.5 million. It is proposed to continue these initiatives, with an average yearly requirement of $3.5 million.

The annual capital requirement for the next two years is $180.1 million, declining slightly thereafter for the next eight years. The total capital program for required pupil places is $968 million, together with an ongoing need of $46 million annually for renovation, replacement and building code and safety standards.

Mr Weatherup: In conclusion, the public education system of this province is the only system charged with providing universally accessible educational opportunities for all learners, regardless of their ethnic, racial or cultural backgrounds, social or economic status, age, individual exceptionality or religious preference. This mandate is crucial in a democratic society. This mandate requires special recognition for public education within the province's education funding scheme. The government must understand that it cannot separate the question of financing education from the issue of quality programs without destroying the very fabric of our public education system.

Since 1975, we have seen an annual decline in the province's rate of financial support for public education in Metropolitan Toronto. For too long, the local boards, the local property taxpayers and parents have quietly worried about this trend. The Toronto Board of Education will work with the province in developing a new funding model for education. In this challenge, we will be open-minded and responsive to new ideas. We will participate in the consultative process and press for positive changes. We will always keep foremost the ultimate purpose of this exercise: to meet the individual needs of all our learners.

The Chair: Thank you. I have a question from Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the brief. It is carefully crafted. As I have said to other education groups, I am very familiar with this because I was hounded during the campaign. These promises were made and I think they resulted in the election of several provincial members and therefore the defeat of others. I see Mr Silipo, who is probably very anxiously awaiting the announcement of the general legislative grants and what not, particularly given the year that it is, with the election coming up and things like that.

My question really, I guess, is two- or three-fold. Yesterday there was a group here and there was a Metro trustee here actually, speaking—

Ms Vanstone: It must have been the Ontario Public School Boards' Association.

Mr Phillips: Yes. I will ask all my questions, because the Chairman normally only allows one question. I will try to get all my questions—a multifaceted question. One is the 21% to the Metro public board. I am interested that you do not, in your brief, expect a lot of progress to be made this year in that. I am just wondering what the expectation of the Toronto board is of the timetable for getting to the 21% for the Metro board.

The second thing is that the minister was here the other day announcing that the 60% funding that they are going to move to will include capital and teachers' pensions. She announced that that is the platform she ran on in the election. That was a totally different definition than the debate I have had with my colleagues, or my opposition. I am just wondering what the Toronto board's interpretation has been, because as I say, that will come as quite a surprise to the teachers and the taxpayers, who were expecting some significant changes.

I guess the last question is just, I appreciate your comment here on ceilings, because that was the third kind of surprise to me, that it would be 60% of something the minister determined as opposed to 60% of what the school board would say.

Just in closing, in case I do not get a chance to say it, I have said this many times publicly. The city of Toronto school board has really made a major contribution educationally in Canada. There is no question of that, in my opinion. I think I have said that perhaps to certain of you. If you look at the accomplishments of the Toronto school board, it is an innovative board, it has some courage, and it has had for at least 20 years that I am familiar with. So I wanted to compliment the board again when I have the chance to do so publicly, because I think it has historical and continues to do a first-class job. But maybe you will return to those questions, Mr Chairman.

Mr Weatherup: Okay, I will try to answer the first part. I guess the 21% and the 60% are linked because, to some extent, we have used those numbers to get to what we want, more of a process we want to get to, and that is until you decide what the fundamental principles and objectives of the school system are and what you want to do. It is very difficult to set. We argue around programs, but what I would say, you have to set—and in our brief, I think it is on page 9, we talk about what the fundamental principles and objectives of the education system are. After you do that, then you can set grant ceilings that vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

Clearly in Toronto, where you have a big inner-city population and an ESL population, you might have a different ceiling than you would have in another jurisdiction where they might not have those needs, or have different needs. So there is a sort of a process.

Then you go into the grant ceilings and after that you can get into the percentages question. But I think the goal and this is certainly the direction we are asking the province to go in, is to look at those things, because we are interested in the British Columbia solution where Premier Vander Zalm said: "Yes, we'll give you 60%. We'll simply take away all your commercial assessment and we are going to give it back to you." We are not particularly interested in getting back what we already have, when in fact our arguments are that the province should be looking at the entire system of education funding when it looks at that and then get to setting realistic grant ceilings.

The question of whether it should be 21% of 60% or % or 62% is very difficult to comment on, as long as these sorts of principles that I have talked about are taken into account.

Ms Vanstone: Yes. Picking up on that, I would agree. Whenever you say 60%, it begs the question, "Sixty per cent of what?" Twenty-one per cent begs the question, "Twenty-one per cent of what?" Every group that has lost funding of education—and you certainly know, Gerry—the last many years has said there has to be a realistic appraisal of the ceilings or indeed what should be included in the costs of education in the province of Ontario. Certainly, as Beare says, the costs are very different. In Red Lake, the school boards need to have teacherages and that happens throughout the north. We do not need that in the city of Toronto, but with a large multicultural population we have to operate heritage language programs.

So the needs differ and the kind of ceilings that are envisaged have to be site-specific, if you like. I was surprised as well to see the minister's comment about 60% including capital and teachers' pensions. At least with the former government it was only future pensions that were suddenly lumped in with the operating costs. Now we have capital in there as well.

When the government did reach a high of funding that I believe was 61%, not 60%, and it was before I was in this business except as a parent, it was operating. It did not include capital and it did not include teachers' pensions. It was 60% of operating, so if one is going to go back to the 1940s or even think about it, he has to be comparing apples with apples, not apples with oranges. We started changing the apple into something else a year ago and now it seems to be changing even further into a completely different fruit.

Mr Phillips: I want to just comment on the answer.

The Chair: Excuse me. We have four more presentations and they are all half an hour.

Mr Phillips: I do not think there is any way that you will get away with it and I think in one sense you have to spell it out very clearly. It was extremely clear within your documents. You have the 41.7%, which did not include pensions, did not include capital, so it is going to be very tough, I think, if I can be completely honest with you, for the new government to argue anything different.

Mr B. Ward: But you are willing to work with us?

Mr Phillips: No. I am sensitive because the Premier was called a liar in the campaign.

The Chair: Excuse me. I am going to rule this out of order because this is not the time or place for politics. We have a lot of presentations to go and I would like to thank the presenters for coming and making this presentation.

Mr Weatherup: I would like to thank you for having us and we look forward to working with you.

ONTARIO ARTS COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Arts Council, Nalini Stewart, chair.

Ms Stewart: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I would like to first introduce the people I brought with me. I will start with Daryl Novak, director of administration; Norman Walford, executive director of the Ontario Arts Council, and my board member, Michael Rayner, a partner with Deloitte and Touche who is also a former Comptroller General of Canada. I mention that so that if you give us more money you can feel quite safe that it is in good hands.

Thank you very much for inviting us to do this. I do not think we have ever done this before—I certainly have not—so we are very pleased to be here. I have no formal brief, but we did give a short handout that I believe was given to all of you this morning. What I would like to do is just talk about the general arts environment and then leave lots of time for questions. I would also, before I start, like to thank all of you for the mention of the Ontario Arts Council in the throne speech, which was like a message of hope through the whole arts community, and I would also like to say how pleased we are with the NDP policy paper, Work of Art, which is a bit old. It was written in 1984, however we still agree with all the sentiments and I hope that you people will continue with that.

I talk about the arts environment today in 1991. The Ontario Arts Council is 27 years old. In 27 years, Ontario today has more than 50% of English-speaking artists right here in this 100-mile area around Toronto.

Our writers are on international best-seller lists all over the world. Our dancers are also considered the best all over the world. Seven, eight years ago, even five years ago, nobody saw our films, and starting about four years ago our films started winning awards in Berlin and at Cannes and we started being noticed. The National Film Board's shorts were always noticed, but our feature films have become also in the top league.

Our theatre is in the top league. I go to a lot of theatre and I saw one recently, King Lear, that had come from a top company in England. I had been to Stratford just the week before and seen Macbeth and I came back and I thought our company was really just as good. Mr Phillips has heard me say a lot of these things before, but I continue with this message because I believe in it so strongly. Because the best English-speaking artists are in Ontario, we can feel proud of what they are doing. The money that has been put by governments, in the past 27 years by the Ontario Arts Council and 30 years with the Canada Council, not one cent of that money has been wasted, because we have seen the results.

They have added value to our lives in so many other ways. They have certainly helped the economy because every time people go to an arts event, they go to a restaurant before, they take taxis and they hire baby-sitters or they pay parking, so it helps the economy.

Our artists are better educated. We have in our package here—it is not in that handout but it is a package here that we will give you—some figures that they are better educated than the average person in Ontario but they earn less than the average person in Ontario. In terms of what is happening in the world today with identity and free trade, our artists have defined who we are in terms of Canadians thinking up an identity for ourselves. Our artists tell us who we are and they tell us who we are in a really eloquent way.

In terms of the artistic community, any time artists move into an area, the value of that area goes up. Now, which other group in society do we have where every time they move somewhere, whether it is Yorkville or Queen Street or whatever, because they create original products, they improve the area they are in?

Having done all this for us, today the artistic community is suffering really badly. In 1988 we presented a report to the government saying that we needed more money, and maybe we asked for too much money at that time, but everything that we predicted is coming true now. One by one the theatre companies are closing, our dance companies are cutting back on their number of weeks, our artists are leaving Toronto. Many of you will say: "That's fine. That's okay if they leave Toronto. Let them go to Flesherton," which they are, or Hamilton. That is okay, but many artists are also leaving the profession and that is not okay, because if they are no longer artists because they feel they just cannot support themselves, then I think that we really lose quite a lot.

So what I am trying to do is talk to members of Parliament, trying to talk to people one-on-one as much as I can and say to them that we at the Ontario Arts Council are very aware of the economy. We follow it all very carefully and very closely. We know all the problems with the government, but what we are saying is, the amount of money that the arts need compared to other sectors is really not very much.

We are asking for an increase of $11 million in our base for this year. I will take you through in a second. I know it sounds like a lot and I know that the deficit is large, but when you look at the value added and when you look at the national identity and when you look at how important it is and how it helps the spirit and how you need bread—this is a cliché—but you need bread, you need roses. But we do need all these things and more so than ever now in Ontario and in Canada. I think we need to know who we are, and it is not wasted money, because for every dollar that goes into the arts, there is $10 of volunteer effort that goes into the arts.

The artists themselves subsidize half of what we do and they give back so much. I am not trying to put any other sector of society down, but at the moment we do not have any artists on the welfare rolls and we do not find them in mental hospitals and we do not find them in prisons. You do not find them in places where they are not helping society. I really strongly believe that artists give so much to our society that the little we do for them, we gain so much back.

Maybe before I go through this I would like to turn over to Michael Rayner and maybe he can say a few things.

Mr Rayner: Perhaps just to supplement some of the comments Nalini has made and speak from the perspective of a board member who has been with the arts council for just under a year, I thought it would be helpful for members of the committee to understand a little bit about the way in which the arts council operates in taking public funds and disseminating them over 1,000 organizations over 1,600 individual artists and, frankly, touching the lives of many Ontarians, not just because of the work of those organizations and individual artists but through programs in the schools that are widespread, etc.

The council exists and plays an arm's-length role. Essentially, we have created in our body politic an institution which can take public funds and ensure that they are distributed fairly and equitably without political influence. The function of the board of the arts council, indeed of its staff, is to ensure, in fact, that the public money that is entrusted to us is distributed in a fair and equitable way across the arts community, particularly the professional arts community.

I would like to say, having observed this system now for a little over nine months, that I think it is an extremely well designed system. Governments that provide money to the arts council can do so with confidence, knowing that the process that has been established over the years in the council is an extremely good process, that we use a process of juries, of peer appraisal, within the arts community to ensure that excellence is rewarded and awarded grants by the arts council, and that the sorts of biases one might worry about in the disbursement of public funds over large numbers of organizations, I think, are effectively eliminated. The combination of a vigilant board and a very highly competent staff ensures that this process works smoothly.

Nalini has alluded to the tremendous needs of the arts community at the present time. One of the things I have been most surprised by, I suppose, and impressed by in this short period of time that I have been associated with the council is just how much suffering, in effect, is going on in this community. Every board meeting I attend we are briefed on the number of arts organizations that are either closing or about to close, the number of individual artists who are leaving the artistic community and moving into jobs where they are unable to pursue their art.

Many people in Ontario in this recessionary time are facing crisis, and a new crisis for them. The artists and the arts organizations in the community in effect are facing a considerably deepened crisis, but they have really lived through crisis for the last 10 or 15 years. If one examines the funding pattern, the distribution of funds by the government through the arts council, you will see that there has been no matching, if you will, of funding by government with the cost of living and inflationary pressures in our society.

So we have come to the government with what appears to be an unusual request for much more money than we had in the past as part of our base. But essentially the argument we put is that we are trying very hard to redress at one could in fact characterize as the wrongs of the t.

We urge members of all parties to consider carefully plight of this artistic community, which we believe to in a true state of crisis. We urge you all to think of the multiplier effect that Nalini alluded to that comes from the work of the artists in our community—the number of ancillary industries, related service businesses and organizations that are linked with arts organizations and individual artists—the way in which money spent through the arts multiplies and provides for employment and wellbeing for Ontarians.

Ms Stewart: On 23 January there was an article in the Toronto Star that talked about the crisis in the arts, and in this article the writer said that the cultural safety net is crumbling really quickly at the moment. Again, I have said we have predicted this in two of our reports. One was the theatre task force study that we did called Places Please a year and a half ago in which we named the theatres that could be in deep trouble, and they are at the moment.

If we do not help these organizations now, these organizations will fail and those people will go on the welfare list. So in a way each is equally bad. It is really important for the Ontario Arts Council to be able to look after our arts organizations. I never said that every organization deserves to be kept alive for ever and our board has never said that either, because some should just be allowed not to exist there. For our best organizations, we really have to make sure that during these tough times we help them and do everything we can to keep them going, because we just cannot afford to go back.

Most of the arts organizations did not participate in or get the riches from the boom here that Toronto went through in the 1980s. Some people made a lot of money, but nobody in the arts made a lot of money during the 1980s and we have a lot of catching up to do.

Mr Rayner: If I could just supplement that, I think another element of the possible failure of some major arts organizations relates to the tremendous loss of investment that occurs if you allow something that has been built over 10 or 15 years to suddenly disperse. The time to rebuild the talent and bring people together and create the synergy and be able to offer again what was lost is just incredible. The investment that is being made in major and even minor arts organizations in simply assembling the talent and providing the space is incredible. If we lose that, if any one of them goes and the people involved are dispersed, we lose a great deal. We lose many years in terms of the ability to replace that activity.

Ms Stewart: This is in our brief. We fund 1,000 organizations across Ontario. We give money to 1,600 individual artists. We do everything in two languages. We are very aware of the whole multicultural complex of Ontario. I talked to Mr Phillips a lot for years when he was in that job. We have some of the best programs. We did them very slowly and very carefully. Now those programs are being looked at not just in Canada, but we have inquiries about those programs even from countries in Europe. We have one the artists in the workplace program. We are now looking at new ways to reach the people of the first nations, because they are very keen that they be part of the system in every way possible. We are looking at programs in the black community.

We have a very open organization and our board and our staff always try to be one step ahead so that we anticipate things that are happening. Right now, for example, we know that there are certain communities that have become very strong in terms of wanting to make sure that they have equal access. We already anticipate that. We welcome them in and we talk to them and say, "Okay, how do we do it?" So as an organization, we have tried to reach everybody in this province. We do not just sit in one place and feel satisfied that we have all the answers.

Norman, do you want to take the people through the priorities?

Mr Walford: Just very briefly, the last page in the package you have outlines the priorities over a three-year period for the Ontario Arts Council. They deal specifically with some of the areas that have been mentioned by Nalini and Michael, and that is the stabilization of the whole community, starting with increases in the amounts of individual grants and the success rate of granting to the artistic community.

The stabilization of funding to key arts organizations: Nalini has mentioned that we have quite a number of arts organizations and prices at the moment, so it is an effort to increase the percentage of contribution that the Ontario Arts Council makes, recognizing of course that the funding of the arts in this province and in Canada has always been a partnership between many different elements. It involves community support. It involves support from private individuals and from the corporate community. We would be looking to have our money become a leveraging effect; in other words, if we put it in first, then quite often it is much easier for the companies to lever money from other sources.

We have many organizations across the province now which would, except for the lack of money, be eligible for operating support on a continuing basis. This is a problem which runs throughout every discipline, so that we would require funds in order to be able to give them ongoing operating support.

One thing we feel is very important in terms of creating a whole person through the educational system is the question of how often and what quality of experience a child has in the educational system. Right now, it is extremely low. They may have one experience with a major cultural institution from the time they enter school until they leave high school. We would like to devote more of our resources to ensuring that children of school age have the experience of artists and arts organizations within their school setting.

The last part—it is by no means least—is the whole question of the expansion or accessibility by different sections of our population to artists. That will be found in different types of audience-building techniques; also, reaching out to communities that may not be familiar with the kind of work we do and the kind of support that is available so that all sectors of our society can have access.

I just want to conclude by emphasizing that we work right across the province. Nalini mentioned the concentration in Toronto. That is true. But we do support community arts councils, symphony orchestras, theatre companies and other activities right across the province. In every single community you could find something that the Ontario Arts Council has supported at one time or another.

I also want to say that recognizing that to some degree—the old axiom that God helps those who help themselves—we are engaged in a lot of activities that are designed to help arts organizations become better managers of their own destinies. That certainly involves things like help with planning, professional development for their managers. We have also set up a very small research function in order to provide them with materials with which they can make better arguments with their own municipalities or with the corporate community.

The final thing I would like to say is that one of the reasons we present for increased government support of the arts is always that the strength of the artistic community will have a profound effect on the creative and innovative capacity of the entire society. I do not think people really understand the connections. Quite often they see artists and arts organizations as off to one side, providing a certain kind of value to society.

If you look at it very closely, the inspiration for our industrial designers, people who are in various kinds of businesses, quite often are very seriously affected by what is going on in the artistic community, because it is basically the role of the artist to be fundamentally innovative and creative; that is, to think of new ways to do things and to ask questions that are crucial to the creative development of our society.

I think it is like the R and D of the whole creative spectrum in society in that its weakness will also weaken other aspects of that and some of the things that we realize from other sectors.

Ms Stewart: We would be pleased to answer any questions.

Mrs Sullivan: I am quite interested in your presentation today, having gone through the five-year plan earlier to some extent and having also been to school with at least, I think, a couple of you and having chaired a performing arts centre myself. I am quite aware not only of the role of arts groups in defining and expressing our community, but also of the economic impact that flows back into the community.

One of the things that I am wondering if you covered here or could speak to is that very frequently we think about arts organizations as appealing to large population groups. I do not think you have spoken particularly to the smaller interest groups that are a very significant and important part of maintaining an artistic commitment, if you like. Where do you fit that into your budget plan in terms of maintaining the smaller organizations, as well as the larger ones? I think you have spoken to a certain extent about the community outreach, but you might want to—

Ms Stewart: Of the 1000 organizations we fund, about 20 could be considered large organizations. The other 980 would be in the category that you speak of. Certainly in communities across Ontario, for example, Thunder Bay—am I answering your question right? There is a symphony orchestra—

Mrs Sullivan: Just helping the argument along.

Ms Stewart: —and there is a Magnus Theatre and fund it, and the same in Sudbury and the same in Sault Marie and the same in London, Windsor, all the places have been to. When people think of the large organizations, they are the big five, as we say: the symphony, ballet, opera, Stratford and Shaw. But that is only five, then there may be another 20 like Tafelmusik music or maybe Tarragon of Canadian stage. But then the ones across Ontario are community arts councils, community orchestras, community theatres, summer theatres. We have about 10 summer theatres. How many summer theatres? Eighteen, something like that? Every community has an art gallery.

That is what our base is in all those little organizations—the big ones get the profile—plus there are all the volunteers in each group or organization. We really reach everywhere in the province.

Mrs Sullivan: You might also want to underline your current base budget and the increment that you are asking for in specific dollar terms.

Ms Stewart: The current base is $34.6 million, even though on this page here, it says $38.6 million, but our base is that—

Mr Walford: It is all here. It is at the bottom of this page.

Ms Stewart: We have a base of $34.6 million. We have $1 million added in multicultural money, but that ends March this year. We would like to have $11 million added mainly to keep our organizations alive.

Mrs Sullivan: You are really talking about $45 million as a commitment of the Ontario community to the arts in the province.

Ms Stewart: Yes. This has come down a great deal since 1988, because when we did our original five-year plan, which was based on a needs argument, we went across Ontario asking people what was needed in the arts. In view of the recession and the economy, we have cut back substantially.

Mr Walford: I wonder if I could add also, in terms of the incredible increase in interest and the number of organizations that have been formed over, say, the last 10 years, that we find ourselves in a very difficult position because our funding has not kept up with both the demand and the number of organizations, just the general population increase.

We have a lot of inequities between when an organization actually developed and the availability of funds in a given time period. One of the things this plan is designed to do is to try to correct some of those inequities. In other words, some of the organizations that have developed in communities during the leaner years we would now like ing along to an appropriate level. That is one of the problems that underlie the thinking of this.

Mr B. Ward: I know we are getting behind schedule. I will be very brief. I met the chairman there it seems a long time ago. Life moves ahead at Queen's Park. I do not pretend to be an artist, as I stated in our conversation. However, I do have a lot of respect for the arts. My wife is the artist of the family. I try to draw or—I will tell you, you do not want to see the stuff.

The question I have is that our government is very big on consultation, co-operation, partnerships, etc., so that we are as a government, and I am sure all parties can assist in that—would you be willing to work with us in partnership and co-operation so that we as a government have a better understanding of what the arts community's needs are, and that when funds are allocated we know they are going to the best possible programs so that we do not waste any of the tax dollars? Would you be willing to work with us in that sense, forming a partnership and co-operation?

Ms Stewart: Sure. I have already started that. I have already met Mr Christopherson, Margery Ward, you. I am not thinking. Three of the people in this room.

Mr B. Ward: You already know Gerry.

Ms Stewart: I have requested an appointment with you too.

Mr Phillips: You are spending your time in the right place.

Ms Stewart: You just have not responded yet.

Mr B. Ward: But you would be willing to work with us in a co-operative manner.

Ms Stewart: Of course. Our board feels that we are stewards of public money. The cheque that we get is—we are trustees. Our processes are totally open, although we are an arm's-length agency. We are doing the same work as an arm's-length agency. We bend over backwards.

Mr B. Ward: Myself, I will be relying on your recommendations since obviously I am not an expert in the artistic field. I will be relying on your expertise and recommendations. I look forward to working with you.

Mr Christopherson: I was going to acknowledge how impressed I was that you managed to get to my office so quickly after the election. I am overwhelmed at how quickly you move. I find that you have been around all over the room here. That says a lot about your determination, your own personal commitment and also your lobbying skills, I might add.

As I mentioned to you in our discussions, I was fairly involved at the local level, being on our city's arts advisory committee recommending to city council ways in which we could do exactly the things that you are encouraging us to do at this level. To take it to a provincial level, I wanted to ask how successful you have been in having municipalities adopt arts policies. I ask that mainly in recognition of the fact that my sense, having served a number of years on that subcommittee, was that there really had to be a commitment at the local level, a hands-on commitment, not so much the dollars, although that is part of it, but the commitment.

I am wondering how successful you feel you have been across the municipalities in Ontario and how that might, if you will, underscore your points with us.

Ms Stewart: We have not gone to everybody, but we have had Thunder Bay pass a resolution supporting the Ontario Arts Council's bid for more funding. It is easy for municipalities to pass a resolution if they do not have to put up money themselves. They got everybody together and they passed this resolution. It was great and it was a good PR gesture. But then, are they going to step in to save the Thunder Bay Symphony Orchestra or Magnus Theatre North-West?

Mr Christopherson: I really meant an arts policy as opposed to just a resolution.

Ms Stewart: Okay, policy. Windsor has had an arts policy and Hamilton has had reports and talked about it. London has talked about it. We talked to the mayor of London. Ottawa, because it is also the national capital, has things happening in different directions. Do you want to add something?

Mr Walford: Perhaps it would just help to say that one of the organizations that we have been supporting the formation of is—the community arts councils of Ontario have formed an association. One of their absolutely principal issues and priorities is to go back to the membership, i.e., the 45 or 50 arts councils from around the province, with exactly what you are saying. They realize that the only way they are going to be more successful is to have a stated policy within their community, within their municipality. Again, it is the leveraging effect of that, that if they do it means their community is committed; it means therefore that the local businesses may become more committed and it has a snowball effect.

Indeed, there has been some of the success. There are quite a number of communities that now have policies, and where they do not, it is certainly one of the objectives of this organization to ensure that they do.

Ms Stewart: I remember talking to the mayor of Windsor and the mayor of London about this. What they would like to do, and of course nobody even has the money to do it, is to have economic impact studies, because they are both convinced that the arts do help their cities. I wish that we had the money. I wish I could hire Allan Gregg or Martin Goldfarb to do a survey of how the arts help different cities.

Mr Sutherland: Sounds like a great project for the MBA schools in both those cities to take on.

Ms Stewart: That is an excellent idea, because we have facts and figures but they are really not up to date. I am embarrassed. I would not use statistics unless I felt that they were absolutely viable, but I think that it would help us if we had that.

The Chair: I am going to move along to Mr Phillips and I am going to ask him to do it in one minute.

Mr Phillips: Question and answer?

The Chair: Question and answer.

Mr Phillips: I think I may already have my answer, and that was that I am familiar with the million-dollar multicultural fund and how effective that is and how that is I think working to ensure that everybody has access to the council. I now know it expires in another month and a half or two months.

Ms Stewart: Yes.

Mr Walford: That is part of this request.

Mr Phillips: Yes, I see that. I could not quite figure it out until you explained.

Ms Stewart: But we would use more than $1 million in that community; we would use $2 million.

The Chair: Thank you for coming and thank you for your presentation.

MUNICIPAL FINANCE OFFICERS' ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: We would like to move along now to the municipal finance officers. We start to recognize people as they recur. I am being forced to play the heavy. I am going to restrict your time to the allotted amount of time and I will try to get the members of the committee to have their questions reflect the time allocation. If you would begin, please.

Mr Rinaldo: Let me introduce myself first. I am Joe Rinaldo. I am the chairman of the Municipal Finance Officers' Association of Ontario as well as the regional treasurer and commissioner of finance for the region of Halton. With me, as you met earlier today, is Bob Richards, who is the vice-chairman of the association, as well as the treasurer of the region of Peel. With us also is Heather Bell, our executive director of the association.

I would like to express our appreciation for giving us the opportunity to give you a different perspective on municipal finance officers and municipal finance issues prior to your establishing the budget. Bob Richards has co-ordinated our submission to you and will be presenting it to you. With that, I would like to turn it over to him.

Mr Richards: I would like to just echo Joe's sentiments. Thank you to the standing committee for the opportunity to contribute to the development of fiscal and economic policy in this province. The budget that you are deliberating is perhaps the province's most important policy instrument, and public consultation on both the process and content of the budget is an important feature of the parliamentary system of government.

At this point in my remarks, it is probably a good idea to provide a brief overview of our mandate and membership of the organization I am representing. The Municipal Finance Officers' Association of Ontario or MFOA is the professional association of Ontario's municipal treasurers and senior financial officers. MFOA features 400 individual members from more than 200 municipalities across the province and is considered to be the authoritative source of opinion on municipal finance issues. MFOA has appeared before past incarnations of this committee and has worked closely with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs on a variety of municipal finance issues.

Enough about us. Let's get on with the issues.

As we stated earlier, the Canadian economy is in recession, particularly acute in the province of Ontario. People and businesses are indeed hurting. During such recessions, all levels of government, we feel, are more obliged to help restore economic growth and provide a safety net for those individuals who require assistance. All levels of government are also obliged, as a result of the disciplines imposed by the market—and, you see, we as treasurers—to operate within a fiscally responsible framework.

Fiscally responsible governments realize that long-term persistent government-sector budget deficits encourage inflation, invite restrictive monetary policy from the Bank of Canada and reduce fiscal flexibility in meeting emerging new policy needs. Governments that are truly committed to the welfare of the public understand the importance of sound fiscal management.

In drafting its position on the 1991 budget, MFOA tried to balance the twin obligations faced by all levels of government, the obligation to deliver economic and social assistance to the public and the obligation to operate within a responsible fiscal framework. Meeting one of the twin obligations at the expense of the other simply does not do justice to notions of good government.

MFOA therefore requests that no new cost-shared programs be introduced in the 1991 budget until provincial and municipal governments are satisfied that existing cost-shared programs are being adequately funded.

Having drawn attention to this overriding need for balance, we would like to put forward a few ideas aside from that one.

The first one deals with the word "disentanglement." The current provincial-municipal financial relationship is characterized by a confusing array of unconditional grants, conditional grants, cost-shared programs and special-purpose bodies armed with unaccountable taxing powers. For instance, the standing committee should be aware that the province's unconditional grant program has been roundly criticized in recent years by both the municipalities and your own Provincial Auditor. The conditional grant program now features over 100 individual grants to municipalities, each with its own complex form. Special-purpose bodies armed with no electoral accountability are now responsible for more than 50% of the property tax levied by most municipalities; by many, at least. This entangled reality serves neither the province nor the municipalities.

It is important to put the preceding statement and rather strong wording in context. The current provincial government and the current Minister of Municipal Affairs inherited this situation. To its credit, the current provincial government has served notice on the need for financial reforms based on a reallocation of roles and responsibilities between the two levels of government, a concept referred to as disentanglement.

A process for disentangling the provincial-municipal financial partnership is currently being developed around the long-awaited Ballinger-Hopcroft report, as it is referred to, half of whom is still alive and well. This report is expected to be released this spring and it is still the si-st important governmental issue on the agenda of many municipal decision-makers.

MFOA views disentanglement as the guiding principle that should govern the province in any contemplated budget initiatives that directly impact on municipal government. It is worth noting that disentanglement need not result in financial windfalls for one level of government at the expense of the other. Disentanglement can be revenue-neutral in its attempts to match funding responsibilities with the same level of government that makes the key policy decisions for a given program area. In short, it is all about political accountability.

Let's talk about timing for one moment. In order for us to budget effectively at our level, it is imperative that governments be provided with early announcements on transfers, payments and unconditional grants. We understand that the new provincial government requires a certain amount of time to decide on the appropriate allocation of the billions of dollars transferred each year. In this sense, the expected mid-February announcement by the Treasurer is not terribly surprising. It is also, however, not terribly helpful. In future years, MFOA is hopeful that transfer payment announcements by the Treasurer will manage to precede the fiscal year for which they are being announced. Mid-November to us seems reasonable. Our fiscal year, by the way, is a calendar year, unlike your own.

The Minister of Community and Social Services has received and endorsed the broad findings of PMSSR, the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review. This review of all social service responsibilities shared by the two levels of government seeks to simplify the financing and administration of the various programs. In the eyes of our association, the key recommendation of PMSSR is the recognition that general welfare assistance benefits should be removed from the property tax base and funded entirely from provincial revenue sources.

I will not repeat myself from this morning. I think it is the record that GWA is not a popular item with the municipal sector.

During the legislative session before the 1990 election was called, Bill 229 was introduced for first reading. This bill would have extended and modernized municipal borrowing powers. The bill was the result of a three-year consultative process involving officials from the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, the Treasury, municipal officials and private sector investment dealers. It actually goes beyond what I started working on this in 1980. The reforms have been long overdue.

Bill 229 was the first major rewrite of municipal borrowing and investing legislation since the 1960s. Passage of Bill 229 would have brought Ontario municipalities into the mainstream of modern money market practices while preserving the regulatory integrity of the Ontario Municipal Board in monitoring the accumulation of municipal debt.

We fully support the provisions of Bill 229 and request that it be reintroduced in the upcoming session of the Legislature.

We are interested in working with the province to develop new sources of revenue to relieve the growing financial burden placed on property taxpayers. To this end, our association has recently released a report on the imposition of a gross receipts tax on cable and other utilities making use of municipal rights of way. We require the support and participation of the province in its search for innovative approaches to funding municipal services in Ontario. We would ask the standing committee to consider the notion of a 1991 budget discussion paper to deal with the topic of new municipal revenue sources. If the standing committee thinks such a discussion paper could be useful, perhaps a recommendation to the Treasurer to commission such a paper would be appropriate.

I hope it is not lost on the members of the standing committee that nowhere in this brief did MFOA merely step forward and ask the province for more money. We feel this type of intergovernmental relations is simply not realistic given current economic realities. Instead, MFOA urges the standing committee to view municipalities as real partners with the province, partners who can stand on their own two feet in many situations. Municipalities balance their operating budgets every single year. In recent memory, the province has done so once. The challenge for the province is to listen carefully, act when help is needed and stand back when intervention is not justified. MFOA hopes that the province's 1991 budget takes this advice to heart.

Mr Rinaldo: We would be more than happy to answer any questions.

Mrs Sullivan: As I said in a previous presentation, I am again surprised that the question of waste management was not raised, particularly with Mr Rinaldo at the table. Why are you not calling for $25 million for a landfill?

Mr Rinaldo: Halton has gone through a lot in waste management. We started in I believe 1974 when the region was established, went through a first process and did not get anywhere. We have gone through a second process where our tipping fee went from about $12 a ton to $156 and really should have been higher than that.

I swore that in my next position I will go into a municipality that does not have a waste management problem. I have gone through two of them, one in Hamilton-Wentworth and one here, and I can assure you that I hope this is my last one. I still feel that municipalities should be able to fund the waste management and should have responsibility for it. Just to make it clear, what Halton was asking for was to take advantage of the program that you have initially put forward that the province has in place today in terms of assisting in the construction of the new facility.

Mrs Sullivan: You mentioned one appropriate type of municipal revenue source that may be new and I am interested that you bring it forward now, given the kind of feeling that is on the ground that maybe property taxes are awfully high and a budget paper at this point in time may be something that the Treasurer might be reluctant to look at. But what other sorts of revenue sources would you be looking at?

Mr Richards: There is a wide range and there are many that we do not even know about yet. For example, we, for one, have thought about municipal lotteries, something which we are excluded from, and hotel taxes. The tire tax to me seems like a revenue that should be a municipal revenue. As I said earlier, we have tire disposal left at the municipal level and it is being collected at the provincial level for I am not sure what.

The corporate concentration tax was an idea hatched from municipalities, taken by Treasury and used for provincial purposes. It is a clear incursion into provincial revenue-raising. Surely if anyone is responsible for the servicing of high-rise corporate concentrations of buildings—it is a municipal road that is getting there, it is a municipal sewer, it is municipal water, and the funding is going to the province of Ontario by the corporate concentration tax.

We are looking for that kind of energy and ingenuity either to be unleashed for us or to be allowed to unleash it ourselves. We have the ideas; we just do not have the legislative framework to allow us to use them.

Mr Rinaldo: In the past we have offered to assist the Ministry of Treasury and Economics to write your budget. They have declined so far. We would be more than happy, if you wish, as one of your suggestions, to put that to work with them on that area.

Mr Richards: On the waste issue too, I think that municipalities are not looking for handouts on this issue. The best thing for the province of Ontario to do in this case is to get out of the way.

Mrs Sullivan: I suppose the reason that I asked the question is that Halton is eligible for $25 million in grants and they have not been forthcoming. I just wondered why it was not on the table.

Mr Rinaldo: Obviously that is a local issue and we were talking about the broader issues. If you have a program in place, we would want to take advantage of it, but if you make it clear that that is our responsibility and say income maintenance is your responsibility, we would obviously plan accordingly. That is what we want to do. We want to have the ability to plan our community when we know what the ground rules are. In the past few years, the ground rules have changed so dramatically that it is hard for us to plan responsibly for what is coming, what we have to provide for.

Mr Sutherland: Mrs Sullivan asked the question I was going to ask.

Mr B. Ward: I will pass.

The Chair: Very good. Thank you for your presentation.

ONTARIO NON-PROFIT HOUSING ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group for presentation is the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association: Debbie Kraus, executive director, and Cassie Doyle, president. You may begin.

Ms Kraus: I am Debbie Kraus and I am the executive director of the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association. I would like to start by just giving a brief introduction about our association. The Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association was established in 1988 by municipal and private non-profit housing corporations in Ontario. We believe access to decent, appropriate and affordable housing is a basic human right.

The goal of ONPHA is to build a strong non-profit housing sector and to promote the production and management of high-quality, affordable housing across the province. We now have 375 members and these members own more than 48,000 units, representing 55% of all municipal and private non-profit housing under management across the province. Our members come from urban and rural areas, small and large communities from right across Ontario. I would like to turn it over now to Cassie Doyle, president.

Ms Doyle: I am from the city of Ottawa, in case you have not seen anybody from outside of Toronto today.

The Chair: We are particularly happy to have you here because we have only had one or two other presentations from outside of Toronto and I think we need that perspective.

Ms Doyle: Good. I wanted to say how much we appreciate your giving us this forum to present today. I am sure you have had quite a mishmash of presentations, so I would just ask you to focus on non-profit housing for the next 28 minutes.

The starting point of our recommendations to you before you is the very serious shortage of affordable housing in the province of Ontario. What is critical to our association is housing for low- and moderate-income families and individuals.

There is, I guess, a traditional view that non-profit housing or socially assisted housing is targeted to those who have the highest need, those on GWA, FBA or senior citizens' pensions. But what we recognize is that there is a growing number of working people in Ontario who require assisted housing, whose needs cannot be met in the home ownership market or the private rental market. In fact, in many parts of the province you could have minimum wage earners who still would require assistance if they need family housing. That is really the starting point of our recommendations.

What we wanted to emphasize to you today is the importance of timing to us, particularly in your consideration of the 1991-92 budget. We wanted to put forward in the strongest way the need for the inclusion of funding for non-profit housing development in this budget that you are considering now, in the first instance, because of the need in the province.

From the indications from your own Ontario Housing Corp, there are 45,000 people on the waiting lists that are administered by the public housing authorities. The non-profit sector is the only new housing that is housing people off those lists. Other indications show that over one-third of three renter households in the province are paying an inordinate amount of their incomes on housing and that is pushing them into a poverty situation. We want it in the budget to the need and particularly considering the current economic circumstances. Housing is one of the first things hits people when one income earner or the sole income earner loses his or her job, so we would like you to keep that in mind.

The second thing is that non-profit housing is an excellent source of job creation or maintaining jobs in the construction industry particularly. Our research shows as does that of our sister organization, the Co-Operative Housing Association of Ontario—together we have found that for every housing unit that the province funds in the non-profit sector, it produces at a minimum two full years in the building trades. That maintains employment in the building trades. As you are aware, the building trades are really in a serious slump right now and non-profit housing in many parts of the province is the only thing that is going to be built over the next 18 months, so job creation potential is an important thing to keep in mind for this budget.

The third is the efficiencies around producing non-profit housing in this period. We have an infrastructure coming out of the Homes Now program which was incredibly successful. We have an infrastructure of developers and non-profit organizations across the province that are ready to build. We know that because of the economic downturn, we can pick up land or projects at a price which we could not do two years ago. Our tender prices on new construction are coming in in some parts of the province 25% less than they were 18 months ago, so I think it is something to keep in mind that now is the most efficient time for the province to build something that in the long run is going to continue to serve the needs of low- and moderate-income households.

Essentially, I guess the key point in today's presentation is to ask that you include funding for the development of non-profit housing in this budget year. This will signal the start of the province committing itself to stable and predictable funding for non-profit housing development. That is what the resource groups in non-profit, community-based organizations across the province want from the province now as an indication that there will be funding in this budget and that there will be a continued commitment that we do not have these kind of runoff programs that everyone gears up for and then we run out of units.

There is the potential out there now to build. The time is right, the need is high, so we would ask that you keep that in mind in this budget year. In the long run, we will be relying on the province and looking to the province to honour its commitment that was indicated in An Agenda for People of building 20,000 units a year. What we basically want to see in this budget is an indication that that commitment will start.

That is the first part. I would like to turn you over now to our vice-president, Colin Gage, who is from Victoria Park Community Homes in Hamilton.

Mr Gage: I would like to address that any new program or any new initiative by the government must be very receptive to the diversities between both urban and rural differences. All too often, we see a lot of internal differences between ministries when there has got to be a co-operation of ministries, specifically the Ministry of the Environment versus the Ministry of Housing. When we get into rural areas and also into urban areas, we find that all too often this bogs down the process and we cannot respond quickly enough because it is caught up in myriad red tape with the two ministries.

Another issue is that any new development or any new program must be receptive to innovation as far as design goes. We are very fully cognizant of the cost implications of building and what we are striving to do is to build a very high quality product, but also to maintain our focus on making sure that it is architecturally attractive, that it fits into the community, that it is received well in the community and also managed well in the community. All too often in the past we have seen non-profit housing tarnished by what I would say is mismanagement and misdesign.

The new programs should also be very cognizant of the acquisition and rehabilitation of existing buildings. Right now we are seeing that the older rental housing stock is deteriorating at a very quick rate. We do not find the private sector responding very quickly to rehabilitate these housing units to a level that we would find acceptable so we are finding that the people who occupy these units are within our, if you would, catchment and they are not being addressed properly. We find that they are living in squalid conditions and because of the current economic times the landlord cannot respond effectively to rehabilitate the housing units. Once again, I must emphasize that the acquisition of existing housing stock will allow us to develop on a product that is already there and has proved itself over time.

The next area I would like to focus on is the province's Housing First policy and the provincially owned lands. We fully endorse the province's position that 35% of all provincial land under the Housing First policy will be dedicated to affordable housing. We would like to take that a little bit further and suggest to you that any small infill or smaller lots be designated totally or solely for non-profit housing and that when any larger tracts of land are being subdivided, the non-profit housing sector be very much involved with the planning process of those lands with the Ministry of Housing in order to ensure the inclusion of these lands for non-profit housing.

The rationale behind this is that we see this as a continuing, ongoing supply of affordable housing, if you will, and it will continue in that fashion, rather than holding a price at a set level for five years, selling it initially or building it initially for a set price and then in five years releasing it to the open market where inflation and the market forces will take over. We see that if we are allowed to move in with non-profit housing, it will retain that tenure for 35 years. I leave that for your consideration.

Ms Frenette: My name is Sybil Frenette and I am from the city of Kitchener. I work for their non-profit housing corporation and I am also treasurer of this organization, so I have something in common with yourselves in that I watch the money of my organization like you watch the money of the government.

I wanted to talk to you about two things. One is the provincial policy statement on housing and the other is financial vehicles that our organization feels can be put in place to make non-profit housing more cost-effective.

First, in the area of the provincial policy statement, we endorsed strongly the recommendations of the provincial policy statement on land use planning for housing that was approved last year. Our problem with that policy statement, though, is that it does not have the teeth that it needs to be implemented. We see it as an opportunity; it is full of very good ideas. However, we do not have the mechanisms of accessing the recommendations contained in that policy statement.

For example, one area that is of particular interest to us is a statement that 25% of all lands under development should be set aside for affordable housing. One problem with that statement is the definition of "affordable." It differs very dramatically from the core-need thresholds that are established under the non-profit co-op and OHC programs, so there is not a matching between what is considered affordable under that policy statement and what is true affordable housing. We would like to see that area worked on and amended and expanded.

The other area of the affordable policy statement is that 25% of the land be set aside in some manner. It cannot be simply a policy statement in an official plan document that is a wish list. There has to be a means of obtaining that 25% affordable land. We have some suggestions that we would like to present to the government and work with your staff on creating those vehicles for allowing that land to be set aside.

One example is that school boards in Ontario are allowed to reserve land for school construction. We would like to be able to reserve land for non-profit construction in new plans and subdivisions. That way people moving into a new subdivision would know that the land is there, is going to be developed for non-profit housing, and hopefully we would not get the kind of community resistance we have been getting to development and it would be more acceptable in that the land would be noted as being for non-profit housing.

We would also like to see mechanisms such as cash in lieu for land that is set aside for non-profit housing. I can give you another example: for park land dedication, municipalities are allowed to have cash in lieu when they want land reserved for park use. A similar mechanism could be set in place for cash in lieu to be donated to a bank of funds that could be then used to buy land for non-profit housing or the land itself could be set aside through subdivision agreements for non-profit housing. Our organization has many ideas such as this, and we would appreciate the opportunity to work with your staff on these ideas.

In the area of financing, similarly to land use initiatives, we can also propose some financing initiatives to make the non-profit housing program more cost-effective. One area is index-linked mortgages. This is a program that is currently operative with the co-operative sector. We worked last year on a think tank with the co-operative sector on a capitalization subcommittee and we had, as I say, a think tank and a number of ongoing meetings with the co-op sector to propose financing means to bring the non-profit program into a manner that is more cost-effective. As I mentioned, the index-linked mortgage is an idea; land banking is another. We have received some funding to pursue these initiatives and, again, we will be meeting with your ministry staff to propose our recommendations.

In summary, what we want and what we are here to ask for is to ask you to keep non-profit housing as a priority for this government and to ensure that funds are set aside in this year's budget for non-profit housing.

Mrs Sullivan: I think this is a very useful brief because you have brought some new ideas to the table. I want to ask if you have discussed at all a recent court decision relating to the Burlington situation and you see that as having an impact on the provincial statement on land use.

Ms Frenette: I have looked at the Ontario Municipal Board decision and I think Burlington went a little bit far. Again, it was a matter of trying to find the mechanism. They were struggling to see, "This is the provincial policy. How do we then access those lands"—in that case it was condominium units—"for affordable housing?"

There has been very little direction from the province on how to implement that policy statement. Burlington gave it a try and went too far. They overstepped the bounds of normal planning and they got their knuckles rapped by the OMB for doing it. But it is only through those cases that we are going to learn how to access affordable land.

Mrs Sullivan: But you feel that in your own communities you can still proceed under the guidelines now, that there is more specific legislation or whatever, even given that ruling?

Ms Frenette: No, I do not actually. I think that is the problem for us, that nobody knows exactly how we can access those lands. They are all trying their own mechanisms. I suppose, to answer your question, we will continue to try until we are told we cannot.

Ms Doyle: I was just going to add that in the city of Ottawa we have been quite successful for a number of years in requiring land to be set aside for non-profit housing at subdivisions, at the point of approval of subdivisions and this was much further along a site plan. There are some technical considerations around that Burlington decision that—

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly that is where most of our communities have been most successful.

Ms Doyle: Yes, at subdivision.

Mrs Sullivan: It is getting them right on the ground.

Mr Christopherson: It is a pleasure to see my former colleague and good friend Colin Gage here today along with one of his colleagues. I agree with the previous speaker. It is an excellent presentation.

As Colin will know, I was the chair of the regional task force on affordable housing up to the time that I was elected to Queen's Park, so I am aware of a lot of the issues that you are dealing with at first hand and the difficulty with finding mechanisms for the 25%. When I ked with the region, they were still on the task force, n, grappling with the official plan amendments and to actually incorporate some of the desires in the plan hat it would have some meaningful impact down the l when these things are tested. I know the kinds of problems that are there and we have inherited those problems. I can assure you that we appreciate the willingness to k with us in partnership to try to find solutions for n. None of them are easy, and I do not think any party gested they were easy. We have been given the responsibility of finding those answers and we look forward to king with you on them.

I was particularly interested, Colin, to hear you refer to overlap where the Ministry of the Environment was than supportive at a critical time. I gather you might referring to the project that we had in Hamilton on ford North, right near a major factory, where some help n the Ministry of the Environment may have made the erence. I am not sure if it was at the OMB or not. Was

Mr Gage: I think it is verging on the OMB now.

Mr Christopherson: Verging, okay. Regardless of v that turns out, there is no question that the case would e been strengthened if the Ministry of the Environment felt a little more comfortable in setting its priorities. It is not that they did not, that they backed away from the ising being the higher priority, but the fact that they just ked away completely from making any recommenda- t, which left the fight to go on. It is wasting a lot of time one way that really is not profitable for anyone. So I uld hope that there will be more emphasis on that.

You are the first group that I am aware of that raised t issue and, of course, having seen it in my own com- nity, I am aware of that example. There may be others, olving other ministries. I think that is an issue that we uld be looking at with you to ensure that there is good ordination with other ministries and that there is sup- t, where possible, and that we are articulating clearly priorities, so that we do not get into those kinds of ations.

I would just close by again thanking you for your ex- lent presentation. I appreciate it.

The Chair: I have one quick question of my own. I ve been very much interested in what the average cost is square foot of building the units that you build, land luded, if you can. I know it is probably not the same oughout the province, but can you give a ballpark num- ?

Mr Gage: Land included? It is difficult when you in- de land. Land is a large variable.

The Chair: All right. Let's try land excluded first.

Ms Doyle: In Ottawa now we had been up as high as out $72 per square foot for residential construction. Our ent tenders have been coming in at about the mid-60s. ose are mostly concrete high-rise buildings.

Mr Hansen: It think it was somewhere in the ighbourhood of between $40,000 and $65,000 per unit. I guessing now.

The Chair: What is the average square footage?

Mr Gage: About 900 to 1,000 square feet, depending on where it is.

Ms Doyle: There is quite a range in terms of the price depending on the land, I think. It is a big variable.

Mr B. Ward: Locality and lots of variables.

The Chair: That is very useful. Thanks for your presentation.

Mr B. Ward: Well done.

ONTARIO SCHOOL TRUSTEES' COUNCIL

The Chair: We have our last presentation of the day, the Ontario School Trustees' Council. We have Chuck Yates, president, and Lorraine Gandolfo, president of l'Association française des conseils scolaires de l'Ontario—my French is not that great; I am glad my French teacher is not here; and Betty Moseley-Williams, president of the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association.

Mr Yates: Thank you, Mr Chairman. We are outside the Toronto area too. Betty is from North Bay, Lorraine is from Brampton and I am from Cambridge.

We were aware of the fact that you have not had the opportunity to look at our submission and yet we are also aware of the fact that you have had a long day, so I would like to suggest that we will highlight our submission and then, if you do have any leisure time, I would hope you would look at our submission in its entirety.

The Chair: We have to review all of the submissions before we can make our recommendations.

Mr Yates: We are pleased to have this opportunity to appear before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to offer Ontario School Trustees' Council advice to the Legislature in preparation for the 1991 budget. The council's recommendations for the 1991 budget were more difficult to develop than in previous years, given the timing of the government's announcement of the increase in transfer payments to public sector partners, including schools, hospitals, municipalities, colleges and universities.

The pre-budget consultation process represents an important and necessary opportunity for the Ontario government and MPPs from all sides of the Legislature to discuss with the education community, in an open and accountable way, education costs and the level to which education should and deserves to be funded by the people of Ontario.

We take this opportunity not to point fingers and make accusations, but to genuinely work with the provincial government to embark on fiscal policies and social priorities that will ensure fairness for Ontario taxpayers and equality of opportunity for all Ontario school children in both English and French schools.

In 1990 the provincial government increased school board operating grants by 8.7% over 1989, bringing total 1990 provincial operating grants to $4.5 billion. In 1990, provincial grants represented approximately 40% of school board expenditures, excluding capital expenditures. The remaining and much larger 60% was funded by school boards through taxes on local residential, farm, commercial and industrial properties.

In recent years, a number of new, almost hidden costs have crept into all school board budgets. These costs have little to do with educating students. They include the employer health levy, pay equity, GST, the CPP and unemployment insurance increases, occupational health and safety requirements and obligations and increasing costs of ensuring environmentally safe and secure schools. Council is saying that the provincial government must provide sufficient resources to enable school boards to be as committed to meeting broader social and public policy priorities as boards must be to providing the best educational programs and services.

The Ontario Public School Boards' Association has estimated that in 1991, on a system-wide basis, the costs of pay equity, occupational health and safety requirements, environmental protection, the health tax and the GST will consume 4% of the increase in grants over 1990. This means that the first $200 million of the increase over 1990 will just cover these costs. Education-related costs, such as programs and services and teachers' salaries, will increase by an estimated 9%. Consequently, a 13% increase in operating grants in 1991 will be required to allow boards to meet the dual obligations of providing quality education and meeting their obligations as employers.

We hope the committee will agree that high standards of health and safety for school staff, environmentally healthy classrooms and playgrounds for our children and pay equity in the public sector cannot and should not be traded off against the need for high-quality educational programs and services. Whatever the added burden of costs in English schools, it is that much greater in French schools because of the unavailability of materials, thus resulting in added costs.

The Ontario School Trustees' Council strongly urges this committee to recommend to the Ontario government that through the Ontario budget or by other special grant programs, provincial financial support for schools be increased to reflect not only new and ongoing educational programs and services, but also the additional non-educational costs. Council further urges that the financing of education be equitable for all students. We urge the committee to recommend to the Ontario government that pay equity costs of school boards be funded from the consolidated revenues of the Ontario government or from the public sector pay equity fund announced by the Ministry of Labour.

The province recently announced an income protection program for those who find themselves victims of layoffs and plant closings as a result of the recession. We applaud the government not only for its willingness to show compassion, but also for allowing victims of the recession to maintain their dignity. In many cases families of modest means become distracted and disjointed as they scramble to make ends meet. Children and young adults are not immune to these problems and often the problems at home emerge in the school system in one way or another. The mandate for our schools has grown and may continue to grow as governments look at new ways in which schools can address social and adolescent problems earlier on in a more preventive manner. As the new government at Queen's Park contemplates new challenges and goals for schools, particularly in light of the social consequences of recessionary times, the council must urge caution for at least three main reasons.

First, expanding the school system's mandate, which probably involve a renewed financial commitment on the part of the provincial government. It is not enough to develop new programs or services. They must be implemented. Staff must be trained or retrained, facilities must be adequate and goods and services must be purchased.

Second, at what point does the continued expansion of the mandate of the school system leave less time to adequately deal with the basics of learning—reading, writing and math? While the role and goals of our schools broaden, the length of the school day does not. There must be proper planning and we must resist ad hoc stop-gap solutions which produce substandard results and consequently waste taxpayers' money. French schools for the most part are still in a catch-up situation even with respect to the basic elements of education.

Third, the council shares the new minister's stated concerns regarding the need to examine the entire range of social, community, provincial and local services currently in operation in the name of serving children. We ask this committee to recommend that no new mandates be placed on the school system without full review of the impact on the current goals of schools, the financial resources necessary to fund new mandates and the degree to which new mandates and services coincide with existing services directed to children and adults.

1650

The $700-million capital works program announced in the speech from the throne demonstrates that Ontario is willing to invest in itself, in its citizens and its labour force to help turn the tide of the recession.

One of Ontario's most significant capital requirements continues to be its schools. Of Ontario's 4,600 schools, 20% were built 50 years ago or more. To meet curriculum and program enhancements, requirements of technological education, energy conservation, environmental and occupational health and safety standards, many of these schools require an immediate renovation, repairs and modernization.

School boards' five-year forecast of capital requirements amounts to almost $6 billion. In response, the province allocated $1.5 billion over five years or $300 million per year. While the province's capital allocations have increased steadily, there is still a significant shortfall and a backlog of new schools and badly needed renovation and repairs to existing schools continues to grow. Council is pleased, however, that the government has moved toward a multi-year capital grant commitment. This approach has enabled school boards and the province to undertake capital projects with considerably more planning.

For growing communities, it is unfair to taxpayer and children that their children must spend their entire school experience in portable classrooms without easy access ool libraries, modern labs, vocational facilities and adequate indoor lunch and physical fitness facilities.

The OSTC urges the committee to recommend to the Treasurer of Ontario that school boards receive a sizeable allocation of the special $700-million capital works program announced in the throne speech.

Council urges the committee to recommend to the Treasurer of Ontario that the government continue to honour its five-year, $300-million-per-year commitment for school board capital grants.

We also urge the committee to recommend to the Treasurer of Ontario that annual capital grants to school boards continue to be announced on a multi-year basis so that school boards can both budget and plan their capital construction programs.

In the coming months there will be much said about financing of education, particularly as the Ministry of Education, along with the education community, begins the task of examining how best to improve our current system of distributing education grants to some 174 public, separate and French-language school boards throughout Ontario.

In addition, the government's Fair Tax Commission will undoubtedly be examining, among other things, the issue of property taxes in education finance. In 1991, 60% of education operating expenditures, almost $6 billion, was financed by local property taxpayers out of their disposable incomes.

Families on low or modest incomes have been hit hard by a policy that ignores their ability to pay higher and higher local taxes for education. Families and individuals with fixed incomes and our elderly have been shouldering the cost of education, which continues to eat into their savings. Ontario's farm communities continue to shoulder an ever-increasing burden for education costs, regardless of changing economic conditions which affect their livelihood.

Trustees' Council is proud of its long and consistent record of bringing to the attention of successive governments the issue of provincial responsibility in education finance. The basic premise continues to be that by having the provincial government pay the greater share of education costs, be it operating or total costs, all taxpayers pay a fair share based on their ability to pay.

Council is pleased that the new government is very aware of the difficulties faced by local taxpayers. An agenda for People stated:

"New Democrats propose raising the provincial share of education costs to 60% over five years, providing a solid base for a better education system and lifting some of the burden off property taxpayers. The cost of this initiative over the next two years would be $1.5 billion in property tax relief for Ontarians. We want to reverse the punishing increases in property taxes which hit seniors and low-income people especially hard."

How and when the spirit of this promise is met will be the subject of considerable consultation among the Ministry of Education and education stakeholders in the months ahead. It will also depend on the recommendations of the T.C. In the end, however, the provincial government must guarantee that the spirit of the promise which it made to the people of Ontario will be met.

To conclude this presentation, the council would like to reiterate its emphasis on forging a new partnership between provincial and local levels of government. We must develop a partnership of accountability to ensure the effective and efficient delivery of educational services. The achievements of desired results of education programs and services had a better than average level of support from our taxpayers. A partnership of accountability includes, among other things, co-operation, consultation and participation.

First, to be effective in the delivery of educational services for our young people, school boards and the provincial government must place a priority on co-operation. It is difficult to promote co-operation, understanding and partnerships among those who work in and those who are served by the school system, if those who are accountable do not demonstrate leadership and co-operation.

Second, changes in provincial education policies and practices require enormous consultation with and among the educational community. No matter how well intentioned, change that is not understood by those affected is less likely to be successful.

Finally, we must encourage participation of all the stakeholders. School boards form the centre of implementation for education in communities throughout Ontario. Within the boards, schools become the next line of implementation right down to where implementation matters the most, the classroom. The process of forming legislation or developing fiscal and policy priorities such as we are engaged in doing today cannot be done in isolation from those who are accountable for the delivery of services or from those who receive and pay for those services.

I thank you for the privilege of being able to present this paper to you today. We will try to answer any questions.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. Our first question is from Mr Ward.

Mr B. Ward: A quick comment. If the provincial government moves in a direction to increase the transfer payments over a period of time so that the burden of the property taxes is relieved a degree from the education standpoint, what safeguards do you see would be in place so that school boards would not simply use that as new money, so to speak, and so that the economic burden would remain, but in fact the money would be used to shift, obviously, the funding percentage. Would you comment on that?

Mr Yates: I would have to give a personal comment on that, if I may. I would hope in the consultation that goes on between the provincial government, the Ministry of Education and the boards which would hopefully result in increased payments by the province, some kinds of ceilings would be put on what boards can spend per student. That is a dangerous thing for me to say, but I firmly believe that.

Mr B. Ward: That is your personal opinion?

Mr Yates: That is a personal opinion. That in itself would contribute towards equity of opportunity for all students in the province, because at the present time some boards have more access to assessment bases than other boards. I am going to get shot when I walk out of the room, but unless the provincial government does something to govern school boards or to correct regulations, then that will not happen, unfortunately.

Mr Hansen: Yes, it is sort of along the same lines as Mr Ward's 60% funding by the province. I have had some teachers, I have had some trustees and they have some concerns on construction costs. In other words, for each school we build we hire an architect, we spend time; we wind up by building them all different, but the end result is that we mainly teach, in a lot of the schools, if they are not technical schools, the same subjects. They have the same desks, they have the same lab equipment, whatever the case may be.

I come from a rural area and they cannot understand the architectural fees going into some of these schools. Why does not the province come out with a blueprint and say if it is a technical school, let's say it was 20 classes, that is 20 classes; if it is 30, the plan just expands for 10 more classes. Do you think you could comment on that one, because on the 60% funding it is still going to be taxpayers' dollars in the end.

Mrs Gandolfo: I can only speak for the board that I am associated with, which is in Brampton, so close proximity to Toronto, so construction costs are very, very high. I agree with what you are saying. I think the subject, is the subject, is the subject, no matter where or no matter what the building looks like on the outside.

On the other hand, unfortunately, we live in a society that has become very comfortable with the way its houses look and the appearance. I only say that because in the board I am associated with, we have had several delegations from parent groups who are very concerned about what the school will look like, what it will do to the neighbourhood and to the aesthetics, what the neighbourhood will look like. They do not want the high-priced houses to depreciate.

I can also say that more and more boards now are going to repeat designs and are cutting that high cost for architects. I know that for the French schools we are building, because we are not building that many yet, that is what we are doing. We are going to repeat designs. If the school is there and it meets the function, it suits the purpose, those costs are circumvented by way of using the same design. I agree with that principle.

Mr Hansen: I did get one comment from one of my constituents. They said at least one thing they did a blueprint on was the portables. I will close with that.

Mrs Gandolfo: Those are repeat designs, no doubt.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: I am from Nipissing—North Bay—and I think people are very aware of the architectural costs, but the plans have gone to southern Ontario. It has only happened to two schools, but other boards have approached the architect and the plans have gone there for schools. So I think it should happen and it could happen but there has to be a lot of work on it.

Mr Hansen: Another comment I would like to mention is that my son actually goes to school in Welland, which is a French-designated area. What has happened in Welland—and I see what you are saying in this particular thing. It is a French school, and they have received older schools and they are very slow at actually upgrading them to what the other schools are like. The one was built, I guess, about 1910 and that one was upgraded, one of the main French schools in Welland. So they inherited a problem.

Mr Yates: I can respond to the same thing on the board level. My board is in a Waterloo suburb. In the three or four schools we have built, we have used architects. We have built a centre core which the cities of Kitchener, Cambridge and Waterloo have contributed towards, which is used as a community centre also. Then we have put the remountable classrooms around, which can be moved as the school population 20 years from now grows down. They are not portables. They look like permanent structures, but they can be picked up and moved to a location 20 years down the road when you need another school. Then the centre core is left there as a community centre.

Mr Hansen: One more comment on the design. We have had quite a few conversations in this particular area. On construction of a school, a lot of people in my area and it is a rural area—look at the fact that the schools are used from 9 until 3:30, and some of these schools could actually be used as a recreational facility after hours and some of the design going into the school prohibits that.

These are just some comments. You know, you are a trustee. If you are going back out there and you are at one of these meetings, it would make it easier for the government if you come up with some solutions to some of the problems possibly.

Mr Yates: The schools that we design also, we make one area that we can seal off from, say, the classroom where the gymnasium, library and that type of area is not open to the public. All our schools, even the older schools, are open to the public through the entire year. But the newer ones are designed as a community centre in the core and then remountable classrooms built around it.

Mr Phillips: I would be happy to talk with you some day on that. I have had a lot of experience in that thing. I have a personal view on it. We are off the subject, I know, but I was chairman of the Metro school board, you probably know, and we had a program called student educational facilities, which was kind of cookie-cutter stuff, schools made in factories essentially, no architecture. I think we put schools in neighbourhoods that really were going to be there for 50 years and did not look right. It might have saved a maximum of 1% on the construction costs but probably lost it on some other things. So it is two sides.

That is why when we were looking at the northern relocation plans for ministries—the Ministry of Correctional Services, I think, has gone to North Bay—I was supported very much the buildings because they are going to be there for 100 years and enhance the community even if it meant a little bit more money over the short term. I think that North Bay one looks good, personally.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: Oh, it is a beautiful building.

The Chair: This is all very nice, but can we focus a bit on the question then.

Mr Phillips: I am sorry. You have a recommendation, Mr. Sutherland, on 13%. I am just thinking of the short term now. We have got very good recommendations over the long term that will be very useful, but just in terms of looking at the short term, the recommendation on the grants lineup for the year of 13%, I think. My recollection was another committee group came in recommending 11%, but maybe my memory is going.

The Chair: It was 11%.

Mr Phillips: It is all a blur now. I was wondering on what basis the two groups might have reached a different conclusion.

The second thing is, you have mentioned your personal opinion on the ceiling, but I think we had another. We had a school board in here earlier today that took the opposite view in a fairly strong way.

Mr Yates: I figured they would.

Mr Phillips: You may or may not have been here at that time.

Mr Yates: No, I was not. I knew I was living dangerously.

Mr Phillips: I am just on the 13% versus the 11%.

Mr Yates: The 13% we were going on, we were using the Ontario Public School Boards' Association figures. They are talking about the $200-million—at least the 4% for non-educational costs and an estimated 9% for educational services increases this year, and that is where we are up with the 13%.

Mr Phillips: So that reconciles the difference between the 11% and the 13%. Thank you.

The Chair: Was there another question?

Mr Sutherland: Actually, I just want to pursue this question about the portable schools and leaving them in the community, because I was told there was one professor here and at one of the universities who said that we have got a real problem right now if we are going through this growth phase in enrolment but that later on we are going to have to close these down. I believe his suggestion was that we build schools that you can turn into nursing homes because we have got an aging population, or senior citizens' homes. I do not know if there has been much development.

I guess the other thing I just want to comment on is, I am not familiar enough with what the Ministry of Education guidelines are. Are there certain size requirements or maximum size requirements for elementary schools?

Mr Yates: Oh, yes. Everything depends on the enrolment, because you have to produce figures that students are coming in before you get any approval.

Mr Sutherland: Right, okay. But in the small towns there are a lot of small elementary schools where new subdivisions popped up. In that way, what are the requirements?

Mr Yates: If you are going to build a new subdivision, I know it is the same anywhere in the province. You have to produce the number of students who will be in that school.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, but are there regulations on how far you can bus kids at the elementary level, or is that set by a board? In a town of 10,000 people, there are schools from grades 1 to 6, and I think there are five different ones, small schools.

Mr Yates: I do not think there are any written-down regulations on how far you can bus a child, but there are considerations certainly from the parents' viewpoint for the time they are spending on the buses and that type of thing.

Mr Sutherland: Right.

Mr Yates: People today are not the way they were when I went to school. People today wish to have a school in their neighbourhood.

Mr Sutherland: Right.

Mr Yates: Very much so.

Mr Sutherland: I walked a quarter of a mile every morning to get the school bus.

Mrs Gandolfo: Just to add to that, in the case for example of French schools, in some areas our schools are becoming more and more regional schools. So the transportation time or distance varies, and I guess each local board wants to retain a certain autonomy in deciding how far it wants to go with the busing. But it is pretty much at the local level.

Mr Yates: There are two corrections I might make to you. On page 3, at the bottom, it says 1991. It should be, on the fifth line from the bottom, 1990. It was a misprint. The same thing happened on page 5 in the middle of the last paragraph. The first $200 million had increased over 1990, not over 1991, just so there is no confusion.

The Chair: You could have just brought it back next year. Do we have any other questions for this presentation? Seeing none, thank you for coming this distance. It was very good to of you to take the time.

Mr Yates: Thank you very much for hearing us.

Mr Christopherson: I believe that does end our planned hearings.

The Chair: It ends it for this week. We do have some planned for Monday morning.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, and I just want to address and place a motion regarding giving some direction to the research staff as to some of the general thrusts and themes of what at least the first-cut draft report might look like, as well as perhaps spelling out a time frame for having that report available. We are now being circulated with the summary of recommendations, which I understand is a straight listing of all the recommendations that we have received to date. Is that correct?

The Chair: Till noon today.

Mr Christopherson: Till noon today, right. And all of this preparation of draft documents, as I understand it, is of preliminary drafts in light of the fact that there are still some presentations to be heard Monday, but we do have time frames that have to be realistically addressed in which to finalize an actual report that the majority of this committee can support and send on to the House. Therefore what I would like to do, Mr Chair, is to move that the—and if I am in any way offending by virtue of how I am wording the motion, I apologize ahead of time, and perhaps I can be corrected now or after the meeting, but I would move that we direct the research staff to produce a preliminary draft report incorporating the following themes and categories. One, under the the heading of the economy, the impact of the recession.

The Chair: Go very slowly.

Ms Anderson: Unless you have it written down.

Mr Christopherson: No. I was again thinking of Hansard, but that is okay. None of this is firm; it is meant to be just a general direction. But under that general heading, things like the deficit, job losses, the economic restructuring and a comparison with the previous recession. That is under the impact of the recession.

And under cause of the recession and the contributors of the recession, such as high interest rates, high Canadian dollar, the war in the Persian Gulf, free trade and globalization and the international recession.

Also under the general heading of the economy, a summary of the forecasts that we have received.

Next, an important theme is the concept of what I will call, for lack of better words right now, answers in partnership. That would be described in terms of the public input that we all would like to see more of.

Also, the consultative approach—more consultation in government as we develop these partnerships, and in partnerships developing and finding the answers to the problems that we face, and then talk specifically about some of those partnerships and how they may work. For example—this is not meant to be totally all-inclusive—I would also the offer the suggestion that it may not be possible to actually describe which partnership per se, if it looks like we are going to end up leaving anybody out. It just becomes such a long list that it loses its impact; that is open for discussion and debate.

We would be looking at partnerships, for example, with the arts community, communities themselves, business, labour and other governments.

The Chair: Education: Did you have a special category for that?

Mr Christopherson: It could be.

The Chair: I am just throwing this out because it was a major part of our presentations today, the teacher recommendations, the board recommendations and the colleges and so on.

Mr Christopherson: I guess I saw that as being of the other governments, part of the board of education and that whole relationship, and maybe under the heading, which comes under social issues. If you give a chance to finish it, then if I have left any gaps, I means.

Ms Anderson: So this is still just called partnerships.

Mr Christopherson: Which, I am sorry?

The Chair: Still part of the partnerships.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, the other government stop.

Ms Anderson: I have got lost now; I am sorry went through labour, education, other governments.

Mr Christopherson: Then stop. No, social issues be—

Ms Anderson: That is a major heading.

Mr Christopherson: No, the one after the next next major one was agriculture, a suggestion that we at agriculture as a separate issue. Then social issues under social issues, last on the list but by no means then talk about all the social issues and the specifics that were addressed.

That is merely to offer up strictly a general, frame by which staff would have some sense, if this carries, of what the majority is comfortable with of course as I understand this process, leaves it wide for debate and discussion following the finalization public hearings next Monday.

The Chair: Second? Mr Jamison. Are there comments or questions?

Ms Anderson: I have a question. Perhaps you elaborate a bit on the partnerships section, particularly specifics. You want us to talk about what you have from education and from labour in that section. I am entirely clear what it is you would like us to put in particular section when we are looking specifically at partnerships that are in the answers and partnerships section.

Mr Christopherson: The first thing I mentioned to define it, if you will. What does it mean? The through that concept is the idea of the public input. Consultation is a big part of that.

The partnerships themselves, then, and I couched saying that if we end up with so many individual groups do a paragraph on partnerships with, you run the risk of leaving out a major group. Again, all we are offering framework. I do not suggest this has been fully—

Ms Anderson: This is to bring forward themes that have been presented to you in the course of the hearings opposed to drawing from anything else.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, at this point. For your work, yes, because it seemed to be that there was a lot of discussion from many of the presenters about the desire. In fact today many of them were saying: "We do not even here to bring forward dollar requests. We want to talk to you about working with us. We want to be plugged into the system." The motion suggests that this is a common thread that ran through the overwhelming majority submissions and that this section would reflect that, the importance of that partnership concept to the many of this committee.

Mr Phillips: It sounds fine. I think it would be realistic. I felt there was a lot of consensus by the kind of professional forecasters about where they see the economy going, so I guess that will be one of the things that emerges. I think the partnership thing will emerge. I think the challenge for us will be that so close to having gone through an election, with each of us having laid out our position, it is going to be very difficult for us. The Conservatives have probably already written their—

The Chair: Yes, we saw it in the paper today.

Mr Phillips: I would dare say that is about it. I think there will be where there will be some differences of opinion. They have said what they are going to say and I suspect we will graft on that from where we may descend to a slightly different view about how realistic it is to contemplate. But I think we ought to get going on it. My mind has been to rush right now. I cannot think any more. No, do not put that in Hansard. I can think now. It is all clear.

Mr B. Ward: We got that in the record.

The Chair: The oxygen is now there. You are snapping now.

Interjections.

Mr Phillips: I am fine now.

Mr B. Ward: Who was the guy who said that?

Mr Phillips: Thank you very much, Mr Stockwell. It was Mr Phillips speaking now.

Mr Christopherson: Just to clarify the third point under the general heading of the economy was indeed forecasts and I think it is important that we get the reflection of what was said. I think that might cover some of the concerns Mr Phillips raised.

The Chair: Do we need a time frame in terms of when we would like this to be available to us?

Mr Christopherson: If you can get an acceptance of that motion, I have a follow-up in terms of the timing on the draft.

Mr B. Ward: Tomorrow morning?

Mr Christopherson: Oh, you have extended it?

The Chair: Do we have a consensus? Do we need to have a show of hands on a vote? Everybody is happy with it? Very good. When would we like this?

Mr Christopherson: I would like to suggest or move that if it is humanly possible—I understand it may be tight, but it would be humanly possible—if that could be ready on Sunday evening around 6? If that is possible, that would allow the three parties an opportunity to acquire the drafts as they desired them on Sunday evening, so that on Monday afternoon after the draft is walked through by the staff, if time permits we can actually begin some debate. I think there is a concern on the part of the staff, and it is certainly shared by our caucus, over the limited time that we have to discuss this, and it is an important document.

The Chair: Could I interject with a question at this point? The Treasurer has not given us any firm date by which he would like to have our recommendations. Are you aware of any date or target time frame within which we are working?

Mr Christopherson: As I understand it—as a neophyte I always stand to be corrected—this whole operation after Thursday does not have any standing or any money to operate, and we have to be finished and have the report adopted by Thursday and that is our built-in time frame. Since you are being very successful at getting consensus—I did not want to load too much in at one time—the second part of this was to build in that the dissents, if there are any, and I suppose at a stretch one could imagine there might be—

Mr Phillips: You should allow for that possibility.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, that is what we will do. We will just prepare for the eventuality that happens. I would ask—if I can push the process, Mr Chair, through you—if five days following our work on Thursday is acceptable to—at least Mr Phillips is here and the staff—if that suits the time frame they would have for the dissents to be received by the staff. They could then be incorporated into the final report and delivered to the Treasurer within a week of our wrapup.

The Chair: So that is the 14th and 15th?

Mr Christopherson: I have to say that I have not yet talked to the Treasurer about that deadline. If that does not work, I will get back to this committee, but my assumption is that would indeed give him time to consider it.

Mr Jamison: A question to the committee: As far as meals are concerned, we are allowed to claim up to $27 without a voucher. The lunch, one meal a day, was provided. Should we make an adjustment in our allowance?

The Chair: The clerk has informed me that the adjustment will be done on a basis that they will take the cost and distribute it over the number of members of the committee and deduct it and there will be a sort of prorated—

Mr Phillips: I just had two sandwiches.

Mr Jamison: I just had one.

Ms M. Ward: I could do with two more right now. Who took it away?

The Chair: The press guy.

Interjections.

Ms Anderson: It is a question of getting some more copies at the same time.

Mr Christopherson: On that point, I was going to suggest that if the reports could be made available, and this I think will require the support of the offices of these other parties, the opposition parties, if the report could be available somewhere in the Legislature that is accessible and acceptable to everyone, then it would be up to each caucus to distribute them to their members should they desire them. The best would be if the committee, under your direction, were to receive them through the committee mechanism, but if that is not possible I think that second approach would leave it up to the caucuses to get it in the hands of their people themselves.

Ms Anderson: Can I ask another question?

Mr Christopherson: Sure. I am going to run out of answers eventually.

Ms Anderson: The reports are generally considered confidential, so they are normally signed for and signed in and out of people's hands. Part of that would depend on whether you go in camera or not when you are writing your report.

The Chair: I think this is the way we should handle this. I just throw it out as a solution, that the question is, if you want it available Sunday night, who in this building is available to get it on Sunday night?

Mr Christopherson: I can get them for our caucus. I can pick them up. I am not sure how I will distribute them, but I can pick them up.

Mr Hansen: But who do you sign with? Who do you get to sign?

The Chair: Is it possible that if they were available Monday morning—

Mr Christopherson: That does not work as well. The whole purpose of Sunday evening is that they can be read Sunday evening and discussions would be ready to go.

Ms Anderson: I shall be sleeping here.

Mr Christopherson: Could I not suggest this, Mr Chair? If indeed the research staff can provide the documents in that time frame, then can arrangements not be made for some type of courier service to ensure that they are mailed out, and it is up to each caucus and maybe clerk could contact the—I do not know if there are caucuses on these committees, but one person from each caucus who will find out where these things should be sent on Sunday night and send them out by courier, received with a signature.

The Chair: Who is going to sign for it?

Mr B. Ward: Whoever receives them.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. A lot of members are in town Sunday night.

Mr Hansen: You have Norm Sterling. He is going to be flying in from Ottawa-Carleton. Who do you have Murray Elston filling in for Monte Kwinter?

Mr Phillips: We do not need them Sunday night. Realistically, I do not think we will have any of our members who will be poring over it Sunday night. I believe anything Monday morning is fine for us, but you guys can do what you like.

Mr B. Ward: We will make arrangements together Sunday night.

Mr Hansen: I think they should be available to the caucus offices.

Mr Christopherson: The question is, do we have a clerk's office to ensure that they are provided or do we do it as we think we need it?

The Chair: I do not think we need all this Hansard. I will adjourn the meeting.

The committee adjourned at 1729.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 4 February 1991

The committee met at 1007 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

ONTARIO NATURAL GAS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: I think we should get a full morning of hearings and I see a quorum, so I would like to begin and welcome everyone here this morning. I would like to welcome the Ontario Natural Gas Association, Paul E. Pinnington, president. If you could introduce your companions this morning, we will get under way. We would like to keep the time frame to half an hour, starting about 10:00 a.m. You can begin your presentation.

Mr Pinnington: Thank you, Mr Chairman, and good morning to members of the committee. My name is Paul Pinnington and I am the president of the Ontario Natural Gas Association. To my immediate left is Mark Wolnik who is vice-president, operations, of Centra Gas Ontario. To my right is Carl D'Croix who is vice-president, administration, of Cliffside Utility Contractors Ltd, and to my immediate right is Brian Gabel, chairman of the association's finance and operating committee. Mr Gabel is also comptroller of Union Gas in Chatham, Ontario.

We are pleased to be with you and thank you for the opportunity of being here this morning. This is the fifth occasion that we have made presentations to this committee.

On behalf of the members of the association, we have prepared a brief entitled Policies to Strengthen the Ontario Economy 1991, and this text has been distributed to all members of the committee. Mr Gabel has prepared an overview of the brief, which he will take us through, and I assume it will probably take 18 to 20 minutes.

Copies of the brief have been provided to all committee members and with your concurrence, Mr Chairman, I would propose that my colleagues and I respond to questions on conclusion of Mr Gabel's presentation. The brief, along with Mr Gabel's comments have been provided to the clerk and a copy to Hansard. Additional copies of the brief are available to interested parties. With your permission, Mr Chairman, I would ask Mr Gabel to proceed.

Mr Gabel: Mr Chairman, members of the committee, thank you very much for this opportunity to speak with you today about Ontario's financial and economic affairs. The current economic and fiscal situation lends special significance to your pre-budget consultations this year. In my view, the 1991 Ontario budget will be one of the most important in recent history. We feel confident that the Treasurer will pay close attention to the committee's findings and recommendations.

The Ontario Natural Gas Association is the voice of the natural gas industry within Ontario. It has over 300 member companies and individuals, including gas producers and marketers, as well as transmission and distribution companies, equipment manufacturers, buyers, professional organizations and contractors. If we consider the four major gas utilities alone, members have in excess of $6 billion invested in the province. They employ over 7,000 persons, serve more than 1.8 million customers and pay taxes that approach $200 million. Our association has a vital interest in the economic wellbeing of the province.

We have forwarded to this committee and to the Ontario Treasurer a written report entitled Policies to Strengthen the Ontario Economy 1991. We will today endeavour to provide a brief overview of that report and the recommendations it contains. Our presentation will be dealing with four main topic areas: the economic outlook, the fiscal realities this government currently faces, the issue of the current tax burden and tax reform, and economic issues related to energy. I will recap our recommendations at the conclusion of the presentation.

Let me turn first to the economy. The economic outlook for 1991 is at present not terrific. The Canadian and Ontario economies are in a recession and a turnaround may not be expected until the end of 1991 or into 1992. Our economic woes are compounded by a recession in the United States, high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar. The conflict in the Middle East adds to our economic malaise. Consumers in the business community lack confidence that a dramatic turnaround can occur in the near future.

It is not a favourable economic outlook at all. In fact, we believe the Ministry of Treasury and Economics' December 1990 forecast to be somewhat optimistic. The ministry's forecast presumes a real increase in economic activity within the province of one half of 1% in 1991 and an average of 2.9% in the three subsequent years. Recent comments by the Treasurer have suggested that a less optimistic outlook may in fact result. In view of the weak economic situation, our association recommends that the 1991 Ontario budget avoid measures that might further depress the business and consumer confidence within the province.

For the medium term, the outlook is also far from rosy. We expect that economic recovery when it comes will be less robust than in the 1982-89 period. We can expect that increases in unemployment will take place before the recovery begins. There are two main reasons why the economy will be slow to rebound. First, consumers have relatively less capacity to spend than they had in 1982. Second, the deficit position that governments presently face hampers their ability to put forward new initiatives.

This slide shows the change in Canadian consumers' capacity to spend relative to 1982. You will note that in almost all cases—in fact, in all cases—there are fewer dollars to work with. That is showing the disposable income for Canadians that is taken up with various fixed expenses, such as mortgage debt, other forms of debt and income taxes and other taxes. So it is saying 50% of a consumer's income is taken by servicing his mortgage debt.

The Chair: They do not add up 100.

Mr Gabel: No, there will be other things.

Mr Phillips: I guess I do not understand that chart. Mortgages are 50% of income?

Mr Gabel: After taxes, yes.

Mr Phillips: And the other debts?

Mr Gabel: Other debts, such as car loans, credit cards, whatever else. Statistics Canada provides this kind of information on a regular basis.

Given the fiscal circumstances of government and the financial capacity of consumers, there seems little chance that we can spend our way back to prosperity. The greatest potential for stimulating an economic turnaround lies with the business community. If the confidence of the business community can be bolstered, then business activity will increase, boosting employment and incomes. Part of that increase in business activity will come from rising exports, once interest rates and the external value of the Canadian dollar are allowed to decline to lower levels.

Accordingly, as this slide shows, the association recommends that the 1991 Ontario budget contain no net tax increases and should convey a strong message of confidence in the business sector.

There is need for fundamental change in approach and attitudes if Ontario is to stay competitive in the global economy of the future. Our ability to compete and to raise our standard of living will depend to a large extent on our ability to improve productivity.

Our submission discusses the need for new problem-solving mechanisms. For example, we must find new ways to communicate and co-operate in the areas of worker training and technology advancement. In that regard, programs like the new Canadian Labour Force Development Board present a new opportunity.

Mr Elston: Can I ask a question?

Mr Gabel: Yes.

Mr Elston: You just make the statement that wealth will be increased by productivity. Is that right?

Mr Gabel: Yes.

Mr Elston: Wealth from what?

Mr Gabel: In terms of gross domestic product.

Mr Elston: Yes, I know, but wealth has to come from someplace, I do not care whether it is stated in the GDP or whatever it is called. Where are you looking at this wealth arising from? What sectors are you looking at as creating the wealth?

Mr Gabel: As a general statement, I think what we are saying is that whatever industries Ontario leans towards in future years are going to have to be competitive on a global scale. In order to be competitive on a global scale, the net outputs that are achieved per unit of input going to have to be greater than competitor nations.

Mr Elston: But are you suggesting that we in Ontario might very well choose the areas that we want to high for the creation of that wealth or are you just merely repeating the statement, "Wealth comes from better productivity"? That seems to me to be fairly self-explanatory, but

Mr Gabel: I think both really. If we look, for example, at Michael Porter's work on the area of productivity in nations, and I think he has a book out dealing with that particular topic, he suggests that nations and provinces should not be looking to specialize in all things. You cannot be all things to all people any more than you or I as individuals, can be all things to all people. We have to concentrate in the areas that we can do best, where we can add the maximum value. His proposition, and I think it is a logical proposition, is that by doing so you create the greatest wealth, not just for the companies but for the individual workers, because you are able to afford to pay them the maximum dollar for their labour input.

Mr Elston: So would part of your submission to the Treasurer, since he is asking for long-term as well as short-term advice, be that he highlight or isolate certain sectors of the provincial wealth in which to increase productivity?

Mr Gabel: Absolutely. I think there are certain areas where we can have a bigger bang for the buck.

Mr Elston: Does that come up later in your presentation? Am I getting ahead of myself just asking these questions?

Mr Gabel: No, I think in terms of trying to isolate what the particular industries are where we might achieve the greatest returns, we have not tried to do that in our proposal. There are other people who have tried to do that. I think the Economic Council of Canada has tried to put forward some suggestions in that regard.

As I recall, the Premier's Council was moving in that direction as well, that is, the Ontario Premier's Council. There are other people who are doing that kind of work for us. All we are saying is that we have to follow up on that work and try to make some definitive policy statements.

Mr Elston: So you are endorsing that activity then under the current administration.

Mr Gabel: Our recommendations in this area are two. First, as shown on this slide, we recommend that the standing committee review the findings and recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada on skills training and the proposed mandate and funding of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board for their implications for Ontario.

Second, we suggest that in 1991 the government of Ontario convene a trilevel intergovernmental conference with private sector participation to identify the issues and priorities and potential mechanisms for improved problem solving. Examples of issues they may wish to discuss are waste reduction and disposal alternatives and the economic consequences of public sector spending.

Now I would like to turn to the fiscal realities that we must face in the very difficult economy of today. We've, as the Treasurer has noted on a few occasions, a significant budget deficit. The 1980s was an era of very substantial tax increases. These tax increases financed dramatically increased government spending. Pressures for further spending continue, despite the size of the current deficit and the weak economy. It is a very difficult circumstance for a government and its constituents to face, but we must do it.

Based on the Ministry of Treasury and Economics' medium-term economic projections, ONGA estimates that if expenditures continue to grow at the rate experienced over the past decade and if taxes are not increased, the deficit could reach almost $12 billion in just four years' time. There is clearly a need for some restraint.

Mr Phillips: That is with the assumption that the GDP will grow at the rate the Treasury said it would grow?

Mr Gabel: That is correct.

Mrs Sullivan: With no added revenue or expenditure cuts.

Mr Gabel: With the inflation and revenue at 90% of GDP growth.

The Chair: Could I recommend that we go back to the format? I will take names and we will have the questions at the end in order, please.

Mr Gabel: Thank you. Ontario simply cannot afford another decade of successive tax increases. Accordingly, we recommend that the standing committee advise the Treasurer that assuming no tax increases, the expenditure growth rate over the medium term must be held in the region of 7% per annum simply to hold the deficit in the $1-billion range and that to balance the budget would require a growth rate in the 6% per annum range.

Mr Chairman, it should be noted that a 6% expenditure growth rate allows for approximately a 2% annual increase in real spending if inflation averages 4.1%, as forecast by the Ministry of Treasury and Economics.

Continuing on the topic of taxes, the tax burden in Ontario increases every year. When we reported to you a year ago, we estimated that the cumulative effect of provincial tax increases during the 1980s was to increase budget revenues in the fiscal 1989-90 period by as much as $7 billion, when compared to revenues that would have been taken had no tax increases been imposed.

During the 1980s, local governments also increased their tax revenues and the federal government has implemented tax reform. These changes in tax levels also impact Ontario residents. It is certainly an appropriate time for study of taxation in Ontario by the proposed Fair Tax Commission.

We recommend that the mandate of the Fair Tax Commission be decided and announced as soon as possible and that the commission address, in addition to equity issues, other equally important issues bearing on tax efficiency and simplicity and the impact of tax reform on economic growth and productivity.

We also recommend that for sales tax reform the government consider changes that would simplify tax compliance for Ontario residents and reduce tax administration costs for taxpayers and for governments.

Our final topic for discussion this morning is energy. Ontario accounts for one third of Canada's energy requirements. Our sources of end-use energy are diversified; however, steps must be taken to improve our energy security. We depend on oil for almost 40% of our energy needs and on electricity for another 20%. There are risks related to the supply of these two sources of energy, which account for almost 60% of our total end-use energy requirements. The Gulf war, for example, suggests that it would be prudent to reduce our dependency on oil. Moreover, Ontario Hydro has determined that the province faces the prospect of near-term electricity supply shortages. Natural gas and proven natural gas technologies are a viable alternative to oil, coal and, to some extent, electricity.

As I started to mention previously, Ontario Hydro's 25-year demand-supply plan indicates that even after exploiting the potential for electricity conservation, Ontario faces electricity supply shortages within this decade. The Environmental Assessment Board hearing will be assessing the requirements and rationale for new demand-supply options, including natural gas options, that have been identified by Ontario Hydro. Our association will be participating in a focused manner at this hearing.

We do have concerns, however, with the pace at which the adoption of these new electrical generation options might proceed. The Environmental Assessment Board hearing could take up to three years. For that reason, we recommend that the government take interim steps, as necessary, to ensure the timely development of parallel generation and to support Hydro in the timely integration of natural gas into Hydro thermal plants and also to encourage the economic substitution of natural gas for electricity, wherever appropriate.

One last energy topic is natural gas for vehicles, of which we have spoken to this committee in our prior presentations.

Natural gas for vehicles remains an important new market for the natural gas industry in Ontario, and member utilities have certainly been pursuing that opportunity. In excess of 8,500 Ontario vehicles are currently operating on natural gas and there are more than 40 natural gas refuelling stations within the province. We now have transit buses that run on natural gas and can refuel in seven minutes and operate for 19 to 20 hours before they are again refuelled.

It is, in our view, a market with tremendous potential, for more than $200 million of industry investment may be expended by the year 2000. If those investment levels are achieved, we might expect 400 million litres of gasoline to be displaced on an annual basis. As I said, it is a market with potential, but it is still a market that is in its infancy.

ONGA recommends that the existing NGV incentives be maintained to improve energy efficiency and energy security, to lower emissions and to provide necessary support to the NGV industry while it is still being established, and that the standing committee support this position.

To recap, we, as an association and as Ontarians, are concerned that the economic recovery may not begin in Ontario until late 1991 or early 1992, and that over the medium term economic growth may be modest when compared to the post 1981-82 period.

We are also concerned that for Ontario to compete in the global economy we must have measures implemented that allow us to improve our skills training and boost the productivity of industry.

At the same time, however, we have a concern that Ontario's fiscal situation requires a firm de-escalation of the expenditure growth rate. There is simply no room for another round of tax increases. There are, however, some opportunities for greater efficiencies at all levels. In that regard, we encourage greater co-operation among all three levels of government and between the governments and the private sector in order to jointly identify key issues and develop new mechanisms for problem solving.

Last, energy security is vital to Ontario, and demand for electricity will track higher as the economy strengthens. The government has to take interim steps as necessary, to ensure that the Environmental Assessment Board hearing on Hydro's demand-supply plan does not delay unduly the implementation of essential and viable demand supply options. We also encourage your continued support for the natural gas for vehicles program. We hope you will take account of these recommendations in your report to the Ontario Treasurer.

Mr Phillips: Thank you very much for a very thoughtful presentation. A lot of work, I know, went into it.

On one observation somewhere in here about an imbalance of revenue and expenditures: Just to remind you, there was a surplus last year, and I think any reasonable person would say there would have been a surplus this year had we not run into a tough recession. Revenues, in spite of that, will be within 1% of what was estimated a year ago for this fiscal year. I suspect many of your businesses would like to be within 1% of their revenues, as we are now.

My question, though, really is just around the deficit. The fact of the matter is that an election was held just a few months ago. The new government was elected on the basis of not restraining spending but rather of implementing certain programs. Recognizing that reality—your advice, I know, is to raise no taxes—assuming that it is going to be difficult to restrain the spending in your line, would you still say no taxes and just let the deficit rise?

Mr Gabel: I think what we are saying is that expenditures have been rising at the rate of a little in excess of 10% per year in recent years. That is obviously a good deal in excess of what inflation has been running. We think the economy has reached the state where there is rather limited prospects to collect more taxes, and that there has to be every effort taken to reduce expenditures rather than to merely continue on an upward trend. I appreciate that may be more easily said than done.

Mr Phillips: It is having just gone through an election when the people spoke, and the agenda on which the party that won ran said, "Listen, there's a recession but we are going to spend this money." I think it is going to be a little difficult for the government to implement your proposals. That is all.

Mr Pinnington: I guess the decision regarding the government will spend we will not know until we see the budget. So to some extent, it is not appropriate for me to comment on what was said prior to an election.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate, as I say, a very thoughtful and I think extremely useful presentation. I am just trying to condition ourselves to reality.

Mr Pinnington: We recognize that the reality is extremely difficult, to curtail spending. The other side of the coin, of course, is the kinds of deficits that are projected here and they clearly could be extremely damaging.

Mr Phillips: Well, we never got our message across, I guess.

Mr Hansen: One slide there says, "Potential Ontario budget deficits: 1990-91." I notice 2.5, and I see that same figure at the end in 1994-95 at 11.8. Could I get a comment on the source of this and the research gone into it? I thought when I was listening to the Ontario Natural Gas Association I would be hearing more about natural gas. I did not expect to be hearing more of a banker's report.

Mr Gabel: We provide some information respecting that in our report, which is the blue document that we have gone out a little while ago. There is a chart that was included there at page 27. Perhaps I will give you the overview of it.

What we have tried to use is the Treasury and Economics forecast as to GDP growth over the forecast period to 1995, as well as the trend as to expenditure growth in recent years, which is an increase in expenditure growth of some 10.4% per year on average. We then have just deflated the revenues, which are from the Treasury department, and the expenditures, which are from the Treasury department, by those respective inflation rates, being the GDP growth and the expenditure growth rate.

It is not meant to necessarily be Treasury and Economics's forecast of what the future would be as much as saying here is what its forecast of revenue growth would be if we take past experience in terms of expenditure growth, and this is the kind of situation you are going to be facing four years down the road.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to move to the energy section of your report. Like my colleague, I think this report has been very well done.

I am looking at your conclusion that there may be electricity shortages in the 1990s. You see an increased role for natural gas. I wonder if you would comment on the availability of supply, including measures that may be taken by the provincial government or required by the provincial government in terms of pipeline activity and the kind of costs that might be needed. I also look to page 6, the possibility of need for interim measures re the DSP. I wonder what kind of interim measures you mean. Do you mean provincial incentives for co-generation?

Mr Pinnington: I will have a go at responding to those questions directly. I could speak for half an hour on these issues.

Recognizing that we are running close, let me tell you that in terms of the supply of natural gas, it is an abundant resource in Canada. In the western sedimentary basin—Alberta, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—the known reserves of natural gas are in the area of 90 trillion cubic feet. In terms of Canadian consumption, we are looking at 10 years-plus, in terms of a life index. There are very substantial additional quantities of gas known to be there that could be available, as the price of gas would increase. We do not see any problem in terms of an abundant supply and competitive price of natural gas.

Pipelines we view as a mechanical proposition. Given the need for a pipeline, the financing for a pipeline, we can put a major pipeline addition in place within a couple of years; 24 to 30 months is the time horizon, for example, quoted by TransCanada PipeLines.

With regard to the demand-supply plan itself and the interim measures, Hydro's demand-supply plan, as you know, had an emphasis for the addition of nuclear capacity. The timing of that capacity was seen to be 12 to 15 years out, going through the whole planning process until you had the capacity in place, but clearly the demand data, the statistics that are provided, indicate that power will be required in the interim. It is in that interim period that natural gas could provide significant quantities of power. A high-efficiency, natural gas, electric-power generation facility could probably be put in, say, in a matter of two to three years. The technologies are relatively simple, off the shelf. We can produce electric power as efficiently as over 50% using co-generation, which is a term you have, I am sure, heard of from time to time. Of course, there are immense environmental benefits to be had in using that technology, as well.

There are also other things in an interim way. There is still a fair amount of electricity used in heating homes, which we think is an inappropriate use. We have been working with Hydro, and it indeed is responding to reduce the power used in electric heating, in the heating of hot water. There are still many homes that use electricity to heat hot water, and of course we believe that an inefficient use of electric power as well.

Mrs Sullivan: I guess I was really wondering about government incentives for co-generation. Are they necessary to meet that interim supply need?

Mr Pinnington: The position we have taken in the past is that this industry should not be looking for incentives in terms of financial incentives. I would like to make that very clear. What we are looking for from this government is clear policy statements indicating how these energy forms are best used; legislation and regulation that would ensure there is a proper use of energy. But the natural gas industry has not asked for financial incentives.

There is one area that we have concentrated on recently: buyback rates for co-generation. We would look for guidance from the government and assistance in terms of establishing reasonable buyback rates on the part of Ontario Hydro.

Mr Wolnik: I might just add to that, the availability of technology to make co-generation is real, the use of natural gas in vehicles is real, and the use of higher-efficiency equipment for space heating is here, it is proven. So it is not a matter of going out to develop this technology. It is being used, it is here. It is just a matter of getting the kind of buyback rate for co-generation that will make this happen. I think that is the kind of thing this committee can help with.

Mr Elston: Just one comment about the energy section of your paper: You mentioned that natural gas could be a good alternative, but there are large parts of the province for which there is no option towards natural gas. I moved from one part of Ontario, Wingham—northern Huron county, which is not served at all. Happily, I moved to Walkerton, where we do have Union Gas supply. I am a monthly cheque writer, or at least either myself or my spouse is. But there are large parts of the rest of Bruce county which are not served and for which there is no alternative, so we continue to heat the water with electricity and otherwise. What do you do for those people who do not have any choice? Obviously, you do not want to give away the money by putting in a pipeline until you are guaranteed a big user at the far end of it.

Mr Pinnington: Any time a utility puts a new piece of pipe in the ground, for example, to serve Wingham or the peninsula area, it must appear before the Ontario Energy Board and prove that the pipeline is cost-justified. There have been programs; the distribution system expansion program that the federal government initiated some years back, where there was some subsidy, put natural gas into many, many communities.

There is now discussion going on with the Ministry of Energy and with Ontario Hydro and before the Ontario Energy Board to re-examine some of these areas that are marginal even now, to see if we cannot find ways to cost justify their number. Chalk River is one, Parry Sound, I think, is another. There is quite a number of areas we would very much like to get to.

In response to a question Mrs Sullivan asked, there is reason to believe that possibly between Ontario Hydro and the natural gas industry there may be some opportunity to find the funding for those pipelines that would be seen to be reducing the need for electricity. So we are attempting every reasonable creative activity we can to get gas to as many people as we can.

Mr Elston: You will probably agree, however, as the economy closes many plants permanently in some of these places—Wingham, for instance, just found out that one of its two door factories will be closed permanently as of April 1991. Stanley Door is done, Premdor is basically done, Royal Homes has closed down at least until March; we will find out what happens in the spring there. Would it be rational to assume that if all those plants are closing down and there is not a large industrial user, it would be less likely that you would be able to prove the economic utility of going in?

Mr Pinnington: There is no question, the smaller the load in any given area the more difficult it is to justify the pipe. The problem you mention is, I think, a very important one to this province and one we should be looking at very carefully. We are very much aware of the closing of these facilities.

Mr Elston: I got sidetracked a wee bit. I will look at a couple of areas on the report. There are two things. One is the comment about federal tax reform, which I am interested in, and the other is the issue of the first statement, which was a recommendation that the budget avoid measures that might further depress business and consumer confidence. I presume that basically means no increased spending, no increased taxes. Is that fair, to wrap it up in those two short words?

Mr Gabel: The absolute absence of tax increases or spending increases I am not sure would be absolutely essential. But certainly directionally, we have to be moving in that way. If you read the Economic Council of Canada document, which I think was its 27th annual review, it had a survey that had been done regarding consumer and business confidence levels and it really was a very grim report in terms of business confidence within the Canadian economy. I guess what we are trying to say is that we have to create a framework where we are saying that this is a good place to do business, that there are not going to be rude surprises, that we are going to be doing rational, thoughtful things that are creating a good environment for the long-term health of the province. I think that is really what we are trying to get the most.

Mr Elston: But your report, basically, to us, has said that there should be no net new taxes.

Mr Gabel: We would certainly encourage that, yes.

Mr Elston: Of the items in the Agenda for People, which I am sure you have sort of taken a look at in general, which would you highlight for us as being the rational and the ones you would say are irrational, if I can put it in your own words? An Agenda for People was the framework around which the election was fought and won by the New Democratic Party. You said that as long as the government takes after expenditures which are considered to be rational and therefore makes us look like a reasonable place to do business, we will be happy. If that is the case, which of the items in An Agenda for People would you think might be rational? Is that being too precise?

Mr Pinnington: We do not have a copy of the Agenda for People.

Mr Elston: Okay, let's take a look at a couple of items.

Pay equity: an increase in pay equity; application to the people who are not already covered by the pay equity legislation. Is that rational or irrational?

Mr Pinnington: We are in the middle of pay equity activity, obviously, at this point in time and certainly the industry is very much in favour of equitable pay. I think one of the major questions is, how do you establish that?

We are certainly struggling with those kinds of question think there is probably another extremely important one and this was mentioned in Mr Gabel's presentation. As you do these things you must remember that we have an extremely competitive environment that we are working in not just provincially, not just nationally not just internationally but globally. You mentioned Stanley Door and some of these people heading out of this province. This is an extremely critical observation. I am sure wages and salaries are one of the elements of that decision-making process, so we stand for it in principle but we are concerned about some of the costs associated with it.

Mr Elston: What would you think of the wage protection fund which was promised in An Agenda for People? Is that a rational provision?

Mr Pinnington: I think we probably have not had the opportunity to consider that. I am not sure what our corporate position would be.

Mr Elston: I am only going through some of the items because as we give advice to the Treasurer, he is going to have to make choices. When business comes to us and says, "We want to be sure that business confidence is kept at a high level and that we don't depress consumer confidence and the whole works so that our economy continues," we have to understand the choices to be made. The Treasurer, at least provide him advice on those choices. If he should not choose to go with pay equity, that is some advice that may be of help to him from your perspective. It does not mean that he is going to have to go with it. It is going to be rational to give 50% increases to nurses in this province, as the Premier has indicated there should be? Is that rational?

Mr B. Ward: Wait a minute now, 50%?

The Chair: Mr Elston, this is going on quite a bit of time. I do not really like to cut people off, but—

Mr Elston: You are going to cut me off.

The Chair: I would like you to wrap it up.

Mr Elston: Okay, I will go to the federal government tax reform issue. Do you characterize GST as tax reform? Is it not just tax substitution?

Mr Gabel: It is part of a tax reform plan. It is really a substitution of revenue sources.

Mr Elston: Okay, that is the first part. What is the rest of their tax reform plan?

Mr Gabel: The rest of the tax reform plan, as it was put into the legislation, over a period of time involves changes in taxation with regard to pensions and there was a whole host of other matters. This all took place several years ago and it has been implemented piecemeal over a period of time.

Mr Elston: Not all of it has; actually some of the plans came forward and were denied and turned down.

Mr Gabel: That is correct.

Mr Elston: The GST is the only part that has really come forward, I suspect, and it is really just a revenue substitution, in fact a revenue enhancer, is it not, instead of a tax reform?

Mr Gabel: My understanding is that over the long term it is a tax enhancer, yes.

Mr Elston: Is there something here in Ontario that you believe should be done with tax reform that would be characterized similarly to the GST?

Mr Gabel: I think what we were maybe trying to focus on when we were talking about the issues of efficiency related to taxation was the potential for economies between all the levels of government. The federal government now has its own version of the sales tax; the provincial has its own version of the sales tax. The federal government has income taxes; the provincial government has income taxes. They all have their own administrative procedures, their own bureaucracy to support tax collection and administration. They have their own auditors. It just strikes us as being an opportunity where—perhaps it is not going to work out entirely as efficiently as we would like—there are some opportunities for there to be economies realized by trying to meld these systems together to the extent that we can.

Mr Elston: So you would like to see it rationalized in terms of collection.

Mr Gabel: I would expect that the entire process could be rationalized somewhat.

Mr Elston: I just want one more line on this. That has to do with municipal taxes, because you have highlighted those as being much too high as well. Are you advocating change in the direction of revenues from municipal taxation in terms of the programs that they pay for now?

Mr Gabel: I do not think we are trying to focus on individual programs as much as we are saying that we have three levels of government that are all bordering on the same jurisdictions. In some cases the government at the federal level will have departments that are the same as departments that you have at the provincial level. You have municipalities that are involved as well in things like welfare. Each one of them is creating its decisions in isolation to an extent. We have to believe that there is, again, potential for greater efficiencies to the extent that there can be some commonality in terms of objectives. I am going to deal with this and you are going to deal with that, folks. So we are not going to try to cross boundaries.

Mr Elston: So the association would advocate a centralizing of the taxation authority and perhaps rationalization into one or two precise areas of that.

Mr Gabel: I am not necessarily saying a centralization of the tax authorities as much as let's try to co-operate to the extent that we can, folks, find a common ground, eliminate the duplication to the extent that we can.

Mr B. Ward: I will be fairly brief. I think just for the record, though, if Mr Elston was here when the ONA were here for their presentation, they in fact stated that that 50% was a misconception played up by the press and that that was not part of their demands, just for the record. I do not believe the Premier committed to 50%.

Mr Elston: Thanks, Brad.

Mr B. Ward: Just pick up the phone and call.

Just a question on your recommendations that there should be no increase in taxes, no increase other than the 6% in spending. That would suggest that you would be recommending we would be looking at spending priorities, spending efficiencies, programs that are existing that perhaps should not be. Is that what you envision?

Mr Gabel: That would be fair.

Mr B. Ward: I noticed in your blue-book brief, and you touched on it in the black book, you mentioned the natural gas vehicles program, yet I could not find how much of a tax subsidy overall the government gives to that initiative. There can be no denying that your industry would benefit from this program, which is why you are recommending continuing it. Just so I have an understanding how much of a subsidy we are indirectly or directly giving your industry, do you have an overall tax expenditure figure for your industry if you include the NGV program? Because I could not find how much the overall program cost. You mentioned Alberta and the federal government.

Mr Gabel: I could not tell you what the number would be. What the NGV industry receives at the present time is I believe the forgiveness of the provincial sales tax on vehicle conversions.

Mr B. Ward: Up to $1,000.

Mr Gabel: Yes, up to $1,000.

Mr B. Ward: And waives provincial fuel taxes.

Mr Gabel: That is right.

Mr B. Ward: Is it possible we could get that from our Treasury, Mr Chairman, or is that something that—
Interjection.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you. So you did not actually have a total figure other than the specifics and a recommendation that we continue that subsidy.

Mr Pinnington: I am sure we have that data.

Mr B. Ward: If you can, just from your end, to see how it compares, I would appreciate that. It would help us to make the recommendations to the Treasury.

Mr Pinnington: I will commit to provide that information.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for your presentation.

CREDIT UNION CENTRAL OF ONTARIO LTD

The Chair: Our next presenters are the Credit Union Central of Ontario Ltd; Warren Hanstead, director, and Bruce Neville, director. You could begin and perhaps you could introduce yourselves since there are more than two people there.

Ms Mac Donald: My name is Adelaide Mac Donald. I am general counsel for Credit Union Central of Ontario Ltd.

To my left is Warren Hanstead, who is a director of Credit Union Central of Ontario. He is also general manager of National Defence Credit Union Ltd in Ottawa. He is a former chairman of Credit Union Central of Ontario. Presently he is a director of Co-operative Trust Co of Canada. He is a former director of the Ontario Share and Deposit Insurance Corp and he is also a former director of our national organization, the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society.

To my right is Bruce Neville, who is also a director of Credit Union Central of Ontario Ltd. He is also president of the Workers Compensation Board Credit Union Ltd.

We are very pleased to have the opportunity to speak to your committee. Our brief includes some information about Credit Union Central, about credit unions. We also have included some notes on the economy which were prepared by our national organization and presented as part of the federal pre-budget consultation process. We have also included a few notes on some things which are credit union concerns that have implications for the budget.

Mr Hanstead will speak very briefly on what the credit union movement is, Mr Neville will speak on our role in the Ontario economy and then Mr Hanstead will briefly speak again on some budget implications. However, we would like to leave ample time for questions and we would be very pleased to answer any questions you may have.

Mr Hanstead: I think it should be clear that within our brief you do not see us make any recommendations. We do have a couple of concerns we wish to talk to afterwards.

We believe it is very important that the government of Ontario realize how large the credit union system is in this province and what implications there can be on any program you do put into effect or cancel. I will just briefly go through what is the credit union system in Ontario, how large we are and, as I said, Mr Neville will follow after me.

Actually, the Credit Union Central of Ontario is the provincial organization. It is the financial service and trade association for about 600 credit unions in Ontario. There are about 1.3 million members of credit unions that belong to Central. Central is owned and controlled by its member credit unions. Membership is not mandatory, but the vast majority of credit unions in Ontario are members. I think around 61% belong to our central, then we have another 25% that belong to two French centrals, so the organized movement in the province of Ontario is about 85% within three centrals.

The Credit Union Central is governed by an 18-member board of directors and the current chairman is Mr Carl Zawadzki, a director of Family Savings and Credit Union in St Catharines, and Mr Ed Grad is our chief executive officer. It should be noted that the credit union directors are elected at our annual meeting each March and they come from all parts of the province, from different types of credit unions and different sizes of credit unions.

The Credit Union Central of Ontario employs 230 people, has assets of $1.2 billion and had a net income in 1989 of $6.7 million. The 586 member credit unions provided financial services to 1.3 million members, have approximately $7.4 billion in assets, employ approximately 3,000 people full-time and 1,200 part-time across the province, and have nearly 9,000 volunteers.

I think it should be noted that the number of outlets credit unions to serve people combined is larger than any of the major chartered banks. The credit union system as a whole has the largest distribution of outlets in the province.

If we want to talk about not just the credit union system in Ontario or the central but also the Ontario movement—the combined movement in the province of Ontario has $10.2 billion in assets—we have 2 million members there are 5,000 full-time and part-time employees.

The roots of the Ontario credit union system are found in the mid-19th century in Europe, where farmers pooled their savings in credit societies in order to assist those of their number who were on their own financially unable to invest in land, livestock and equipment. A similar concept for the financial difficulties of the poor led to the establishment of Canada's first credit union in 1900 in Lévis, Quebec. The Ontario credit union movement consists of people who have joined co-operatively to pool their savings. Credit unions make loans to their members at favourable rates, provide other financial services of interest to their members and return net earnings to their members in the form of dividends and interest rebates on loans.

I just got my coat tugged here. I have a tendency, when I am reading a speech, to go faster than I should. In fact I always get tugged at the union meeting for doing the same thing. So you can always take your tape and slow it down later on.

Each credit union is locally owned and democratically controlled by its members, who are associated by a common ethnic, religious, occupational or community bond. Examples of credit unions falling into these categories are Ukrainian Credit Union Ltd, Catholic Parishes of Pelee Credit Union Ltd, Provincial Civil Servants O.R. Credit Union Ltd, Auto Workers (Oshawa) Credit Union Ltd and Hamilton Community Credit Union Ltd. Local ownership, democratic control and a common bond of association which are the characteristic elements of the Ontario credit union movement, lead members to identify closely with their respective credit unions.

I have a total of five more minutes so we do this democratically and we understand your problem and Bruce more long-winded than I am. So what I will do is go to Bruce to speak at this time and he can carry on.

Mr Neville: And then I will get kicked.

Leading into the economic impact, to re-emphasize, we are self-help financial institutions serving 1.1 million members in Ontario over the age of 18. We are member-owned- and -controlled and we help communities; we help people in communities. We are community-oriented, we support and finance community projects such as non-profit housing through our local credit unions, and if there is a project in an area that is too large for the local credit union to handle, then Credit Union Central syndicates loans and it is handled through Credit Union Central.

We are in all areas of the province, as Warren says, and we have gone into some areas after the banks have pulled out so that we can service the members in that area. We are sensitive to our members' needs, particularly during economic downturns. The local economy in the area, the local economic outlook, impacts the credit unions which, as we said, are localized financial institutions. We help our members get through the tough times such as during layoffs that will occur now. Credit Union Central will provide increased lines of credit to the credit unions in the areas to help when members draw down on their savings, and they are drawing down on them faster than the other members in the community are repaying their loans.

I guess we should tell you that our system is consolidating and that we are in the process of developing a common vision that will allow the system to really unify and work towards a common vision in Ontario. We are working to get our message out and we want to bring our message before this committee. We are innovators in financial institutions. We are the ones that brought you daily-interest savings accounts first and the banks copied. We brought you the weekly payment mortgages. We brought you the debit cards and we brought you the automated teller machines. Because of it and because they were so successful, they were copied by the other financial institutions. I guess we will leave it at that.

Ms Mac Donald: Warren is going to speak on some of the budget implications of credit union concerns.

Mr Hanstead: One of the major items that we have been into discussion with, and Mr Elston was well aware of in his past role, is that we were trying to work with the Ontario Share and Deposit Insurance Corp and other credit unions to finally put away under wraps the problems that stem from the early 1980s, the very high interest rates and depression which caused the credit union system of Ontario to have some problems within its own ranks.

To date, the credit union system has funded that itself. There is a large outstanding obligation that the system is so prepared to look after. However, we feel that sometimes it might be a little bit too much for one organization to carry and we were talking about approaches to the government for some $28 million of funding to help offset some of those costs. That is only $28 million out of something like $112 million or $115 million of deficits that have to be looked after. The credit union system would be paying the balance.

With the change of government and change of people in different spots, we are not sure where this is going. We do not want it to be lost or left under the table. As I said, we are prepared to do our share, but when we take a look back at the deposit insurance corporation, it has been a few years since we have had any direct impact as to how it is managed and operated, and although we are required to pick up some 60% of the bill, we did not have any democratic process.

There were opportunities for appointments of director of that corporation that could look after the central, but for whatever reason that was not taken and done. Therefore, for probably six or seven years we feel that not having an opportunity for input, and the expertise that the central has and its members have, to ask for some government assistance in retiring this obligation so that we can continue to build and go on into the future is very important. The other thing is that we pay all those premiums ourselves and it goes directly to the credit unions.

Another item we understand you are talking about is payroll deductions for civil service employees and there is some talk that maybe this will not be available. This is very important to the credit union system, not only provincially but federally, and managing a federal credit union, there was talk of that there as well at one time, but we think that is an excellent way for people to save. We think it is an excellent way to look after obligations. Somebody gave statistics on mortgage loans, what percentage has to be used each month. We find that payroll deductions are just a great way for our members to look after their obligations and we would not want to see anything done to cancel that, at least without an opportunity to make representation to the government.

Those are two of the major items. One thing I think you also have to understand is that when we talk about locations and implications of taxes, when you have the number of locations that we do have in the province of Ontario, anything that impacts even down to municipal taxes has an impact on our bottom line so that even the health tax that was put on—when you look at the number of employees we have who used to be paid for by the employees and ourselves, 50-50, in some cases is now 100% paid by the employer. I think the gist of our whole brief and discussions is that we are much larger than a lot of people in this province believe we are and we have more to do, but we need to have discussions with the government and not be forgotten.

We had an opening of a building not too long ago in Mississauga and Mayor Hazel McCallion made a comment about how she did not need to borrow any money from the system, that Mississauga was in a positive position. One of the members of the government who was cutting the ribbon responded, "Well, Hazel, maybe you can put some deposits in the credit union system." Perhaps we could suggest to the provincial government as well, that if you have some loose cash laying around for a period of time from time to time we would be glad to take it off your hands and pay you a fair return. This gives a chance to bid on it and we would be pleased to serve you.

Ms Mac Donald: That completes our presentation and we would be very pleased to answer questions.

Mrs Sullivan: I wonder if you could review in some more detail the stabilization and rehabilitation services that are required. Given that the major part of your problem occurred during the recessionary period and the period of high interest rates, what do you see in the future as a result of this particular recession and continuing high interest rates?

Mr Hanstead: On the stabilization and rehabilitation right now, the credit union system has really done an awful lot over the last 10 years to straighten out its affairs and those that were not doing as well as the others. I would suggest we are probably coming near the end of it, but we are going to have to do some maintenance and look after things in that way. We have some outstanding obligations with some credit unions that just cannot recover on their own and they are going to have to be helped by the total picture. As far as that part goes, we think that is basically under control and our major concerns of the past are looked after.

How are we doing now? What we have learned from 1980, 1981 and 1982 is to be better managers. I think anybody who goes through a difficult time learns to be a better manager. The programs we put into effect across the province for matching our assets and liabilities, building reserves—which I have found very strong over the last couple of years—etc., have enabled us to put into place that which has to be in order not to have the problems we had in the past.

I am not saying that we are not going to have a bad problem from now to now. I do not think any financial institution can get away from that. Even with your major chartered banks, once in a while you hear that a branch here or a branch there is not working very well and they close it up as it is. What happens with those institutions is that if something happens within one of the major chartered banks, it never really shows up directly on the bottom line because it is just a part of a branch system.

However, within the credit union system, because we are individually chartered with different bonds of association, if one of them happens to have a problem it becomes very knowledgeable. I think we can take the Toronto Board of Education Staff Credit Union from a few years ago that got off to the side and started to build its own Las Vegas in northern Ontario. They say those things might happen from time to time, but we feel very confident that with the risk management programs and with the stabilization programs in effect, this present recession will not have an adverse affect on us unless you tax us too much.

Mrs Sullivan: What is the current relationship with OSDIC?

Mr Hanstead: OSDIC is a separate government agency. It is the deposit insurer. I think there is one representative from the Fédération des caisses populaires on that board. That is independent of the credit union system. That is one reason why we said that we should have some help with this, because we have not had any input into it. It has been run on its own and very independent of the credit union system. It has been more of a policing and repair depot than what we think it should be: stabilization and rehabilitation. Stabilization and rehabilitation starts long before there is a problem. It starts in the training of the staff, the education programs you have, the courses and everything else like that allows us to train the people in some of the credit unions so they can manage properly.

Ms Mac Donald: I think the shareholders of OSDIC are credit unions, and normally in other corporations shareholders have the right to elect the board of directors. However, with OSDIC the board is appointed by cabinet, by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. So while credit unions have the responsibility for paying OSDIC's bills, they do not really have the opportunity to say how, or manage how, OSDIC conducts its business. There is the right under the act for Credit Union Central, for instance, to have one of its nominees appointed to the board. However, as Warren mentioned, the government has not appointed central's nominee for a good number of years.

Mr Neville: Just in response to your question on what we expect to happen during this recession, I think it is important to note that when the deficits did occur in credit union the reserve levels legislated at that time were 1%, and now it is on a schedule to get them all to 5% by 1997. Right now within the system, the average reserve level is approaching 3% and 250 out of the close to 1,600 credit unions are at 5% or better in reserves. So we do not expect it to have the same impact.

Mr Hanstead: In fact back in 1981, if I have the right year, the net reserve position on the system of Ontario for the credit unions was a negative position. We came back basically on our own from a negative position to close to 3% reserves and scheduling 4% to 5%.

Mr Phillips: I am just chuckling to myself about the Toronto credit union because during the election one of those principals rolled his window down as I was campaigning and yelled he would not support me and had told all his friends not to, because I would not give him a hand on getting a licence again, I guess.

My question really is whether the credit unions have a kind of a perspective on the economy. We have had quite a number of groups before you, I think most have felt that come the middle or the latter part of 1991 we are heading out of the recession in the province. You are very close obviously to a lot of people and I am just wondering whether the credit union has a perspective on that or not. My other question is that I think one of the challenges will be pools of capital for businesses, whether they will need help developing jobs in the province and whether the credit unions see themselves playing a role in that or not.

Mr Neville: I guess on this first part of your question with regard to the economy and projected outlook, we get input from all of our credit unions, but we really do not take a stand on the economy or turn around and say that the government should be doing this or the government should be doing that. As I say, for the most part we are self-help organizations and we worry about the economy. We worry about loaning money to our members, in effect, and helping the members in the areas when they are in trouble.

Do we have an outlook as to when the economy might pull out of the recession? I guess not a prediction, but I hope that, yes, it is towards the end of the year that you are looking better.

Mr Phillips: I did not know whether the Central Bank tracked anything or not to sort of give the members an indication of how you are feeling about it.

Ms Mac Donald: Contrary to the situation with some other financial institutions, we do not have an official internal economist, although we do have someone who does a kind of keep the board abreast of things. That is why we have included notes that were prepared by our federal—

Mr Phillips: I thought they were very thoughtful too.

Ms Mac Donald: Thank you. I think that in what they do cover they appear to be very similar to what the Treasury as in his own economic outlook. They are not as extensive as what is covered here, but I think basically they are similar.

Mr Phillips: Pool of capital: Is there any—

Mr Hanstead: I guess Central has a lot of liquidity right now, but we need that also as a backup if we have any particular sector that requires funds in a hurry. But credit unions, as Bruce said earlier, are prepared, in local areas where there is a need for capital in small businesses that the local credit union cannot handle itself, to do it by going to Central and syndicating loans. Yes, we are prepared to do that, but we are also going to be moving cautiously. They have not needed our capital for some years, some people, but when it gets tough getting it somewhere else, then they want our capital. We are prepared to work towards that and do whatever we can. We are interested where we are.

I think you can just take some of our track record, and we also go into areas where other people have left, for whatever reason it might be, to make sure services are provided. There was one spot up in the Georgian Bay area where the bank pulled out a few years ago and the credit union went in. I also know it from my experience at National Defence Credit Union. You think it is strange, but the chartered banks pulled off the bases at Kingston, Borden and Petawawa. Borden has maybe 6,000 people on it and Petawawa about 8,000 people, and they pulled the banks right out. There are no services to those people at all.

Our credit union went in after that. It is not easy to start up a financial institution from base roots and it costs you money to do it, but our credit union was dedicated and went to those three bases and made sure financial services were there. I think there are other examples all across the province where that has happened, if we go up to northern Ontario or Dryden and Vermilion Bay and to Hudson and a few other places like that to provide those services when nobody else was there.

Mr Neville: We are not major—

Ms Mac Donald: In fact we are restricted in the percentage of assets that we can put into commercial bonds, and it is an area—

Mr Elston: Some more so than others.

Mr Hanstead: Some more so than others, but that is a different subject matter. When you get to talk about legislation rather than just on the economy and where we are going, we will be pleased to come back again because there are things we would like to do, but we do have a need for our legislation to be updated, and perhaps when that happens we can serve more people.

Ms Mac Donald: In another forum we are asking that some of those things be changed.

The Chair: Are there any other questions on this presentation? If not, thank you very much for your presentation.

Mr Hanstead: Thank you. I know I spoke fast, but we did not go much over half an hour.

ATTRACTIONS ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presenter is Attractions Ontario: Don Dailley, past president.

Mr Dailley: My name is Don Dailley. I represent a small but important association in the province called Attractions Ontario. We have just over 100 members and they range through most of the attractions you would be familiar with, including the government and non-profit ones, together with the private and commercial attractions.

We have a problem we are going to try to stick to—one point this morning, if I may. It is a problem that is not well understood by government. That is the problem of the amusement taxes that are charged in the province.

The opening line might be that capital punishment—you may be surprised to hear that today—is when government taxes commercial operations to get the capital that it needs to go into business in competition with you, and then taxes the profits on your business in order to pay for its losses. That in part is what I am here to talk to you about.

The recession has hurt people, no question. In Ontario we are struggling against high interest rates, an overvalued dollar, the free trade agreement and unfair taxes generally speaking, not the least of which is the GST. I am here to talk about unfair taxes, the amusement tax being one.

Ontario's tourism is hurting. A larger and more democratic economy must share both the benefits and the burdens of change—I would like to talk about benefits and burdens—and everyone must look beyond the recession to build a sound recovery, no question. We all must be more creative to help plan for new jobs and new investment. I am glad that I have a chance today to bring up some of these issues.

I would like to talk about recovery and new investment and more new jobs. Attractions Ontario has suggestions to save this government substantial money, which if implemented could be reallocated, hopefully, to the important tourism marketing initiatives.

Hon Mr Philip: Now you have our attention.

Mr Dailley: Do I? Finally. Good stuff. Okay, unfair taxes: The sales tax on admission takes an unfairly large share of the attractions' profits. The tax exemption level places the Ontario government in a price-setting role, a role that surely was not contemplated or considered desirable by government.

The tax exemption level, at $4, has not been increased to keep pace with inflation. Under benefits and burdens, the exemption of the public sector attractions is competitively unfair to the private sector. The sales tax on admissions has resulted in the deterioration of the Ontario tourist attractions. The total amount of admission tax paid by Ontario's tourist attractions does not represent a significant revenue source to our province.

Regarding more new jobs, the amount of and method of admission taxation has a significant detrimental impact on the development of new tourist attractions and the resulting capital spending and job creation.

I am thrilled to be here, and what I have to say is less important than what you need to hear. So without any further ado—you have got copies of our briefs—I would like to answer any questions you may have regarding the amusement tax.

Mr Sutherland: I am in need of clarification. You said the public sector attractions do not charge the tax, or do they absorb it some other way?

Mr Dailley: The tax is an oddball thing. It came out of the hospital tax, going back many decades. My attraction is African Lion Safari and I can speak more directly about it than I can about many of the other major ones. The attractions with which I compete, for instance, Ontario Place, the Ontario Science Centre and the Royal Ontario Museum—marvellous attractions in this province—do not have to collect this tax from their visitors. I have to collect it from my visitors coming to me. That is obviously an unfair distortion in the marketplace. It creates a very un-level playing field.

Also, non-profit attractions which are not government-funded do not have to collect this tax from their visitors. An example would be, for instance, Casa Loma. So you look at a whole range of attractions sitting at about the $7 to $7.50 level, and the publicly funded ones such as Ripley's Believe it or Not—let's see; I have a list—Tivoli Miniature World and others have to collect the tax from their visitors, and yet the Ontario Science Centre and Science North and these other ones do not. They sit at about the same price level. Does that help you?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, it does. If I may just do a follow-up, you said the $4 has not kept up with inflation. Are you recommending that the exemption go to a specific amount?

Mr Dailley: Specifically, our recommendation is as follows: Although this tax is a pitfall of many, many inequities, we recommend that the exemption level be raised to $7.25. We have a chart attached—I assume you have a copy of this and have read it. As you see from the chart that is attached, this will maintain the value of the $3 exemption level when it was introduced in April 1977 through to December 1990, and we think this is the only ultimately short-term fair solution to the government.

This does not address all the inequities of some attractions which compete with each other having to collect from their visitors the tax and others not having to. It is not even a public-private discussion, because the way the legislation is written is so specific in what is included that by nature of taxes themselves, I am told, many other attractions which were not contemplated when the legislation was last rewritten, visitors to them are in effect tax free. You get the anomaly of water parks, because they are not listed, not having to collect from their visitors.

So you get water parks at $14.95, $16.95, in that range, not having to collect any tax at all, and you get an admission at Marineland at $16.95 for an adult collecting 68 cents from their visitors; or African Lion Safari, my own, on an admission of $11.95 having to collect 89 cents from our visitors. So it is really a minefield of problems in the tax, some of them being excluded because they are non-profit, government-funded, others because they were contemplated as potential attractions when the legislation was last rewritten.

Mr Sutherland: I think that might be a good issue the Fair Tax Commission to examine when it comes fruition.

Mr Dailley: I think that is a marvellous initiative frankly, that they would even contemplate this.

The Chair: They are going through the process at time of choosing the people to be recommended to standing committee on government agencies, people would be on that Fair Taxation Commission.

Mr Phillips: That is a contradiction in terms, any fair taxation.

I am trying to figure out your recommendation. I must have forgotten to read it.

Mr Dailley: Let's just start in the more recent history. It was last updated to the $3 exemption level. What that means is that anybody charging $3 or below on an admission does not have to collect the tax from their visitor. That is what that meant then. That was raised in April 1977 to $3.50 and was raised in May 1983 to $4. So we are sitting with a 1983, $4 exemption level. We recommend that the exemption level be raised to $7.25. This would bring it just using inflationary factors, CPI generally, to where the $4 level should be. We are saying to you that we recommend that as an immediate short-term way at least to give some kind of relief to the tourist attractions in the province, those that do have to collect this tax.

Mr Phillips: But you are you not recommending that the publicly funded attractions also pay the tax.

Mr Dailley: There are many pages in our brief. Part of that says, if I may just find it quickly here: There is a problem in this, in that caught in this amusement tax are not just the tourist attractions but also sporting events and performances and movie theatres. One of our recommendations on the long term is that this whole tax be reviewed and that the tourist attractions themselves be exempted from this tax. We realize that that cannot happen quickly. It is going to be a complex issue and difficult to do. It is going to take people with some understanding and leadership who are willing to try and work their way through this amusement tax minefield. The short-term recommendation is that the admission tax-floor be raised from the 1983 $4, this spring in the budget, to $7.25.

Mr Elston: I want to apologize to the presenter, because we do not have your presentation yet. We are about to receive it at some point, so if we are looking rather blankly at your recommendations it is because we do not have it.

I was not sure exactly how far you have gone on beyond the issue of the amusement tax. I know it is very confusing. Some of the suggestions Mr Sutherland made, for instance, are good ones and some of the things Germain has said are good questions as well. Could you give us a bit of a capsule of what happened for your past year as a tourist operator in Ontario in terms of your competiattractiveness, because you are located in a fairly strategic location where people could opt to go, I guess, into the US or whatever. Could you give us not a personal history but observations which might tell us a little about the industry of which you are a member, comparing that to the types of attractive options somebody might have south of the border, for instance, or something like that?

Mr Dailley: I think I understand the question. One of the last good years in the industry was 1988; 1989 started to see some changes in travel patterns by Canadians, Ontarians and Americans; and this year just past, for the first time, more Ontarians left the province than Americans came in. You probably read that in the paper; it has been in many times. It was the first time ever but it has been a number of years in the making. Some of these are made-in-Ontario problems or even made-in-Canada problems, if you will, and that is even before the GST has had any effect.

Many of the good, valid Toronto attractions, publicly funded or private attractions, where they saw admissions drop after 1989 in the 8% to 12% range, they were dropping last year in the 15% to 20% range. Part of that is blamed on the Toronto's designer tax, the concentration tax, which has had an effect on the room rates, not much question. Part of it is just the general travel trends, perhaps participated in the GST, in part by Canadians travelling to the factory outlets in the States, and because they have to stay for 48 hours to bring back their 300 bucks they are staying over, staying in hotels down there and making a holiday out of it and visiting attractions out there. So if they are at Darien Lake one weekend, are they at my attraction the next weekend? Probably not.

So you are seeing some really deleterious trends. It is aggravated in large measure by tax issues, although I want to keep away from the broad if I can, and deal with this particular issue, which is very worrisome to my industry segment in tourism, the attractions.

Mr Elston: Although the amusement tax causes a great deal of concern, and the issue of competitive stance between you and someone funded by the government—I understand that complexity. I presume, though, that if I were going to take my family, as a sort of uninformed member of the public, I probably would not choose to go to the Science Centre and not to go to yours because I did not want to pay the amusement tax.

Mr Dailley: You are not unaware of it coming in the State. You look at my value and say: "African Lion Safari is $11.95. Is it worth it or not?" Whether there is GST in there, amusement tax, and whether it is 8% or 10% is of no interest to you. You pay your $5.50 at the Science Centre in Toronto, and you do not realize that there is no tax in there and you also do not realize that that is probably one third of what that attraction should be charging. They could easily get $14.95. It is a marvellous, marvellous attraction.

Mr Elston: In terms of competitive value, the Science Centre being subsidized by various things, including not having to collect the amusement tax.

What role would you see the gasoline tax, for instance, playing in your business? Everybody has to drive to the Lion Safari. I have been there, actually, a couple of times.

Mr Dailley: I hope you had a good visit.

Mr Elston: It is a great day. It is a great place for the kids, and adults too, I might say. What about the other tax issues you face as a—

Mr Dailley: Road tax is another one, the high cost of gasoline. Also, liquor taxes are, I think, impinging quite heavily on the attractiveness of tourism in this province. When you hear stories that of Darien Lake's 2,000 campground sites, half of them are filled every weekend with Ontario licence plates—if that is in fact totally accurate, I am not sure—you have some pretty serious competition right across the border that does not have the amusement tax, has lower alcohol taxes and has also smaller hotel taxes. Just put this all together and people can have a marvellous weekend in northern New York state or in Michigan and, frankly, in other places, for half the price. And it is going to get worse.

We employ one pile, thousands and thousands of students, who make a lot in our industry, the tourism industry, high school students. They are the ones who are going to end up losing their jobs if we have to start trimming seriously. But worse, if you start to trim your staff levels, you affect your service level. People coming in cannot get a hot hot dog, they cannot keep the washrooms clean, and people are going away upset. Plus, you have the high price and you are not delivering the goods at the other end.

It is a real dilemma we face, and it is not just in the attractions. I am talking broad-based comments to reflect the whole tourism industry. It is in bad straits in this province right now. Also, incidentally, tourism on the east coast and the west coast is not suffering some of these same problems that we are here. In many cases it is an Ontario or a southern Ontario problem.

Mr Elston: There are a lot more questions that would probably be better directed, I presume, when the presenter comes back to the Fair Taxation Commission. Perhaps some of us members will be able to likewise participate in that, because it looks like taxes in general are really working contrary to what your business needs at the moment. In fact, you probably would find it a significant impediment if there were increased and accumulated deficits incurred to go along with high taxes, I presume.

I wish to thank you for the presentation. I look forward to seeing the brief in written form and then we will go from there.

Mr Dailley: My apologies. I should have come better prepared. I was advised. I did talk to somebody that this brief was on the Treasurer's desk and I was advised that you would all have had a copy last Friday. My apologies. I could have easily had them here for you, at least so you had them in front of you today. It makes it difficult.

The Chair: The clerk will make copies of that brief and it will be circulated to all members of the committee. I am sorry that happened. We would like to thank you for your presentation and your input this morning.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chairman, while the next delegation is being seated, could I ask that the committee consider what is going to happen this afternoon in terms of process? Our submissions are finished at 11:30, as far as I know, and we are scheduled to start this afternoon some discussion on the draft report that was circulated.

The Chair: Before you continue, we have another order of business that precedes that. We have a letter from the Union of Ontario Indians, who have sent a copy of their brief but have now requested that they be given a chance to do an oral brief. They originally indicated they were not going to give an oral brief, but now they are requesting an oral brief. The deadline is well past, but I need direction from the committee.

Mr Phillips: Are they here now?

The Chair: No.

Mr Christopherson: Can they be here this afternoon?

The Chair: We can find out.

Mr Phillips: I would hate to not hear them.

Mr Christopherson: I feel the same way. The important thing, though, is to get it as soon as possible so that their submission is relevant to our report, rather than coming after decisions have been made.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, would it be all right if I recommended to the clerk either this afternoon or tomorrow morning?

Mr Christopherson: Fine. We have no problem.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: Having done that, if I could now return. I just wanted to ask—and ask at this point; it is not a motion yet; it may be—that we break at 3:30 today to allow the different committee caucuses to review some of the material. We had a meeting this morning, but it really did not give us enough time to get some of the detailed material that we would like to present to the committee. We would request the co-operation of the other two parties in looking at a 3:30 adjournment. We are prepared to have some general discussion this afternoon, if the other parties would like, and we would be prepared to start detailed discussions tomorrow morning. If there is consensus, Mr Chair, I would just ask that you direct that that is what we do.

Mr Phillips: Hearing nothing from them.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, the Tories are certainly being co-operative today. It seems to help when they are not sitting there.

The Chair: We all appreciated Mr Stockwell's comments late Thursday afternoon, too, did we not, Mr Phillips?

Mr Phillips: From the fact he remains silent now, I assume Mr Stockwell will be—

The Chair: Silence means consent?

CANADIAN BANKERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Canadian Bankers' Association. If you could begin your presentation, please.

Ms Sinclair: Thank you for the opportunity to appear before the standing committee today. I would like to introduce my colleagues. On my right is Al Cooper, who is vice-president of finance and financial affairs, and on my left is Margaret James, who knows everything about that Al and I do not know.

We had brought a brief with us. I believe it may have been circulated to you beforehand as well, but there are extra copies available for the members.

I want to make just a couple of introductory comments if we might. First, a few words about our association. We are the association representing the Canadian banks in this country, not the trust companies, just the banks. All banks are members, both foreign and domestically owned. There would be about 50 foreign banks and seven domestic banks who are members of the association.

Between 40% and 50% of our business is in this province. We have about 3,000 branches here. We have 89,000 employees—that would be half our employees—on payroll in this province. Our total payroll at this time would be about $2.6 billion.

We make a significant contribution, we think, to the provincial economy, both in the numbers I have just cited for you as well as in the revenues we bring to the province. Our estimate is that in the last year we accounted for about 8% of the province's corporate capital and income tax, and we contrast that to being about 1.5% to 1.8% of the provincial economy. In addition to the taxes, the income at the capital level that we bring, we also pay significant other taxes, which we would like to return to in a few minutes.

We are very much part of the communities in this province and this country, both in terms of the corporate participation of our members and the participation of employees as volunteers and as donors. To give you one small example, we would be the largest private-sector contributors to the United Way of this particular city, making very substantial contributions. Needless to say, I think we are fairly proud to have the involvement that we do.

I want to go on to a couple of other points. The first one, which I think is clear from our paper and has certainly been part of the theme of our meetings with the province in the last couple of years, is that we believe the province is walking a fiscal tightrope. It is in a situation where, despite very large increases in the provincial economy and in provincial revenues, it did not manage to work itself out of a deficit situation during a number of years of economic good times. Now, as the economy slips, there is not the kind of flexibility one would normally like to have to be doing the things one likes to do as a government in a deficit.

We understand this government's priorities and I think it is fair to say we accept them. We hope that a longer-term view will be given by the government as to how it would see its revenues and expenditures projecting forward a number of years as the province works its way out of the recession and returns to relative good times.

The debt service ratio of the province is, we figure, probably around 12% to 13%. The estimates, which were based on a break-even in this past year, obviously no longer apply, so the debt service is probably going to be up around 13% in this current year. While that is not the level of the federal government, it is none the less the level that we think one has to be fairly concerned about, given the times that we are in.

The second point that I would like to make is that if one is going to be concerned about the competitiveness of businesses in this province, there is not an awful lot of room to move on the tax front. We pay corporate taxes which, when you go right across industrialized nations, are more or less on par, maybe a little bit higher. But when you add other tax loads, we are probably at this present point in time in a fairly uncompetitive situation as a business community if you draw a broad brush of comparison with our industrial competitors.

If you will permit me, Mr Chairman, I might ask my colleague, Mr Cooper, to elaborate on that point, as well as on a couple of others which relate to the competitiveness issue. It is an issue that we think has to be considered very, very carefully in the current economic situation, because while one would like to go and be fairly generous on the social front, one does not at the same time want to cripple one's ability to generate the wealth that does lead to the ability to make these kinds of payments as economies go into downturns.

Mr Cooper: For the chartered banks in Canada, or in Ontario particularly, as Helen mentioned earlier, 50% of our staff, 50% of our domestic business is in Ontario. So like the province of Ontario, we have a very vested interest in the health of the economy, because as the economy of Ontario prospers, so will our membership. We are very interested in and keenly focused on negative consequences that could arise if the current situation of high tax loads is exacerbated by adding on to that burden. We already are seeing a number of plant closures, business closures as a result of the recession. We are seeing a lot of movement out of the province of Ontario, both in the context of small business as well as others, and it is questionable as to whether or not the province can regain many of those jobs that have left.

We believe that really the only route for the province of Ontario is that which has been explored by others, particularly in British Columbia and other provinces, which are keenly focusing on their expenditure levels. We as an industry are prepared to sit down with the province at any time to assist in any way that we can with means and methods to reduce the expenditure load of the province in terms of how it handles its business. We have done so with other provinces and we certainly are in the process of doing this with the federal government to assist it in terms of facilitation of its business in a way that perhaps can save it money. We certainly make the same offer to the province of Ontario.

An issue that is difficult for us to deal with in terms of the competitiveness of the province of Ontario—and particularly Metropolitan Toronto, which is of course the mainstay for our head office and regional office business—is the fact that the combination of recently introduced taxes such as the employer health levy and the corporate concentration levy, which were introduced a year or so ago, have made locating for business, particularly the financial sector, in Metropolitan Toronto, almost prohibitive in the context of other centres in North America.

Now, we understand that the assessment in the city of Toronto will be reviewed and that there is a move to put it on a market value assessment. From what we have seen, the result of that market value reassessment will be a shifting of the tax burden to the commercial sector, and the analysis that we have seen would make the financial institution's tax load for business and realty taxes in the neighbourhood of $13.50 a square foot, which would make it the most expensive premises in North America. This does not help when we combine it with the taxes and the burden that Ms Sinclair mentioned earlier. So we look, and hope that the government of Ontario can look, at means of addressing and streamlining operations and fiscal restraint in order to not be forced into a position of increasing taxes.

The other issue that we would like to touch on briefly and bring to your attention is the issue of harmonization. I will not go into the detail in terms of the general sense, but certainly for national corporations dealing in multi-jurisdictions, harmonization is a rather critical issue for us in terms of reporting and a variety of other kinds of regulatory fronts. On the tax front, we are faced with of course the GST and the provincial sales taxes.

A number of provinces, as you know, have already declared their intention to join in a form of national sales tax, or are in the process of exploring it. Unquestionably the province of Ontario will be exploring the same option that is available to it. We would plead, particularly from the financial sector, which is the provider of both exempt as well as taxable services, that if you do contemplate joining in with respect to a national tax system, you give the financial sector the opportunity to work with you in order to ensure that the payment flows work smoothly and that we do not run into a conflict and exacerbation of the current administrative burden that is foisted on the financial sector.

With those few remarks, we will be pleased to entertain any questions you may have on our brief.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in the remarks you made relating to the capital tax rate. I wanted to refer back to the New Democratic Party's Agenda for People, which was its election platform in the last provincial election, where it suggests that a minimum corporate tax could be imposed to raise approximately $1 billion in additional provincial revenues.

I wonder, first of all, if you view the existing capital tax as a minimum corporate tax, and what you feel the impact of that $1-billion tax would be on the competitive nature of our industrial and service sector base.

Mr Cooper: The first part, we very much view capital tax as the minimum tax. As a matter of fact, we hope that the province would entertain treating it more appropriately as the minimum tax, as they do at the federal level, as well as in British Columbia, where the tax is actually creditable against your income tax paid.

Capital taxes put financial institutions in a quandary. It is a tax virtually unique to Canada and one that the rating agencies look at rather pointedly when they are looking at banks' international competitiveness, because as we are forced to gain more and more capital to strengthen our position, in accordance with the Bank for International Settlements rules and our regulators, the greater we create the strength for the protection of the depositors and the shareholders, the higher we are taxed. So it is a unique tax and one that has nothing to do with profitability. You are going to get whacked whether you are doing well or whether you are not doing well, and it can certainly add dramatically to problems that exist in the financial sector.

As for the tax burden here in Ontario, the rate is relatively low compared to other provinces at this point in time, but again, we do not get the creditability that is prevalent and in practice in other jurisdictions. It is one of the reasons, quite frankly, that there is such a concentration of head office and staff and deposits in the province. As you know, the calculation of Ontario's share is indeed a function of where banks choose to locate their employees and the situs of their deposit base. If it moves, so does the share.

Mr Phillips: A couple of questions, and then I guess I will get your comment. You said the debt servicing has gone to 13%.

Ms Sinclair: That was a guess, the projection based on a break-even budget this year.

Mr Phillips: How do you calculate that servicing?

Ms Sinclair: It would be your interest costs as a percentage of your provincial revenues.

Mr Phillips: It may surprise you to know that for the first time in at least a decade, debt servicing is lower than 10% for this fiscal year. It has gone down consistently and the Treasurer just released his numbers the other day. Revenue is $43.9 billion and public debt interest is $4.3 billion.

Ms Sinclair: I thank you for that clarification. My numbers came out of the Dominion Bond Rating Service, the bond rating projections.

Mr Phillips: I rely on the Treasurer's numbers.

Mr Christopherson: A faith well placed.

Ms Sinclair: They may well be right. We may be using a somewhat separate base. The projection based on the break-even budget was that debt service in the province would go from about 12.2% down to 11.8%. My only point was that given that the fiscal situation did not materialize as planned, the number is clearly higher.

Mr Phillips: I did not want to spend a lot of time, I am just quite proud of the fact that every year it has gone down, and this year, at least the way we look at our numbers from the Treasury people, it is for the first time in at least a decade less than 10%. The feds' is 34%, I think, of revenue.

Ms Sinclair: The feds' is around, yes—

Mr Phillips: It is 34% of revenue and heading up that was not my question; that was just a comment cause I think having been in the former government watch these things fairly carefully.

Just three comments. One is, I realize you do not the employer health tax. It raises, I guess, about 20% cost of health. It is about 2%, I think, of payroll for people. If you were operating perhaps in the US and paying those premiums all yourself, it might be 6% or 8% of your payroll. No one likes any tax, but if you look at some of the things that maybe gives you a significant advantage vis-à-vis your US competitors, I suspect that might be direct health payments that you make. So I would personally be cautious of that one.

I am interested in a couple of questions. One is just to help me a little bit, whether there is more of the chartered banks' profits being recorded offshore than would have been the case five years ago or not. There is a bit of a perception out there that some of the major chartered banks increasingly have their profits outside of Canada as a percentage, than in Canada. I would be interested to know whether that is just a misconception or whether there is any truth to that.

Second, we have had at least two of the banks in Ontario just looking at your prognosis for the economy in Ontario and what the collective banks are saying now about the economy. As I said to other groups, we have had expressions that we may be out of it in mid to late this calendar year—whether that reflects all of the banks' perspective or not.

Those are really my two questions. Is there a growing offshore profitability for the banks relative to Canadian profitability and, second—

Ms Sinclair: Could you repeat the second question please?

Mr Phillips: Yes. What is the Canadian Bankers' Association prognosis for the Ontario economy? We have heard, I guess, from two of your members directly.

Ms Sinclair: The answer to your first question is that there has been a fairly significant drop in the percentage of our business which is offshore. Prior to the 1981-82 recession, around that period, it would have been in the 40s for everybody and the high 40s for a couple of the banks. At the current time it is down around 30%.

Mr Phillips: Of your profits are recorded offshore?

Ms Sinclair: No, of our business. Now, the profits through the 1980s, up until last year, were obviously depressed because of the Third World debt problems. Last year for the first time the rate of return on our international business was almost exactly the same as our domestic business. It came up again the same time as our domestic profitability dropped and the two more or less met last year for the first time in a decade.

Mr Phillips: The recording of profit. I have this impression, that may be incorrect, of the Cayman Islands. Is that a declining portion of—

Ms Sinclair: Very, very much declining. It has been right through the 1980s. It would be fair to say that in the 1980s, the banks focused very heavily on the development of their domestic business, and also fair to say that, as they looked about the future, they say you build your capital at home and you go abroad very selectively and only where you can earn an adequate rate of return. This is where our system differed substantially from, say, the Japanese and American banks over the last decade. We did not go into these Euromarket deals where you could not get a rate of profit. We said if there was not an adequate return we were not interested, and we backed away from them, which reflected, then, in our earnings and our balance sheets.

Some government officials were very critical and said that the banks were abandoning their international operations and were turning their backs on the global marketplace. I guess our point today, as we watch the Japanese and the Americans and the British follow our example, is that at the only point of competition in the global marketplace is, first, who survives? Second, have you got capital strength? To say your international assets are growing faster than your domestic may mean nothing at all in terms of your global competitiveness. In fact, what we have learned in the last half-decade is that if you were in that position, your global competitiveness was probably going downhill rather than uphill.

The answer to the second part of your question, I think, could be that, first, the banks feel this province's economy has been very hard hit by the current recession. A number of our members would say to you that we are at a point in the current recession which makes it a deeper one than the 1981-82 recession ever was in this province. The reverse, of course, would be true in the west. We are seeing some buoyancy in Alberta and British Columbia even today. Maybe it is slowing down, but there is considerable relative buoyancy in comparison to the Ontario economy. It is a bit of a teeter-totter in that sense.

The point that Al Cooper made about the loss of competitiveness, the closing of manufacturing plants, which worried us—we watched our customers even before the recession establish new plant capacities south of the border—that point, of course, has been exacerbated during the recession, although I think it is fair to say that some of the problems we saw in the manufacturing sector in the current recession have not been present in this one. For example, we did not see a problem of excess inventory, which is a terribly, terribly serious problem. That is where you are growing, as a manufacturing business, and that has not really been the big problem in this recession.

In terms of looking forward, I think there is a very high focus on where interest rates go and a hope that interest rates can continue to move downwards. Obviously, there is also some focus on the level of the Canadian dollar, though it is understood that in an economy that is as indebted as ours is, one does have to attract the foreign capital to finance the debt. The debt cannot be financed at this time by external savings. But there is some cautious optimism, I think I could say, that by midyear the Ontario economy will have begun to turn.

Mr Phillips: This calendar year?

Ms Sinclair: That is right.

Mr Elston: I was interested in one thing. Mr Cooper and Ms Sinclair as well had indicated how much of a presence the banks have here in Ontario. That is quite true. I think you went on, Mr Cooper, to say that the rates of occupation of rental space and taxation and all of those things, of course, will contribute to either a continuing presence or, obviously, a possible move of some of their head offices, potentially.

When you talked about the amount of capital in savings and everything that was to be attributed to a corporation's presence in Ontario, I was aware that it was about to be affected by a move in Quebec, where they would attribute or ascribe to a particular institution a minimum amount of capital presence in their profits, and in fact that could damage the locatability of that institution to Ontario or in fact to BC or wherever, because if you were going to pay a minimum tax in Quebec it might make it worth while to have a minimum amount of presence there.

Can you tell us whether there are any other jurisdictions doing things like that? First, for the importance of this study, maybe you can verify whether that is correct—I would not want people just to rely on my information; second, whether any other provinces are trying to make institutions in Canada relocate to their province by similar means, and third, what the banks intend to do about it, if anything, in terms of fairness inside Canada and in terms of trying to have a harmony among the provinces, which are looking for the presence of large institutions to help fuel our own economies—in 25 words or less.

Mr Cooper: We have tried to get the provinces, including Ontario, for the last, oh, I would say, probably six or seven years—there has been virtually an intense almost rivalry, if you will, in terms of issues such as the capital tax, dissatisfaction in some jurisdictions with the formula I was talking about, in terms of how much British Columbia's share should be of bank income and capital tax as opposed to Ontario and Quebec. No one is happy with it. While there have been a number of proposals to look at a fairer way, every time someone is going to give up something so that someone else can get more, obviously there seems to be an impasse and people go away again.

I agree with you. Now what we are seeing is a new attempt to perhaps circumvent the sharing formula, which again is another demonstration that it perhaps is not as appropriate as it should be or as fair as it should be. Most of the provinces—certainly in the western sector, BC—have been going in the opposite way, rather trying to woo financial institutions with respect to dropping capital tax or, where capital tax remains, making it creditable against your income tax. Of course, you are well aware of the rather sensitive issue of the international banking centres and trying to expand the level of activity that could transpire there; almost rewards, if you will, for moving your head office, if you could, to the province. So we have seen some of that. The other provinces, certainly in the west, tend to be following that direction. I would suspect it will be their tendency.

Quebec is very much focused on creating a very hospitable environment, shall we say, in terms of its total tax picture, particularly for the financial sector in general. As you know, their corporate tax rates are the lowest in the country. Their overall package tends to be a very attractive one. I have not seen the detail yet of the minimum tax in terms of what it may mean to banks, in terms of whether it would be sufficient enough to actually cause the kind of reaction you are talking about: "If I have to pay that much, well, then maybe I should move some more people there." We have not completed that kind of analysis, to say whether it will have that kind of effect or not.

Mr Elston: That sort of leads me inevitably, although it is slightly off topic, to ask a question about how appropriate it would be to have a Canadian bank headquartered in Quebec if we were not dealing with the Canadian nation.

Mr Cooper: We have two of them now.

Ms Sinclair: The Royal Bank, the National Bank and the Bank of Montreal, I believe, are all headquartered—

Mr Elston: I realize that, but in line with what is taking place, with those sorts of arrangements that are already taking place now from a taxation point of view, there are going to be some very wild practical questions, I guess, to be asked and answered about the economies which are going to be operated under by these banks, because your members all have to show a competitive margin, obviously, nationally and internationally. How do you do that if you are going to be subject to all these jurisdictions even in a more heightened fashion, presumably?

Ms Sinclair: Not to comment on the issue of national unity per se for the moment, but to go back to Al's theme that if you can manage to harmonize your system, if you can do what the Europeans are doing, and ensure that you do not have interjurisdictional impediments to trade, in a very broad definition thereof, then you should not be too concerned. That is really the issue.

We cannot help but be struck by the fact that within this country today, we have greater impediments to inter-provincial trade—some of the ones Al has mentioned—than we will encounter in Europe, in fact, than we encounter today moving across national borders.

I do not think there is any doubt at all that the Canadian banks' commitment to the overall marketplace—I am talking about Quebec and the other provinces—will remain regardless of what happens constitutionally. I do not think that is at issue, but there is a question as to how effectively you can do it and what the cost of barriers to trade actually are.

Mr Elston: Not to go further, although that is an extremely interesting line of questions to get into, I have a couple of other places I would like to go with respect to your presentation.

One was an indication that there was not much room for manoeuvring with respect to taxes in the province, although I read—quite quickly, I realize, but read none the less—an interview of our Treasurer in the Sun, which was reported last Sunday, I think it was, wherein Mr Laughren was saying that there is room for selective taxes in the province of Ontario. I did not go right through and pick out exactly which areas he might be looking at. It seems to me your presentation contradicts that. Would you say that is true, or would you go along, perhaps, with the Natural Resources Association, which said as long as there were no new taxes, you could live with that type of situation?

Ms Sinclair: I do not think we are familiar enough across the board with the taxation of other industries to give you a comment about whether there is room to think we tried to impress that in our case, we are paying 8% of your load and we are about 1.5% of your economy. If you see those kinds of burdens in other sectors, I think you do not want to think pretty hard and fast about how much moving room you have and you would want to actually look internationally to make sure you are not doing a global industry sector relative to its international competition. Whether there are selective opportunities, I am not sure we can really help you address that issue.

Mr Elston: Just a couple of other quick questions. Mr Rae made a speech a week or so ago wherein he basically made a request that the banks, financial institutions—generally banks, I think we will be seeing—should get into some kind of co-operative partnership with government in helping to shore up our business community. I know you are not responsible for loans on your own, but your association members are. Can you tell us what have been taken by any of your members, or whether the association, in getting together, has talked about forming a plan to develop such a partnership with government to shore up business during this recession?

Ms Sinclair: We would see that there is a good coincidence between the Premier's wishes and what in fact is of benefit to our own members. When you have a borrower who is in difficulty, the last thing you want to do is call the loan and have to realize on security. That is a very difficult proposition. We will be releasing a study in about a month's time dealing with the small business sector, which will be, I think, of specific interest, which shows that realization on security is about 60% on average of an outstanding loan. So you do not, as a lender, look to security to recover your position, and that is exactly what you have to do when you pull the plug. So it is really for that reason that we will initially work with a borrower to try and restructure loans. That would be a very frequent action. We will encourage borrowers who we are unsure we think, to support to find alternative financing. Many of them do. Those borrowers who in the end we feel we have to call loans on have really been on our books for about 18 months from the point in time that the problem was identified to the point in time when the loan is called. Those are probably a minority of your situations.

The point we have to make back to government is that if we do not benefit the borrower and we certainly do not perform our fiduciary duties if we keep a company which is not able to make it, if we keep a company going indefinitely. We have about $1 of capital supporting every $10 of deposits, and our number one duty is to safeguard the deposits. That fiduciary duty rises above all others.

I think it is particularly at this point in time when you can look to the United States and what happens when you neglect that duty. You see an illustration of how crippled not only your banking system becomes, but your economy. The fact that you are reading in the newspapers today that the Canadian banks have been asked to come in and buy up portfolios of the US banks or to buy US banks themselves simply speaks to the point that you have had an industry which for the last decade or so was not observing its fiduciary duties and has abrogated on prudential lending practices. We do not really think, in that situation, that the Premier is suggesting we ride along.

Mr Elston: I just want to follow a couple of points when. In my part of the country, which is Bruce county now—it used to be Huron-Bruce, but I think generally one might say “the agricultural sector”—one of the forerunners of a lot of loans being called is a movement of branch managers, and they bring in the cleanup hitters. I have seen a number of people move in the last three or four months, six months, to new locations, and new people being brought in to take a new look at new loans, particularly in the farming community. It means that there are going to be a number of cleanups.

My concern is that partnership may very well extend to small business at a certain level, but it is not being extended to the agricultural sector, which is in fact worse off now than it was in 1981. In 1981 when the recession began, those people had some stamina built up, they had some deposits, they had some equity. Recovery, although buoyant in some areas, was not buoyant enough in the agricultural sector to meet the needs of sustaining another downturn. What, if anything, has been developed among our association members, or have you talked about it at the association level, to help sustain the agricultural sector, in co-operation with the provincial government?

Ms Sinclair: I think the comments I have made about small business do apply to the agricultural sector. In fact, the study which will be released samples many thousands of loans in the branch's files, including agricultural and small business loans. It covers both situations.

We do have a very close relationship with the provincial Ministry of Agriculture and Food. We have had numerous discussions about what can be done to assist the types of borrowers you are talking about. I think our fundamental proposition is the same, though, whether you are talking about a small businessman or a farmer, and that is, you walk a very narrow line between doing what is right, particularly in an economic downturn, from the perspective of helping the customer through a temporary set of problems, you hope, and observing your fiduciary duties to your depositors.

The Chair: These questions are very interesting and I'm—

Mr Elston: It is almost crucial to the people in my area. If they cannot get money, my people go down the tubes.

The Chair: I know it is very crucial to people. It is crucial to people all across Ontario in these circumstances. What we are trying to do at this point is to specifically reference information that we can then pass to the Treasurer.

Mr Elston: My last question was going to be, what are the discussions that they have had with OMAF and what are they going to recommend that we do for agriculture? The whole line of questions was coming sequentially to that.

The Chair: Then I will allow you to finish your questions.

Mr Elston: Can you tell us what your discussions have been with OMAF and what recommendations you are making to assist the agricultural sector in Ontario?

Ms Sinclair: We have not arrived at any firm set of conclusions or recommendations at this point in time. All I can tell you is that we have had an ongoing discussion with them. As you know, in the mid 1980s we participated very actively in that the groups which reviewed farmers' debts were private sector, involving both the banking industry and the farm community, where we looked at the debt situation of individual farmers who chose to bring their cases to the board.

We had some reticence, I should tell you, going into that exercise. We felt that it operated in the end fairly well. In fact, one of the things that surprised us about the whole thing is that we found that the farmers who sat on this board with us in many cases were far tougher than our own people sitting and adjudicating on the cases. But in terms of the current situation that we are in, I am sorry, I do not have at this particular point in time any conclusions or recommendations.

Mr Elston: Do you expect to have a recommendation for the Treasurer before he does his budget?

Ms Sinclair: We certainly could have a recommendation for the Treasurer if that were called for.

Mr Elston: If it were called for. If we, as a committee, ask for it, you could provide that for us.

Ms Sinclair: Absolutely.

Mrs Sullivan: Could I just have a supplementary on the agricultural question? One of the perceptions of agriculturalists has been that when there is an interest rate reduction program, the bank interest charges are in fact increased because the market will bear a little bit more with the government reduction of the interest rate on those programs. We have heard that on many occasions and I wonder what your response is.

Ms Sinclair: The most recent program that we have operated with the provincial government has been in the province of Saskatchewan and I do not think there has been a complaint. The program has involved a certain level of interest rate reduction for the farmer below market rates and the province has absorbed the cost of that reduction. I am not aware of any complaints in the direction that you are suggesting.

Mrs Sullivan: It is certainly a complaint in Ontario.

Ms Sinclair: It might be of interest for the province to talk to Saskatchewan. We met with them fairly recently—I am sorry, I should restate that. I met with the people involved from our side. We actually have a meeting scheduled in Saskatchewan for later this month. What I understand to be the case is that the province is very pleased with the way that program is running, and our people feel that it has been a good partnership as well. It may serve as a model.

Mr Stockwell: I certainly feel for your position when it comes to calling the loans, etc. You are damned if you do and damned if you don't. If you call the loan, you are damned because everyone screams that you called it too early or there were reasons for the losses and so on. If you do not call the loan, you are just allowing companies that have no hope of recovery to go further and further into debt.

I guess it brings to the debate that competition is the lifeblood of free enterprise, and eventually there are winners and eventually there are losers, and if there are no losers, there are no winners. It is a difficult and precarious position to be in, I understand, and I also understand that you do in fact go a long way.

I have met with my own bank managers and I scream and yell every time they tell me what I have to do, but a couple of weeks later I always think to myself, "Well, that probably makes sense." You eventually in fact do what they advise you to do.

The question I would like to drive to is the debt.

Mr Elston: I thought you were independent.

Mr Stockwell: I am independent, that is right. Everyone depends on one person—that is who loans him the money.

I have a real concern about the debt of the country, not just specifically the province but the federal debt. I guess politically the problem is that politicians tend to look at the numbers and view the debt whatever way looks best for them. I certainly do not blame Mr Phillips, but you can see him saying: "Gee, I heard the debt is—it's the first time it's under 10%. That's an astounding figure." Except when you realize that, yes, the debt is under 10% for the first time but we have had the best booming economy for five years, revenues have gone through the ceiling and you would almost assume that in the last five years the debt has gone down.

The Chair: I hope there is a question here.

Mr Stockwell: There is a question eventually. You would almost assume the debt has gone down, except for the last five years it has gone up by $10 billion.

Mr Phillips: Federally it has gone up to $400 billion.

Mr Stockwell: I am not arguing whether theirs has gone up or gone down. The fact is, this debt has gone up by $10 billion and yet you have people saying, "Gee, it's less than 10%." This is how you get into trouble with huge debts, because people get a little bit of statistics and they start arguing one way and before you know it your debt is higher and they are telling you it is lower.

The question I have is, how important is this national debt and this provincial debt? It seems to me in business is a killer—any kind of debt is a killer—and as it grows will limit your abilities to adjust and change and deal with the marketplace. How important is it for the province and the federal government to get the debt to a more manageable level, in your opinion?

Ms Sinclair: Very. The issue cannot be understated. The old thing they used to teach you at school, that in good times government should run surpluses so that it can deal with deficits in bad times, is something that we have moved away from but they still teach it.

Mr Phillips: No, the provincial government ran a surplus last year. Make sure you remember that.

Mr Stockwell: I guess this is classified as an interjection.

Ms Sinclair: They still teach the principle in schools, and when you ask the guys who teach, "What are you thinking when you teach that?" they say: "My mind goes numb. I can't believe I'm saying it, but we have nothing else to replace it with." The theory has not been replaced. The view still is that sound fiscal management in government means running surpluses in good years so that you can run deficits in bad years and so you are not in the position that the federal government is right now with 34 cents on every dollar of revenue going to service the debt and where you can say, "Our operating expenditures are down, our operating expenditures are flat," and it effectively does you no good.

It is a terribly serious problem at the level that the country has come up to. It is one that creeps up at you. The mathematics of it are quite exponential. To dig ourselves out of it at this point in time is going to be truly difficult.

Mr Stockwell: I could not have said it better myself.

Mr Phillips: The problem is I think we have a management banking group here that does not realize that is what the provincial government has done in the last five years—run a surplus. I am just saying I agree with what you have said. That is what the provincial government did, but no one knows; not even yourselves know it.

Ms Sinclair: I am sorry, but we simply quoted the numbers from the bond rating agency. If they are not correct, we will have to go back and look at the other—

Interjections.

The Chair: Excuse me, we are starting to overstep here. This nattering can go on for a long time. Are there any other questions of this committee or of this presentation? I see Mr Phillips is—did you have another question to go on the record?

Mr Phillips: No, I thought it would be useful to have the budget there.

The Chair: Then I would like to thank you for your presentation and information this morning.

The committee recessed at 1229.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1405 in committee room 2.

The Chair: Before we begin this afternoon's deliberations on the document, I need direction from the committee as to whether this part of the hearings and the process will be done in camera or open. What is the feeling of the committee?

Mr Sterling: My party prefers it to be done in the open.

Mr Phillips: That is fine with us.

Mr Christopherson: And us.

The Chair: Okay, then they will be done in the open. The next item of business then is to move forward on the interim draft report that was made available to all parties last night at 6 o'clock. I guess the procedure for this would be to open it to discussion and to proceed with any amendments or any changes that are deemed appropriate at this time.

Mr Elston: Can I just ask a question? Bearing in mind that we are leaving here at 3:30, so that people can really take this stuff under advisement, should we be talking about general format of the report? I do not want to usurp what people are going to be talking about later on in the day. It sounds kind of difficult, but if we start getting into stuff and people have not talked about it, how do we talk about it, I mean, as a caucus, if people have not discussed?

The Chair: If we talk about format and so on, that is a useful place to begin and to read through it and maybe make any changes that are deemed appropriate.

Mr Christopherson: We are prepared at this point to go through the text, the format. There may be something that we ask to be deferred pending our discussions, but basically on what is here we have some responses to it and some positions. It was specific conclusions of the committee and the recommendations themselves that we were looking for a chance to talk further about in caucus.

Well, Mr Chair, I do not know how you want to proceed. I am prepared, not having gone through this before, just to plow ahead, if you will, and offer up some comments that we have. But if anybody who has been through this process wants to offer up any suggestions or jump in, that would certainly be welcome.

Table of contents: We would look to strike the words "answers in" and make the word "partnerships."

The Chair: Well, it has been brought to my attention in the table of contents that we had some recommendations over the last little while about taxation, if we want to include a section just to summarize what those recommendations were. Basically this part of the report should be a summary of what was said, as opposed to any recommendations. Any recommendations will be discussed starting tomorrow or the next day.

Mrs Sullivan: We have had a lot of recommendations relating to taxation issues and it is appropriate that they be summarized.

Ms M. Ward: Under which section?

The Chair: The table of contents.

Ms M. Ward: As a separate, main category or under a subcategory?

The Chair: That is up to you.

Mr Stockwell: It cannot be a big deal.

Mr Christopherson: Page 1, first paragraph, middle of the paragraph where it says, "although their analysis was not as thorough," our preference would be that "their analysis was not conclusive."

Mrs Sullivan: I like it the way it is.

Mr Christopherson: So what am I going to do? Every change, do you want me to pose it in the form of a motion, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Why do we not discuss it and see what kind of consensus we can build or where we want to go with that. Maybe present what you have as an alternative. If it needs to be a motion, we can do that.

Mr Stockwell: May I ask a question? Would it not be better to deal with the committee's observations, conclusions, in essence? Let's deal with those. If we can reach some kind of agreement on that, or if we cannot, then we will know better as to what we are going to do through the actual verbiage in the report. I think that is important, but if we can find we have common ground somewhere and it is on observations and conclusions and we can debate that, discuss it and reach it if we are going to—if we are not, then that is fine too—and then go back and try to redefine what the report says.

Mr Christopherson: The only problem with that is, first of all, this is really meant to be the basis from which the committee observations and conclusions are drawn, basically. Still, this has been done by a neutral party, the legislative staff; not by our staff, not by your staff. I think maybe it is important that we at least substantiate and finalize what that is going to look like.

Second, if we jump to the observations and conclusions and agree on that without having done this, it may lead us back again to finding we do not agree with the observations and conclusions, because they have to be consistent. I just disagree in terms of what is the easiest process, Chris, not with any kind of one-upmanship in mind.

Mr Stockwell: Fine. I just thought the committee would agree, but if it does not, I understand.

The Chair: Can we proceed then?

Mr Christopherson: I have a proposal in front of the committee and I am in your hands as to how you want to handle it, whether you want it just as a suggestion for now to see if it will fly and then a motion, or do you want me to just move quickly to motions and the other parties will do the same?

The Chair: Let's throw it out and see if it flies and we can do it by consensus. If not, then we can have it in the form of a motion.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, then I will repeat: to strike the words "as thorough" and put "conclusive."

Mr Stockwell: We do not care.

Mr Elston: Does it not say they did not do a whole economic modelling, as compared to what other people did? It just says it was not as in depth. I think if that is what the reports and the deliveries to the committee showed, you should say it. I am not going to spend a lot of time over it, but if they did not come forward and say, "This is the modelling we have done, and this the analysis that follows through," and somebody else was able to show a much deeper analysis—I am sure the banks did more economic discoveries with statistical material than others—then what is the damage in just leaving it as it is?

Mr Christopherson: It just seems a little negative, regardless of whom it is referring to, to say that they did not do thorough work. There is an implied description of the quality of the work and that is why we felt the word "conclusive" was more acceptable.

Mr Sterling: In the first paragraph, can I just make one comment in terms of the content. It gives, in my view, a false impression of what I read from most economic groups and it has no political bearing on us one way or the other. It says, and I agree, that most forecasters agree that we are going to come out of the recession in the second half of 1991, but I got the impression that most of them said, including the Treasurer actually—that gives the impression that 1992 is going to be a real blip up and I got the impression that it was going to be a slow climb out.

Now, I do not know whether that is worth while putting another way or not. When I read that, I thought, "Gee, you know, if I was picking that up, I would think that we are going to be on the way to boom times in 1992." I do not know; I throw it out.

Mr Elston: You might too throw it out.

Mr Sterling: I just think it would be more accurate to say that we expect to come back—you know, to start out in 1991—but that the recovery will be slow, or the recovery will be gradual.

The Chair: How about if that was changed, that there will be slow but some growth?

Interjection.

The Chair: Well, "slow," "some," "steady."

Mr Sterling: Why do we not leave it with the drafters and see if they can come up with something?

The Chair: How is that?

Mr Elston: We can attack them later.

Mr Stockwell: Slow and thorough growth.

Mr Christopherson: It is too bad Hansard is on.

Interjection: It is on.

Mr Christopherson: That is what I said, it is too bad it is on.

The Chair: I think we have discussed those two. We can look for those changes in the next draft. Shall we continue on? This is a rather lengthy document. At the we are going we will be here until next Sunday.

Mr Christopherson: A simple one, the sentence in the same paragraph: "It should be stressed that the 'has been' no shortage of oil," as opposed to "is," just reflect the fact that we do not know where it is going to and just to keep it timely. Again, at the end of that sentence, "has not been affected by the war 'to date.'" It be implied in the date of the report, but we would like make it very clear that this is to the best of our knowledge right now. That is us for the first page.

Mr Phillips: A bit nitpicky, but in the second paragraph, "Unlike Canada, the American industry went through a considerable rationalization process in the early 1980s." I am not sure I have really seen the evidence that and the implication of that comment is that therefore the Canadian industry is going to go through a big rationalization process in the early 1990s that they went through in the 1980s. I do not remember the present actually making that point.

The Chair: Am I allowed to interject?

Mr B. Ward: As Chair, you can do what you want.

The Chair: I think one of the steel presentations indicated that there was some rationalization that took place in the American steel industry that had now put them in a better competitive position.

Mr Phillips: That was one example. It is quite a broad statement that I have personal difficulty in attaching support to without more information. I just throw that out to the committee.

Mr B. Ward: If I may, the impression I got was not much rationalization but a restructuring of the economy and perhaps that would be more acceptable to Mr Phillips instead of the word "rationalization," "restructuring," because that was the impression I got over and over again that the United States economy went through a restructuring period during the last recession, primarily in its manufacturing base, and the message, that I got anyway, from the major groups in forecasting the Ontario economy was that our economy was going through a restructuring similar to what went on in the United States in the last recession.

The Chair: What would you like there?

Mr Phillips: I would take this sentence out because we do not have the proof, but I do not feel that strongly about it. I like to support things that I saw the evidence of, but it is not a big point. If nobody else feels it, leave it in.

On the bottom one, "The current recession is characterized"—

The Chair: I had better just ask the question, is there any objection to removing that sentence?

Mr Phillips: I do not feel one way or the other.

The Chair: "Unlike Canada, the American industry went through a considerable rationalization process in the early 1980s."

Ms M. Ward: We have to retrieve the following sentence that carries that further. You will have to take that out.

Mr Elston: You see, it is also not quite true. I take a look at some of the little plants that I remember, and I was there in 1981, 1982 and 1983, when we were discussing a whole series of issues around the recession and the high costs that were placed on Canadian businesses. I remember the number of foundries that closed down in Canada in answer to the restructuring in the auto industry. I remember the people who were laid off in Windsor permanently. It does not quite ring true from my own personal information. I know, for instance, that a couple of businesses in that used to be my home town underwent a whole series of changes, modernizing their equipment, they laid off people, they hired more people back, they recapitalized. So maybe somebody's observation was not particularly apt. Maybe it should not have been repeated because I know there are a bunch of people who never have been hired back from the jobs they lost in 1981.

Take a look at Brantford and a whole series of other places that have gone through, in this last decade, one of the most horrendous sorts of readjustments anywhere. You take out White, you take out Massey-Ferguson. Good lord, if that is not restructuring and reshaping, I do not know what it is, for Canadian industry.

Mr Christopherson: I understand there was a suggestion of the word "restructuring." I do not know if that gives it. It was pretty clear. When we had our caucus discussions on that clause, we heard that message very clearly from a number of sources.

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: No, but in this fashion. What we have been hearing from many people is that this is not like the early 1980s; the Americans did go through that restructuring, that rationalization, but we did not. I am sure you point to communities like Brantford, but on the whole, it did not go through that at the macro level in the same sense that the Americans did in the early 1980s. I am not saying whether it did or did not happen; I am saying that the consistent point I think we heard.

The Chair: Could I offer a suggestion here, then? Perhaps we could take that phrase out and say that the Canadian economy is in the midst of a restructuring process. We can use either the word "again" or "now." I do not want to pass any premature judgements, but I think the point to be remembered here is that if we put it in here, this might tend to become seen as a word of truth. If we say it, it becomes a word of truth.

Mr Elston: This is our committee's report. I am not going to be prepared to stand up and say that, unlike Canada, the Americans went through restructuring, because I remember sitting here and listening to people and that is what I remember it being, the way it was.

Mr Sutherland: I think it is the degree. Several other members said that the amount of permanent job loss this time was far more substantial than last time.

Mr Elston: Say that, but do not say that Canada was not restructuring like the United States did, because we lost a pile of people in 1981 to 1983.

Mr Sutherland: No one is denying that. I think we are all aware of that. I think this statement is coming out of the fact that several went out of their way to highlight that fact, that there is far more permanent job loss this time than last time.

Mr Elston: Fine, let us just say that.

Mr Sterling: Where is the evidence?

Mr Sutherland: Murray, I do not think you were here at the time, but there was evidence supporting what you are saying and that in coming out of this recession they did not think it would be as deep because the rationalization had already taken place in the early 1980s. Companies were leaner and meaner coming out of the early 1980s and therefore they were better able to cope in this recession. So I do not disagree with what you are saying. I found this whole thrust a bit queer myself, but I do not know how important it is.

Ms Anderson: It is not clear whether you want those sentences in or not.

The Chair: I think what I am hearing is that what should go in there is something like, "We are undergoing a restructuring at this time, and it is resulting in a greater degree of permanent job loss than occurred in the earlier recession."

Mr Phillips: "The current recession is characterized by historically high real interest rates." That is a fact, is it? I cannot remember whether they proved—there were lots of times when the interest rates were substantially higher than they have been, but it is the real interest rates that are at a historic high.

The Chair: My understanding is that it is the spread between inflation and what the interest rate is. Does anybody have any problems with page 1 now? Page 2?

Mr Christopherson: I will just list the concerns we have about that first paragraph and then leave it for consideration. We are not comfortable with the first sentence and we would like to see it struck. We would change the second sentence so that it reads, as you head into the third line, "substantially as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs and reduced revenue."

The next sentence would start where the words "transfer payments" are in the seventh line. The next sentence then, after "reduced revenue," would be "transfer payments." It would start there.

Then the last sentence of that paragraph, just to finish our thoughts on this paragraph, is "At the same time, any windfall from the GST," as opposed to "an unexpected." "An unexpected" would be withdrawn and replaced with "any."

Mrs Sullivan: Could you read the paragraph—

Mr Christopherson: What the paragraph would look like? From the top, then:

"In Ontario, the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion and it is possible that it might increase substantially as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs and reduced revenue. Transfer payments to the provinces have been declining, and provincial governments have had to find ways of meeting the shortfall through the introduction of innovative policies or by reducing their own expenditure. At the same time, any windfall from the GST might assist the federal government in its attempt to bring its deficit under control."

Mrs Sullivan: I would suggest that the second sentence read, "In Ontario the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion and it is possible that it might increase substantially as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs, reduced revenue plus expenditure decisions."

Mr Sterling: Evidence was presented to the contrary. The Treasurer came in and said he got an $800-million windfall from the transfer payments. That is why his deficit is not $3.5 billion.

The Chair: Just a minute. I want to deal with this first one, "plus expenditures." What was the phrase?

Mrs Sullivan: "Plus expenditure decisions."

1430

The Chair: "Plus expenditure decisions." Are we living with this or are we going to die on this one?

Mr Christopherson: We are listening.

The Chair: "Plus expenditure decisions"?

Mr Christopherson: I did not say we agreed. I said we are listening.

The Chair: I am listening, too, and I am trying to get a sense of—

Mr B. Ward: Could we have Barbara's rationale?

Mrs Sullivan: Given some of the announcements that have been made since the change in government relating to capital works, relating to elimination of the retail sales tax on the GST, social assistance rate changes, child care announcements, housing starts and so on, clearly, one of the contributing factors in relationship to the deficit—the other two major factors, of course, relate to announcements very early on in this government's administration relating to SkyDome and relating to UTDC. As a consequence, those are very much factors in the current-year deficit and will continue to be a factor in the 1991 deficit.

Mr Phillips: I am not sure what this means. I thought we were talking about this year's deficit. Are we forecasting next year's deficit here? What is the intent of this paragraph? If that is the case, for me at least, we are only eight weeks away from year-end. The Treasurer was just in here. He was saying he feels fairly good that this $2.5 billion is what we are going to have. So I do not think it is realistic to say it might increase substantially.

Personally, I think we have the $2.5 billion pretty much in sight. Therefore, I would be more inclined to say it now stands at $2.5 billion and it looks like that will be the case for this year, this deficit, relative to the expectation of surplus, as a result of somewhat lower revenues, about 1% lower revenues; and then, it seemed to me, there was $600 million for welfare payments, $400 million for UTDC and $400 million mainly for SkyDome. I think we must determine what we are trying to talk about here with the deficit.

I would be very surprised if the deficit is going to be higher than $2.5 billion.

The other one—and this gets a little political, but remember transfer payments are about 10% of the revenue. It is nice to blame the feds, but 90% of the revenue comes in from other sources, so there is a limit to how much we are going to be able to lay on the feds, although I would like to blame the feds for everything.

So my question is just that if the intent is to talk about this year's deficit, I cannot imagine that it is going to come much off the $2.5 billion, and it is fairly clear where the deficit comes from.

The Chair: I think that is a good question. What is the intent here? What do we want to say in that paragraph?

Mr Phillips: Because later on we get into forecasts, I think it is just a matter of what we are talking about here and I think we are talking about the current deficit.

Mrs Sullivan: The Treasurer says it will not increase.

Mr Christopherson: So what is the current proposal then?

Mr Phillips: If in fact we are trying to say, "In Ontario the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion," I do not think it is true that, "it is possible it might increase substantially as a result of"—

Mr Christopherson: I hear where you are going. We would have to ask the authors. I think we took it to mean next year's fiscal budget, or were you referring to the $2.5 billion? Anne or David? In that sentence, as the authors were you referring to fiscal 1990-91 or 1991-92?

Mr Rampersad: I got the impression that we were saying that during the course of the year we might have an increase.

Mr Christopherson: Which year, though?

Mr Rampersad: In 1991-92.

Mr Christopherson: So this is for next year?

Mr Phillips: Mr Chairman, if we are going to talk about next year, then we get into a whole set of things, which seems to me, about other expenditures.

The Chair: Maybe we should get something clear, that is, what the purpose of the preamble to the recommendations is. Are we doing the state of affairs now or are we doing a projection? If we are doing the state of affairs now, then perhaps we would want to look at that in light of—

Mr B. Ward: The heading of the section is "Current State of Affairs," so in fact it does refer to this year's potential deficit of $2.5 billion. I think it is simply rewording this paragraph to reflect that it is anticipated, based on input given to this committee, that the $2.5 billion will be maintained as far as the deficit for this year is concerned, because it is the current state of affairs. That is what you were trying to get at, was it not, Gerry?

Mr Phillips: Yes. Later on I think we get into forecasts and that is when we—

Mr B. Ward: Perhaps we can just have staff reword that whole paragraph, to reflect, for the Treasurer and everybody else, that the deficit should be $2.5 billion.

Mrs Sullivan: We might even specify it more by putting that fiscal year end of 1990-91.

Mr Sterling: I think it is important that you have the information in the report as to what in fact the deficit is. I would really like to see the deficits of the province and of the federal government. I would like to see the per capita debt of both, and the cumulative deficits as well, because in my view those things are to be considered in whether or not you spend money to get out of a recession.

It would be interesting for me as well to know what the per capita debt is in the American jurisdictions around us, because we continue to talk about the competitive situation. That is why I am interested in knowing that information: What do I recommend to the Treasurer to do in terms of his budget? You recommend on the basis of: Does he have any room to spend money? Should he drive the deficit higher by trying to spend his way out? Or should he be more concerned about holding the line? That is, I think, the political decision you make after the evidence is produced.

So what I would really like to see is an appendix to the report saying that the deficits are—I do not think anybody said the deficit was not substantial. I think there were several groups that said it was substantial, both here and at the federal level, but I would really like to know what the facts are, and per capita debt is an important number for people to relate to.

Mr Sutherland: To alleviate the wording problem, if you delete "billion" you deleted "and it is possible it might increase substantially," the sentence would seem to flow well and indicate that it was referring to this year.

Mr Christopherson: So it would read, "In Ontario, the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs and reduced revenue."

Mrs Sullivan: I would still like the words "plus expenditure decisions" included there as well.

The Chair: Does anybody have any problems with that?

Mr Sutherland: Maybe we should just leave that one alone now and come back to that issue.

Mr Stockwell: You cannot say you have a $2.5-billion deficit and then, in the same sentence, blame it everywhere except on the guy who is spending the money. For goodness' sake, let's be reasonable. If you have a $2.5-billion deficit, yes, some comes from social welfare costs, some comes from reduced revenue, I agree, some comes from transfer payments. But yes, some comes from spending money.

Mr Sutherland: If you want to put it from policy expenditures, that is fine, but we could get into quite a debate about SkyDome and UTDC. Whether you want to say policy expenditures by this government or by the past government, for that matter, we could debate that for hours.

Mr Stockwell: How about policy expenditures by previous governments?

The Chair: Just to interject, I think the phrase was "policy expenditures." Policy expenditures are expenditures. It is pretty open. It does not blame anybody.

Mrs Sullivan: "Expenditure decisions."

The Chair: It does not really blame anybody, does it? I mean, who is footing the bill?

Mr Christopherson: "Plus expenditure decisions." Let us get back to you.

Mr Phillips: What about "expenditure and revenue decisions"? That would reflect that the revenue is down by $70 million, too, because of the decision.

Mr Christopherson: We will have to set that aside for now and we will get back to you on that.

The Chair: Is that paragraph substantially okay?

Interjections.

Mr Stockwell: Let's move on and see what else we are not going to agree on.

Ms Anderson: Can I suggest this? We just take that first sentence, really, and then we will add some things about the current state of the per capita debt and move the rest of it later.

Mr Phillips: Transfer payments to the province have not been declining.

Mrs Sullivan: The rate of increase has been declining.

The Chair: Are we happy there?

Mr Christopherson: I am just a little unsure about exactly what is going to happen. I could not hear the researcher.

The Chair: This is the way it is going to stay unless we get directions to do something more specific with it, the changes we have heard: "In Ontario, the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs.... Such deficits have prevented governments from adopting"—

Mr Christopherson: No, no, no.

The Chair: That is out?

Mr Christopherson: Hold it, Mr Chairman, please. Slow down. We proposed what we would like to see in this paragraph and then we left it there to sit. The only thing I heard come back was from Mrs Sullivan, who asked that the words "plus expenditure decisions"—and then Mr Phillips suggested perhaps "expenditure and revenue decisions"—be tacked on after the words "welfare costs." Mr Sterling asked that there be an appendix regarding certain information. Those are the only three things I heard come out.

Our response was that we wanted just a chance to caucus later on and get back to this group on the request for "expenditure and revenue." Our concern is how the UTDC thing is going to play into it, and the SkyDome, and that is what we want to talk about. But I can appreciate the arguments made by Mrs Sullivan and Mr Stockwell. As to the rest of it, unless we hear something contrary, I am assuming it is out.

Mr Phillips: The rest of that paragraph?

Mr Christopherson: As the last time I read it, at Mrs Sullivan's request.

The Chair: Read it again, please, the way you envisioned it, whatever changes you want to make.

Mr Christopherson: "In Ontario, the deficit now stands at $2.5 billion as a result of reduced transfer payments, rising social welfare costs and"—and the rest of it is still to be finalized. Then it picks up with, the next sentence is, "Transfer payments to the provinces have been declining and provincial governments have had to find ways of meeting the shortfall through the introduction of innovative policies or by reducing their own expenditure. At the same time, any windfall from the GST might assist the federal government in its attempt to bring its deficit under control."

The Chair: Are we happy with that?

Mrs Sullivan: I do not know who said it. It is not transfer payments that are declining; it is the rate of increase in transfer payments.

Ms M. Ward: Having taken that first line out, the last sentence really has nothing to hang on. The paragraph does not have a good structure in terms of sense.

The Chair: It lacks unity, emphasis and coherence.

Ms M. Ward: That last sentence is like a thought thrown in that has nothing preceding it in the paragraph.

The Chair: Should the last sentence be deleted?

Mr Christopherson: I think the earlier reference to "federal" has been removed.

The Chair: So that should go?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mr B. Ward: I do not know what details we have to get in here, but I would like to add the word "approximate" before "$2.5 billion," because we are not really sure it is exactly $2.5 billion. It is approximately $2.5 billion.

The Chair: Okay. Next paragraph. Is anybody not okay? The third paragraph?

Mr Christopherson: One small change at the end, the last sentence. "It"—meaning Ontario—"retains a good industrial structure and it 'remains' the most attractive destination for immigrants."

The Chair: Any problems with page 2? Page 3? I wish some of my students were here to see how we are going through this word by word. A good lesson in writing.

Mr Phillips: It is like eating in a fine restaurant. You never want to go in and see how the stuff is made.

This is a detail, but, "However, the current recession is a natural reaction to a long period...." I have trouble accepting that.

Mr Christopherson: So do we. The fact is, we want it struck.

Mr Phillips: I think you accept that you never have a—okay, good.

The Chair: That "however" sentence is out? Where are we?

Mr Phillips: I am only one member of the committee.

Mr Christopherson: We were going to propose that.

Mr Phillips: At the bottom, Mr Chairman, "The Canadian economy operates in a barrier-free North American market." I am not sure it is barrier-free as yet, and what the definition of "North America"?

Mr Elston: It used to include Mexico.

Interjection: I think it should include Mexico.

Mr Elston: Mexico City, North America.

Mr Phillips: I just do not think it is an essentially barrier-free North America. It is an essentially barrier-free US-Canadian trade market.

The Chair: Almost. Is that "an almost barrier-free"?

Mr Phillips: Well, "almost barrier-free" or "essentially" or whatever is a better word. "US-Canadian market" as opposed to "North American."

Mr Elston: I would have even gone further with the contrary view to that being the case. In fact it is not barrier-free. There are more impediments, in my view, under the free trade organization's dispute resolution mechanisms and the problems that are inherent in state legislation than I think a lot of the federal authorities want us to believe. I think it certainly is not true as it pertains to trade between Ontario and Quebec or Ontario and Manitoba or Saskatchewan. I just think that is much too lenient a description of our trade deal of the moment.

Interjections.

Mr Elston: The fact of the matter is that this is incorrect, the way that we define the North American economic union about to be, if that is what it is going to become, because it just is not barrier-free.

Mr Christopherson: What would you suggest?

The Chair: I think the point here is to talk about what we have and the concern about where we might be going. We see the free trade agreement extended to Mexico and how that impacts on us. I think that is what that is meant to do.

Mr Elston: I just object to the "barrier-free" because we know that it is not.

The Chair: The suggestion is to take "barrier-free" out. "It is important to remember that the Canadian economy operates in a North American market."

Mr Christopherson: Actually, we have got a problem with the whole paragraph, to tell you the truth.

Mr Stockwell: What is your problem with that? Is your problem that you do not think it is going to happen or is your problem that you do not want to see it happen?

The Chair: My reading of what has been said is that it is not a real reflection of what is actually taking place.

Mr Stockwell: I understand what Mr Elston has said. It is talking, as I see it, in present terms and in future terms. We are talking about a market that is beyond our own. I suppose it is going to happen or it looks like it is going to happen. Now, we do not really have a lot of control over that. Are we simply ignoring the obvious?

cause we do not like it? I guess that is what I am trying point out. I am not saying we have to like it or dislike it.

Mr Jamison: It is not really barrier-free. Even the bilateral deal is not barrier-free, if you look at it. The Americans at this point, quite frankly, have the ability to out-301 us or countervail us or whatever.

Mr Stockwell: I do not want to get into a whole free trade debate. We are not going to agree on that. I guess that I would like to know is—

Mr Elston: You said, "What is your problem?" What is your problem?

Mr Stockwell: I think this is going to happen. It is going to happen because the federal government looks like it is committed to making it happen and I do not want to simply omit it because we do not happen to agree with the federal government. It is a fact of life, and shutting your eyes and hoping the lion does not see you is not the way of doing it.

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, with all due respect, I think that the debate here is whether or not it is barrier-free. Your part of the argument, from the way I understand you—and correct me if I am wrong—is that you are saying that it is barrier-free and that is the way we are moving. The argument that I hear from Mr Elston is that in fact there are lots of impediments. They are municipal, they are city-wide, they are state-wide and there is still the free trade deal itself.

Mr Stockwell: You have misunderstood my argument. My argument is that we are moving more towards a barrier-free—

Mr Sutherland: Why do you not say "tariff-free"? That is really what the free trade agreement was, to make it tariff-free not barrier-free.

Mrs Sullivan: I think we should just leave those words out.

Interjection: The whole paragraph?

Mrs Sullivan: No, just "barrier-free."

Mr Elston: All you need the paragraph for is to set the context for the operation of the economy, right? The pressures that are generated by increasingly hemispheric trade initiatives—maybe we should put "are going to cause a considerable period of rationalization" or "go hand in hand with the past three years," something like that. You are to set the context. That is what this thing is supposed to do for us, to forecast for the people reading this report that there are troubles ahead unless the government responds in a particular way, I presume. Since this is advice from the Treasurer, we are presumably alerting him and his colleagues in cabinet of the fact that he has got to do something.

The Chair: It is also a document, as you pointed out earlier and I think is worth repeating, that a lot of people are going to read and use as the gospel according to this committee. I will just leave it there.

Ms M. Ward: Given that a lot of people have called it a made-in-Canada recession, including people appearing here and what you read in the newspapers, can we really agree with the first sentence that, "It is impossible to point to...causes of the recession"?

Mr Stockwell: Oh, come on, name one person who says it is a made-in-Canada recession.

Ms M. Ward: I can find it in some of these briefs.

Mr Jamison: We had about three presenters who said that.

The Chair: The Royal Bank.

Ms M. Ward: I think the Conference Board of Canada did also.

The Chair: The Conference Board, the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association, the—

Mr B. Ward: Blame that on the federal government.

The Chair: It is a good job you were not here, boy, your ears would have been burning.

Mr Stockwell: If it is a made-in-Canada recession, we certainly have far-reaching powers because we now reach Europe and the United States and we are a major leader in world affairs.

Mr Jamison: Mr Stockwell, we led the way into the recession. We were there ahead of other countries.

Mr Stockwell: No, no, you said—we did not say we led the way into the recession. You said it is a made-in-Canada recession, meaning very clearly that no one else is in a recession and it is only through our ineptness that we are in a recession. Totally unbelievable, it is absurd.

Mr Christopherson: We would feel most comfortable just removing that first sentence.

The second thing we would change is that in the next sentence, the last sentence of page 3, the word "opportunities" be removed and replaced with the word "pressures." Actually, it would be "opportunities provided" replaced with "pressures." It would then read "partly in response to the pressures under the FTA."

Mr Elston: "Pressures generated by"?

Mr Christopherson: "Generated by the FTA."

Mrs Sullivan: I think it is important to leave the first sentence in. Indeed, it shapes what is a factor that is clearly on the table at the federal level. It will have a major impact on Ontario over the longer term, and the federal government is at the table on that issue. Whether the current administration in one of the provinces concurs or does not concur, the thing is that it can very likely happen, which is all that says. I think it should be there. It is a reality.

Mr Elston: Why do we not say that "the Canadian economy operates in a North American market that is quickly moving towards a hemispheric"—

Ms M. Ward: I thought we were talking about the first paragraph.

Mr Elston: Oh, I am sorry. I am bouncing around. We were talking about the last sentence in the last paragraph on page 3, and I thought we were at the first of that. I am sorry.

Mrs Sullivan: First paragraph on the page and the last—

The Chair: Can we deal with this paragraph and then glue it together? Could you read your suggestion again, Mrs Sullivan, about how you would like to see that last paragraph worded?

Mr Elston: Okay, that is where I thought we were.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, that is where I thought we were too. I am getting all confused. I would simply leave the first sentence in but for the words "barrier-free." Unlike the NDP representative who recommended that be taken out, I feel it is important for it to remain in because it is a reality that is going to have to be faced and "might even" is enough of a hedge that it describes the next phase of development, presumably, in an expanding market.

Whether the second sentence is changed to replace "opportunities" with "pressures," indeed there have been some opportunities for rationalization and increased productivity within Ontario under the FTA, and some of the pressures have lead to closed jobs. So, one or the other. Clearly, there has been a rationalization, not only due to the FTA but partly in response. Why do we not just say "partly in response to the FTA"?

Mr Christopherson: I am a little unclear. We are certainly open on this. We are not hard and fast on the position.

The Chair: Could you read your whole paragraph as you see it?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, but I am a little confused.

Ms M. Ward: Maybe I misunderstood, Dave, because I brought up the point about the first sentence on the page and I thought that was the sentence that you were referring to. It is not?

The Chair: No. We are dealing with the last paragraph. We will get back to your first paragraph. Could you read your last paragraph again?

Mrs Sullivan: "It is important to remember that the Canadian economy operates in a North American market that is likely to be expanded in the near term and which might even become a hemispheric market in the medium to long term. The Canadian and Ontario business sector has undergone a period of considerable rationalization during the past three years, partly in response to the FTA."

Mr B. Ward: Could we add one word? "It is important to remember that the Canadian economy primarily operates" because we do have trade with Europe—

The Chair: "Primarily."

Mr B. Ward: "Primarily operates" recognizes that most of our trade is with the United States.

Mr Stockwell: Fine.

Mr B. Ward: However, the reality is that we do have some trade.

Mr Christopherson: Somebody had already jumped to the last paragraph before we had a chance to do the second one. I did not want to throw us off, but—

The Chair: Let's do the first paragraph under "Causes of the Recession."

Ms M. Ward: I just brought that point up. I was making a recommendation. I do not agree with that statement that, "It is impossible to point to" maybe no specific cause" but "the causes of the recession." The interest rate was what concerned me. I do not think there is much emphasis on it through here.

Mr Elston: So you just take out the first sentence start off, "Numerous factors have converged...." It does not make much difference.

The Chair: Strike that first sentence: "It is impossible to point to a specific cause or causes of the recession."

Mr B. Ward: David probably worked for hours on that sentence. We are taking it out, Mr Chair?

The Chair: I am at the will of the committee.

Mr Stockwell: Fine, take it out.

The Chair: Paragraph 2?

Mr Christopherson: I just want to mention early on we have changes but some of the chapters, if I can call them that, did a very good job, as we saw it, of attributing statements to the groups that came in. They were very clear that this group said this, a number of either labour groups or business groups or economic forecasters. There were some chapters or sections that did not. This was one of them where we thought there should be more attributing of some of these statements, as opposed to just naming them straight up. For the note of the researchers, we saw pages 1 and 8 as good examples of doing that a lot more thoroughly.

The third paragraph, middle of the paragraph, "The high exchange rate of the Canadian dollar is caused by a number of factors, none of which can be considered in isolation." We have a bit of a problem with that to the extent that, although this may be a philosophical departure point, the whole concept of the made-in-Canada recession and why the Canadian dollar is where it is we see clearly a decision of the Bank of Canada at the behest of the support of the federal government. To just say it is caused by a number of factors and not point more specifically gives us a real problem.

The Chair: Could I have a line or something from you that you can live with there?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Let me throw this out for discussion: "Is caused primarily by the Bank of Canada"

Mr Stockwell: We need a reference point.

Mr Christopherson: We did throw in "primarily" Chris.

Mr Stockwell: No, we did not.

Mr Christopherson: I thought so.

Mr Stockwell: The trouble is in the second paragraph "The onset of the American recession." I guess you would have to include, "led by Canadian policymaking," if it is the made-in-Canada recession. I forgot that.

Mr Elston: No, it says, "had a major effect on helping to deepen the recession."

Mr Stockwell: But I am saying you will have to include the only reason they are in a recession is because of the led the way.

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mr Stockwell: No?

Mr Christopherson: A made-in-Canada recession does not mean—

Mr Stockwell: We pulled them in with us.

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mr Stockwell: Okay.

Mr B. Ward: They have their own problems.

Mr Stockwell: I see. So we have a made-in-Canada recession, a made-in-the-United-States recession, a made-in-England recession. It is kind of weird how we all go in the same time.

Mr Christopherson: That sentence is very carefully constructed and as far as we are concerned it is very accurate.

The Chair: Could I have again, for the sake of the searchers, the change that you are proposing for that paragraph, then, Mr Christopherson?

Mr Christopherson: At this point it is, "The high exchange rate of the Canadian dollar is caused primarily by the Bank of Canada" period, striking "by a number of factors, none of which can be considered in isolation." That part is struck in our proposal.

Mr Phillips: I know it is a lot of fun to blame this on row, but I thought the credit people had a reasonably good observation in their notes on the economy they gave to the federal government. As I say, it is fun to blame it on row totally, but one of the reasons he had to keep it high we can only get money to service our debt nationally offshore. You can only attract it by the interest rates. It is not as simple as we would like.

I think we all think, "Reduce interest rates, the Canadian dollar drops to 80 cents, we are all out of the woods," whatever. But as he says here, or as the credit union people say, for example, "Overseas investors have significant investments in the short-term instruments. This money could leave the country quickly, producing a sharp drop in the Canadian dollar," which we all might like, but as I say, I think we have to be a little bit careful of being overly simplistic, and that is why maybe the writers put that in. I do not want to minimize the fact that it is not going to be simple to reduce.

Mr Jamison: I think that what we are trying to say, and say clearly, is that there is an extremism on the part of the position of the dollar at this time.

The Chair: If I could interject here, rationalization for the high Canadian dollar is not what you said. The constant reminder of the Bank of Canada is that the dollar is high because of inflation. That is the reason it is high, to curb inflation. That is the primary reason, as I understand it and not that one of the presenters indicated that the dollar would not fall, that interest rates would not fall.

Mr Phillips: I think all the banks said, "Listen, we do have a substantial part of our debt that is offshore and one of the challenges in taking the dollar down, taking interest rates down is whether we will be able to service our national debt or not."

The Chair: In response to a question that I put to one of the bank associations about that—I asked to what extent our debt was offshore and to what extent the federal deficit was being financed offshore instead of just buying it within. The response that came back was that most of the federal deficit is financed here and the problem lies with the industrial sector that had borrowed its money offshore in response to the shortage of money here because the federal government was taking it up, and our interest rates were held high in order to curb inflation.

Mr Phillips: I would have to reread Hansard. I have just a different recollection.

Mr Stockwell: The Canadian Bankers' Association said exactly what Mr Phillips just said, word for word. Exactly that. I think it is unfair, and again, you can play games and put it all on one person, but the last deputation made that exact point.

The Chair: We have heard many others.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, but there are always conflicting views, and to simply say that is the primary reason is unfair.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chairman, in recognition of the comments made—and we are an easy-going bunch, as you will find—to include "primarily caused by the Bank of Canada and federal government deficit," we can live with that.

Mr Elston: I may be out of turn, but do we have to pinpoint all the reasons behind each of these problems? Are we not asking in this paragraph to identify the reasons why we find ourselves in a recession? Yes, we find ourselves in a recession because of some global problems; yes, the tight monetary policy contributes to the recession that hit us; yes, there is a problem with the value of the high exchange rate of the Canadian dollar. Are we charged with trying to determine exactly why everything has happened that way? Are we not just enumerating those as causes of our recession? So why are we worried about whether or not it is attributable to X, Y or Z? Let's just identify those as problems with which we have to wrestle. I mean, we are not here to solve the world's problems.

Ms M. Ward: I think we have two different things here that we are arguing about. Mr Phillips is objecting to our blaming it on the Bank of Canada, saying that the Bank of Canada may have some valid reasons for its actions. But I do not think that stops us from identifying it, that the high Canadian dollar is caused by interest rates. That there might be an argument that those are justified is a separate thing.

Mr Elston: I just say to identify that high interest rates cause problems, high exchange rates in the Canadian dollar cause problems and let's let the Treasury people figure out what the problems are.

The Chair: Can we live with that?

Mr Christopherson: I understand what Mr Elston is saying, but what is his proposal vis-à-vis what is in front of us?

Mr Elston: I just basically said let's not try to attribute the blame. All we have to do is identify.

Interjection.

Mr Elston: Well, you can just identify it and say tight monetary policies or global problems, whatever. What does it say? "Circumstances peculiar to Canada and Ontario are also responsible for the local recession. In part, they are part of the response to the global changes described above. The tight monetary policy of the Bank of Canada...the high exchange rate of the Canadian dollar." Just list them.

Mr B. Ward: So you are saying "these circumstances include."

Mr Elston: Yes. If you start saying it "is caused by" then perhaps that is where we are going to have some problems with dissent and we may never get by this paragraph. But it is certainly clear, I think, and all of us can agree, high interest is a problem for us in Ontario; the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar is a problem for us here in Canada, and in Ontario in particular. The policies, from the Treasurer's point of view, are going to have to be developed to help minimize those influences on our economic condition. So let's let him figure that out.

The Chair: Can we live with that?

Mr Elston: Let's just list them.

The Chair: The first three sentences would sit as they are, and then you are suggesting "the high exchange rate of the Canadian dollar"—

Mr Elston: —"is also a contributing factor," if you want, and then you do not even have to say what it is caused by.

The Chair: I think he said the high interest rates, the high value of the Canadian dollar. Just list the factors and then get on with it.

Mr Elston: I may be missing something, but is that not maybe enough for it?

Ms Anderson: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: The only thing I would suggest, though, is that what we have heard from most of the people who came forward is that it was a two-punch. You have to tie the high exchange rate and the high interest rates hand in hand.

Mr Elston: They are listed there together.

Mr Christopherson: But I am saying they should really be in one sentence, in the same sentence so that they are given equal weight, that is all.

Mr Elston: I think of this report to be read by somebody who just got laid off and who would try to identify whether or not we were doing real work or whether we were being a little bit fictitious. Would they agree that they have been affected by, or the economy has been affected by, high interest rates, by the high value of the Canadian dollar internationally and by global changes? I think they would understand that and say, "Yes, that's probably pretty clear." Now, are they going to be as concerned about whom to attribute those problems to, consistent with their own problems? I think they are not as concerned about that, but they want to know that this is a valuable piece of advice for the Treasurer, so that if we can identify problems, then the Treasurer can take steps to deal with those issues, if he can.

Mr Christopherson: I am sure they will want to know in 1992, but in terms of right now, your point is taken. I think as long as we took the tight monetary policy of the Bank of Canada in addition to the high exchange rate and tied a sentence in that way, if that is a fair compromise, that meets our needs and I think it might go a long way to meeting yours. I do not know about Mr Stockwell.

Mr Stockwell: Fine.

The Chair: We can write off page 3?

Interjection: Sounds like it.

The Chair: Page 4.

Mr Phillips: Can we be more specific on that, "in long term, political uncertainty in Canada, caused by NDP election"?

Interjections.

Mr Phillips: Okay, I am kidding.

Mr Christopherson: And I thought we were bending over backwards to be non-partisan here.

Mr Phillips: I assume that does refer to—

Interjection: The Constitution.

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Interjection: Maybe we should spell it out.

Interjection: Where is this?

Mr Phillips: Two lines, halfway down.

Mr Christopherson: Do you want to say "constitutional uncertainty in Canada"?

Mr Phillips: This will elicit, I am sure, some discussion, you know. I believe it. Specifically what it will be something the committee should discuss.

Mr Christopherson: I think that is a fair point. Whenever the Treasurer is having consultations with people, wherever possible he tries to ask them what their thoughts are on the constitutional question. I think that is recognition of the impact that whole matter is having on dollars and investments. That is why when you mention I think it is well worth making it very clear, when we say "political," we are talking about the constitutional uncertainty. I think it is a valid point.

Ms M. Ward: Is it possible, though, that the words "cannot fail" are a little too strong? Are we not saying it is a foregone conclusion that it is going to happen.

Mr Stockwell: Are you going to put those in?

Ms M. Ward: No, the words are there, "cannot fail."

Interjection: "May"?

The Chair: We could say, "Constitutional uncertainty in Canada could have an adverse effect on investment decisions."

Mr Stockwell: Do you really think that is watering it down? "Could have"? I mean, it is going to have.

Mr Christopherson: It is having. But to what degree? We are not measuring degrees here, but if anybody wants make the statement that it is not having an impact out there, I would challenge it.

Mr Stockwell: I think pretending it could have—you are suggesting that it is not here.

Ms M. Ward: "Is expected to"?

Mr Stockwell: It is here. It is having its effect.

The Chair: Then you could say, "Constitutional uncertainty in Canada is having some adverse effect on investment decisions."

Mr Elston: If you wanted to hedge your bets a little, you could put in some escape words for the committee's benefit. If you cannot pinpoint a definite presenter, you could say, "It is the committee's feeling from the general sense of presentations given that the constitutional uncertainty surrounding Canada's future is having an adverse effect on...." If you want to escape being definitive, that is the way to do it. I think it is a general sense that I get from listening to members in turn, who have heard more of the presentations than I did, that you feel—

Mr Stockwell: It has been stated.

Mr Elston: Okay, then you should just go right ahead and say that.

Mr Christopherson: Unless others have a problem.

Mr Elston: How far do you want to go as a committee in underscoring that for the purposes of somebody who does political analysis of committee work in this Legislature, for the benefit of investors in New York or some other place, jurisdiction? They read this stuff. Particularly people in the state of New York, for instance, are looking at any advantage at all. If they can hold up a committee report that says our own committees are identifying now that the constitutional uncertainty is a reason why people are not investing in Ontario, you may find yourself commiserated just slightly by that as you try to go the rounds to say, "Don't set up your new business in Buffalo."

It is just something that you have to be aware of once you get into the position of writing these reports, because whether they are seen to be government-adopted reports or not, these are government workings in the province of Ontario, government in the small-g sense. So consider the wording from that point of view, I think.

The Chair: Since you put it that way, should we take that up?

Mr Christopherson: Let's come back to it. You raise a valid point and I think we would like to chew on it.

The Chair: Does anybody have any problems with that page?

Mrs Sullivan: I am looking at the very last sentence of the first paragraph, page 4. "At the same time, because companies that have been unable to compete successfully have failed, only the most efficient producers are likely to survive and be competitive in the post-recession period." I think what you are looking at here is a statement that really reflects the reality only—maybe not only, but specifically the manufacturing sector.

The discussion about productivity increases and competitive successes largely related to an increase that was also occurring in additional value added in those sectors. Certainly in any recessionary period the tough fighters are the ones that stay in, but I think, by example, of the construction industry, where a lot of their failures are market-driven rather than productivity-driven. I think that is a little too all-encompassing.

The Chair: How would you like to change that?

Mrs Sullivan: I am not sure. Maybe the writers can come up with something that would take into—

The Chair: Would you prefer something along the lines of, "In the manufacturing sector, some companies have been unable to compete successfully because they have not been efficient producers"—

Mrs Sullivan: No.

The Chair: I am just trying to be helpful here.

Mrs Sullivan: No. A lot of the companies in the manufacturing sector have all sorts of other issues affecting them. I just think there are other forces that have caused companies to fail and close down. The brush is just too broad there.

Mr Elston: I am also concerned, because this could suggest to people that the only reason companies are closing their doors here is because they are not competitive, while in fact the truth of the matter is that several have been purchased by foreign concerns and are now moved beyond our boundaries, particularly in the United States.

One of the first big issues that had to be dealt with by the new government was the issue of Consumers' Gas and who should buy or who should not. It does not mean, because these plants no longer operate in Ontario or in Canada, that they were not productive. Their loss is very hard felt here, but because they are so competitive, because they had good products, they now perhaps are manufacturing someplace else. I want to attribute some blame to the good product lines that are manufactured by some of these concerns that now are being made other places.

The Chair: How do we do that?

Mr Elston: I do not know. It just makes it more complex. I know the desire is always to try to go as quickly and as simply—

Interjection.

The Chair: Multinationals closing branch plants and moving them to the States.

Mr Elston: And taking product lines with them.

Mr Jamison: That is right. Restructuring once the buyout takes place. That is happening quite frequently.

Mr Elston: I do not want to make it look as though the Ontario marketplace is so highly uncompetitive and therefore we are all closing down. It is not the only story in town. That is all.

Mr Hansen: I would have to agree on your point, Mr Elston. We heard for a period of time that it was consolidation, that there were plants in the far south that had the capacity to run another shift. I think we would be letting the word out to other companies that want to locate here in Ontario that it is a scary place to come. I think you are correct in that sense. It was multinational companies that were consolidating their product lines.

The Chair: We need to give some direction here about what we would like to do with this phrase. Should we just take it out?

Mr Elston: It is strange. It seems to be a given that only the most efficient producers are likely to survive. It is a just the problem that in Ontario's economy the most efficient producers also are being taken away. I just do not know how you wed the ideas in there.

Mr Christopherson: I think the points are well made. We are comfortable with the writers taking another run at it, bearing in mind some of the things that have been said here, and we will all take a fresh look at it.

Mr B. Ward: I think it is also important, the point Mr Christopherson made about having the writers reflect which organizations expressed these opinions. That would be helpful as well, because we have met with a large number of groups and I do not recall which organization, if any, told us, "At the same time, those companies which were unable to compete successfully failed." I do not recall which organization told us that. When they redo this report, when they slot these opinions in, then as a committee, under observations and recommendations we can agree, disagree or expand on whatever we have heard.

Mrs Sullivan: You might want to look at the CIBC. The chief economist for the CIBC was quite direct in her discussion relating to the lean and mean operations that would exist after coming out of this recessionary period.

Mr B. Ward: As most of us have, I missed some meetings when we were consulting with the organization. So as they redraft this report, to slot in which groups or which representatives expressed these opinions would be helpful as we firm up our own observations and recommendations.

Mr Phillips: Can I make another general point?

The Chair: Are we off that point?

Mr Phillips: Just because I think we are going to break at 3:30. The challenge for us, I think, is to make sure we do not forget areas that may be important but did not appear before us, that we each reflect on them a little. I think there is always a tendency to hear the squeaky wheel. I do not know whether I have them all right, but there were very few people from the environment here; a year ago or two years ago, I think we would have had them here. I think we should at least think about that so our report is not incomplete. Similarly, I do not think there was anybody from policing here, whether that is an issue or not, nor rapid transit. We had all the road builders, but none of the—

Mr Sutherland: We did get Transport 2000.

Mr Phillips: Did we? I do not remember that. We had somebody from pulp and paper—I guess they did send one in—and mines. Those were five things that at least I am going to think a little about, to make sure we do not forget. They are important areas; just because they did not happen to make an appearance. I wanted to raise that before we go away so that when we issue this report somebody does not say, "Well, how could you ever consider an economic port without"—whatever it is.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, we are a few minutes away from adjournment. Maybe we should end it right there. We have completed page 4 as far as we are concerned. As long as we have another month and one hour we will get through this, no problem. But we would like to adjourn rather than start into another page, which could take us into—

The Chair: Perhaps if we could all come back tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock having examined it, we could maybe move a little quicker through the preambles, then we can get into the recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: By way of process, I assume we will continue this way; if we can expedite it, fine. At least having done it once, we have some sense now of how it might work. It would appear that there are some differences but at least a certain level of co-operation on the parts, and I think that is very helpful.

Could I ask how we would proceed with the observations and recommendations part? I understand how we do the text. Does anybody have any suggestions? For instance, does one of us want to start out with what our thoughts would be on it and then let the others put their thoughts out, or what would you suggest?

The Chair: Just by way of interjection, we have to guess we will be getting it by tomorrow morning—all the recommendations that all of the groups put forward. This is just a thought, as you asked—

Mr Christopherson: You are not going to suggest that we do every one.

The Chair: Perhaps we could go through it in caucuses, and decide what we want to do, where we want to go with this, or, if you want, how you want to come back with recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: Let me try something out. We can come back, if you wish, as we have done here: We will take first cut in terms of what we would like to see, and then let's see if there is any chance at all of any kind of consensus that could be found by tinkering or playing with it; if not, then maybe a recognition that that is going to be our position, it is the majority position, and that the dissenting reports that are more than likely to follow are going to take their own position.

In fact, if either of the two opposition parties wants to counter with its proposal to show that maybe we are not that far apart, that we can close the gap, then by all means. But if there is a recognition that we are way off the beam, then why beat a dead horse? The reality is that the majority is here and you have your opportunity for dissent. What we would like to see us focus on maybe is those things that could work to find compromise, to find consensus, because that is going to be the real beneficial material, quite frankly, because it has the non-partisan hat.

Mr Stockwell: I do not know about the other parties but our recommendations are ready. I do not know if you have had a chance to do your recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: No, that is what we are going to now.

Mr Stockwell: If you can bring those recommendations forward, I do not see that it would be a big problem if I want to exchange and see if there is any common ground. Frankly, I do not think there is, but I am prepared to discuss them.

Mrs Sullivan: We read yours in the paper the other day.

Mr Elston: To quote from page 5, Mr Chair, "The general theme is one of considerable uncertainty."

The Chair: We are adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 1531.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 5 February 1991

The committee met at 1014 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair: We can begin. I think we have a sufficient party representation here. If I remember correctly, we had struggled to page 4. We had finished page 4, complete. Do we have any reconsidered changes or comments?

Mr Elston: Are we heading back to page 2? Are we picking up all the stuff that was left off or are we going to the end?

Mr Christopherson: No, we will not be heading back. We will just keep pushing ahead for today.

Mr Stockwell: So, are we on page 5?

The Chair: We are about to start page 5. Is that right, Mr Elston?

Mr Stockwell: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: We have "Forecasts" on the bottom of page 4. We are okay on the first paragraph at the bottom of the page, Mr Chair.

The Chair: So we are at the top of page 5, "The general theme." Is that satisfactory with everybody?

Mr Christopherson: First paragraph on 5 is okay with us.

The Chair: Okay, second paragraph.

Mr Phillips: Does that mean 1991 or 1992?

Mr Rampersad: Sorry, that is 1991. That is a mistake.

The Chair: I am glad to see Mr Phillips is alert this morning. Any other problems with paragraph 2?

Mr Christopherson: The "should" in the second-last sentence. We were more comfortable with "may."

The Chair: "Sales tax, should boost output." You want to change "should" to "may"? Anybody have any problems with changing "should" to "may"? All right. Can we write off paragraph 2 as being completed? Paragraph 3.

Mr Christopherson: Two things. It says "the inflation rates are likely to rise," and yet we heard from a number of people who said that there virtually would not be any inflation of any significance because of the recession. We were a little confused by that. Then we were not comfortable with saying "substantially in 1992." Again, I did not think there was that much confidence out there. We are more comfortable with "somewhat."

Ms M. Ward: There appears to me to be a contradiction too between that and the next paragraph on inflation rates, because they are saying "likely to rise" and the last paragraph mentions a "reduction in inflation rate" in the second line.

The Chair: Yes, I see that.

Ms M. Ward: So, while you are speaking of that point, I thought you might consider this one at the same time.

The Chair: What you are saying is, you cannot have it both ways, paragraphs 3 and 4. Should we have that whole section reworked, and how would we want it reworked? The forecasters were projecting a flat inflation rate at the very minimum. Towards the end of 1991 they were expecting an increase in employment or a flattening out and a gradual beginning of the upturn of the economy.

Mr Rampersad: But we did have signs of it declining during the year.

The Chair: Then if the third paragraph refers to Ontario, maybe it should say "in Ontario" and the next one should say "in Canada as a whole" somehow. I think we need to make that distinction there. Okay?

Mr Christopherson: Rework those two paragraphs and then after they are redrafted we will take a look at them fresh. When would we get the first draft of some of the changes we have talked about, or are we waiting to go through the whole document? Second, how will they appear? What is the format?

Ms Anderson: It is up to the committee how you want to do it, whether you get it on a piecemeal basis or whether you go through the whole draft once and then you get a whole revised draft back. That is up to you. How you get it, the way we usually do it is something called red-lining, where you get a version that will look like this, which has Xs through bits that have been taken out and underlining on bits which have been inserted.

Mr Christopherson: I see. If possible, if we could get chunks of it as they are done—I realize there is only so much that can be humanly done, but I think it would make it easier for us to keep the flow going—as quickly as possible.

That is it for us on that page, Mr Chair, obviously.

Mr Elston: I know that we all know "83 and 84 cents" is against the US dollar, but perhaps for completeness it could be added.

The Chair: This is Table 1: Ontario Economic Outlook (A Comparison of Forecasts—to follow). This is the table that will go in at that point. Has anybody any questions or problems about the insertion of this table at that point?

Mr Christopherson: No, just a question. I am trying to think. We had talked over here about forecasters and how accurate they had been. It is a good reference point. There was Informetrica. Is that how you say the name of the company? Were there any other forecasters that came in? No? They are here. Could they be added? Could Mike's projections, if they are available, be added?

Ms Anderson: They did not actually have any numbers, very much. They had graphs.

Mr Rampersad: Whatever numbers he mentioned were Canadian as opposed to Ontario. These are Ontario numbers.

Mr Christopherson: Okay. That is fine.

Mr Phillips: He is a smart forecaster.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. I was going to say he forecasts often and vaguely.

The Chair: It would be interesting to compare these projections with the projections for the last time they made projections.

Mr Christopherson: At first glance I thought that is what it was. It would be nice to go back five years and get a sense of those numbers.

Mrs Sullivan: I wonder if in this section it might be useful to look at a report that is out from Statistics Canada today. Actually, it was released yesterday. We have not had this kind of testimony before the committee, but we may want to include a caveat in the report. Basically their most recent economic indicator shows a serious decline. Your chief of current analysis says the recession is broadening and deepening and he is quoted as saying, "I cannot see a recovery in any of the major sectors."

The Chair: You have me at a disadvantage; I have not read that this morning.

Mrs Sullivan: We can get material from Statscan relating to this report. It was released yesterday. They are clearly showing a greater concern than the economists who appeared before the committee. We may want to include that kind of information as a caveat because they are working with the latest leading-indicator changes from the end of November.

The Chair: Can we get those numbers?

Ms Anderson: We will try to get the material.

The Chair: Can we get a copy for everybody in the committee, of all the numbers, not just what is in the newspapers?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, I would think that, sure, the researchers could get it directly from the people at Statscan. These are national figures, but it may be worth while to include them.

The Chair: There might be a breakdown.

Mr Christopherson: You may want to look at actually incorporating some of that into the body because of the importance of the information and the profile of the presenters. We may want to look at actually incorporating some of that in the body because of its importance and who it is coming from.

Mr Elston: I understand that but we may not want to. If you start doing it, next week there may be something else you may want.

Mr Christopherson: We would only go until Thursday.

Mr Elston: I understand that, but none of us has really taken a look at it. It is nice to have that as a caveat just to draw people's attention to the Statscan material, but it is a little hard to include it in a report when you have not really been able to sift and digest it. Do you know what I mean? We can say we have put our material together without assistance of this, "but please note for a more current analysis the Statscan material which was released" whenever.

Mr Christopherson: I think it is a point well taken but let me ask a question. Do we still have the native group coming in?

The Chair: They have not responded and I would assume at this point that it is no, since they will be meeting the Treasurer on Thursday. However, I have also heard from Mr Elston that if they did want to come, we should perhaps listen to them, and that of course would be decided here.

Mr Christopherson: I guess the point I was getting at was, even as late as yesterday morning we were still receiving submissions and acknowledged that some of that material could indeed be in the body of the report. I was looking at this in the same light, given the fact that it is coming from Statscan, that is all.

Mrs Sullivan: I think my point was just that it would be useful to note that there are other indicators that are changing things over time. These are national figures. They are not specific to Ontario, nor do they release a breakdown for Ontario. Just on that page, it might be useful as a caveat, to say there are other changes that are being seen. I do not think it should be a very big thing. We have not had any interviews with Statscan, we have not viewed its material, and it would be unusual to include a further data in the report, but I think that just to say that this report has been issued.

Mr Christopherson: At the very least I think that should happen. I would just suggest that maybe, from where we come, we may reserve the right to look at whether we think it should be in the body or maybe make it part of our observations.

Mr Elston: What I do not understand is, where do you come from? I do not understand how you can ask us to include very much material in the body of the report when we have not seen the thing. I think Mrs Sullivan has rightly brought to our attention that there are other things being put out even as we make our report. How can you ask the committee to include some material in the body of the report from that when we have not seen it yet or had the time to analyse it? I think if there is a caveat, that is enough.

Mr Christopherson: I did not suggest that all of the report had to be included, or a heavy analysis, but much of our deliberation has been how deep, how wide, how long in terms of the recession, and if there is information that is merely conclusive and being reported by Statscan then there may be a value in our at least referencing that information in the body as part of the text somewhere. I am just suggesting maybe that is something we should at least reserve the right to look at. I have not had the benefit of seeing the information either, but it may be that a sentence or two would be appropriate and that the committee would have a high comfort level on that.

The Chair: We have had a request from the press for copy of this document as we are working on it now. They're here. The question is, do we share it with them in its current state, or how do we want to deal with this?

Mr Stockwell: Sure, give it to them. Since we are in public, you have to give them a copy.

Mr Elston: Let's give them a copy and then go in camera. You have learned our provincial secrets, take it back.

The Chair: Not only that, let's change everything.

Mr Stockwell: You missed a story yesterday, a thorough, conclusive—that was the story of the day.

The Chair: Can we say page 5 is done and move to page 6? I have this nature about me, I like to move along. On page 6, are there any changes, comments?

Mr Christopherson: Other than the heading, we have no major concerns, unless other members from even our caucus have something they have noticed after that. I have nothing to present on our behalf other than the heading change.

Mrs Sullivan: What is your problem with the heading?

Mr Christopherson: We were suggesting dropping "answers in," leaving "partnership" and just adding an "s," "partnerships."

Mrs Sullivan: Is this a new secret NDP word?

Mr Christopherson: Nothing is a secret, Barbara. It's an NDP government.

Mr B. Ward: Open and honest.

The Chair: This is the first time these committee hearings have been done publicly.

Mrs Sullivan: Pardon me? I object to that, because in fact the committee has always operated in public. It is unusual for a committee report to be prepared in camera. I object to the fact that you have indicated that this is the first time the committee hearings have been done in public. They have been done in public since they were initiated in the last government.

The Chair: Then your information is different from mine. Shall we continue? Anything else on that page?

Mr Christopherson: No, we are okay.

Mr Stockwell: How about "Partnership in Answers"?

The Chair: Can we write that page off? Are we happy with that page? Page 7. No problems with page 7?

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mr Christopherson: Third paragraph, second sentence, the phrase "despite the overall surplus." We have some difficulty with that. In reading it, it could be implied that there is a surplus of non-profit and co-operative housing or affordable housing, so we felt more comfortable just moving that, so it would read, "The committee also learned from a number of non-profit and co-operative housing groups that there is a continued need for affordable housing."

Ms Anderson: I put that in initially because in the first paragraph it talks about there being a large inventory of housing. It was just to explain that the need is for affordable, as opposed to being a shortage in general. But I think it probably can just come out.

Mr Christopherson: It was a little hazy.

The Chair: What is the consensus there? "Despite the overall surplus" comes out, and just leave the sentences the way they are.

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

The Chair: Does anybody have any questions or problems with that?

Mr Elston: I am a little slower on this because I did not hear the presentations, but can I hear the reason for "the overall surplus" again?

Ms Anderson: In the middle of the first paragraph, it talks about evidence that was here that there is a large inventory of housing at the present in the province, yet you go down to the third one and you are saying there is a need for more housing. I just wanted to show that you had realized there was a connection.

The Chair: Can we say page 8 is done?

Mr Phillips: A little thing on the interprovincial migration: My recollection was that the immigration numbers were probably at a 10-year high into the province. I realize this is interprovincial migration, but I would not mind if the drafters took a look at the total migration. The implication of this is that we are losing more people out of the province than are coming in, and I do not personally believe that.

The Chair: Is not the projection for the greater Toronto area to grow at 250,000 a year for the next 10 years?

Mr Phillips: It is just a small point. What they are saying is that more people left the province to go to other provinces. That may be the case, but I think there was a record number of immigrants who came into the province last year, at least a 10-year number.

The Chair: We will check that.

Mrs Sullivan: I am looking at the final paragraph on page 8, where we have basically a summation of some of the initiatives that have been brought to us from the outside. There are two I do not see here, one of them being a proposal that I think came from the Ontario Home Builders' Association, but it may be in Toronto, relating to a new home ownership incentive; the other relating to proposals from at least two co-operative housing groups talking about the need for the availability of changing existing apartment buildings into co-operatives. They were presented as alternatives as much as some of these other things were, and came from at least a couple of groups that appeared before us. I have not checked this back from this paper, but they were there as recommendations.

The Chair: Is it not on the top of page 9?

Mrs Sullivan: I am not sure, but if we are going to be listing alternatives and recommendations that were placed before us—

The Chair: "Subsidies towards the financing of non-profit rent-geared-to-income housing; facilitating the conversion of existing units to non-profit; opening up the bids for construction of non-profit housing to the private sector." Top of page 9.

Mrs Sullivan: You have that. Sorry I missed it. There was also another one with a recommendation for new incentives for home ownership.

Ms Anderson: I mentioned that briefly in the housing section at the end, where there has actually been some overlap, but it could come forward into that one.

Mrs Sullivan: Where do you have that?

Ms Anderson: The conversion one is at the top of page 9. Under "Social Issues," there is a short section on housing, on page 16, in which there is some duplication with the section on construction. At the bottom of that, there is the suggestion for expanding the home ownership plan. I think in many ways those two sections could easily be combined.

The Chair: Are we happy with page 8?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, with that one change.

The Chair: Page 9? Are we happy with the first two paragraphs? Okay, let's move to "Education."

Mrs Sullivan: I think there should be some clarification of the figures in the first paragraph, given the testimony of the Minister of Education before the committee. I wonder if the writers could reformulate the description here. "At present, the province funds 45.4% of total expenditure (including capital and pensions)," 41% of total operating expenditure, 59.6% of capital, pensions and approved expenditures. I think these figures are confusing enough. The minister spoke to the committee in a way that was quite definitive and I think it is important that this should be further delineated, and maybe the researchers can do—

Ms Anderson: You to want to expand in order to just define it better?

Mrs Sullivan: For instance, "total approved expenditure" or "total expenditures to a cap": "At present, the province funds 45.4% of total operating expenditure." Maybe that does it.

Mr Christopherson: What is being suggested?

Mrs Sullivan: Just the addition of the word "operating."

Mr Christopherson: Where?

Mrs Sullivan: In "45.4% of total operating expenditure."

Mr Christopherson: It is not, though. That is the difference between the two, is it not?

Mr Stockwell: No, it is operating, plus capital and pensions, and then just operating.

Mrs Sullivan: "Total operating expenditure." That clarifies it.

Mr Christopherson: Wait a minute, though. I am not at variance with what is being suggested. I think that might muck it up even more. "At present, the province funds 45.4% of total expenditure (including capital and pensions) and 41.5% of operating expenditure." Maybe if it said "operating expenditure" alone, if you wanted to clarify it, but the way you are adding it in I think maybe makes it a little more unclear.

Mr Stockwell: Why do you not say "total operating expenditure, plus capital and pensions, and 41.5% of operating expenditure." Put "plus" instead of "including" that clears it up.

Mr Christopherson: I disagree, but I do not want to make a mountain out of a molehill.

Mr Phillips: Actually, what she says is technically right. I think we have not seen the end of this, because I think you are going to see sort of a bit of a firestorm eventually coming at you, but that will be fine.

The Chair: Do you mean the paragraph will be fine?

Mr Phillips: Yes, because I do not think there is a confusion out there about what was meant. It is just how you may try to interpret it in the future. My question is the bottom paragraph.

The Chair: Could I ask you to wait until we finish that paragraph, and then we will do yours? You will be next.

Mr Phillips: I would think it is technically correct to say, "the province funds 45.4% of total operating expenditure (including capital and pensions)." That is technically correct.

Mr Stockwell: They are separate. You have operating expenditure, you have capital and you have pensions, so you can say "of total operating expenditure (plus capital and pensions) and then you have "41.5% of direct operating expenditure," just operating.

Mr Christopherson: Actually, you could lead in by saying "using the "41.5% of operating expenditure only, and 45.4% of total expenditure (including capital and pensions)." I think it is fairly clear then that you are saying "operating plus those two. The problem is that you are using the inclusive clause first, and then narrowing it down to a single definition in the second part of the sentence, which is probably what is confusing it.

Mr Stockwell: Fine. Reverse it. Let's go.

Ms Anderson: We will redraft it and bring it back to you.

Mr Phillips: My comment is on the last sentence. I would prefer to say, "However, some groups suggest that it must be taken to ensure..." The reason I say that is that I would think teachers never anticipated that the new government's proposal to increase funding for education was designed solely to reduce property taxes. If you want to avoid another firestorm, I just do not want to attach myself to that conclusion. I would say, "Some groups suggest that it must be taken," because I tell you, you have enough problems on your hands.

Mr Stockwell: I would rather be more specific in what I am disagreeing. I think it is the Minister of Education and not everybody else. There is no disagreement among the people who came in and made their deputations to us. The only disagreement lay with the Minister of Education's interpretation.

The Chair: I do not know if we need to worry about who is agreeing with whom. We have the recommendations to make.

Mr Stockwell: It adds to your recommendation or gives you a certain degree of base to make the point that it is everyone disagreeing with one person rather than implying there is some kind of split. There is no split. Everyone sees it as 60% of operating, except the Minister of Education.

Mr Christopherson: That is not the issue.

Mr Stockwell: I think it is the issue. I think it is very important to point that out.

Mr Christopherson: No, no, it is the last sentence that is being focused on right now. All that is talking about is whether there will be a relative reduction in property tax. I think an important point has been made by Mr Phillips that we word it—how was it again?—"Some groups suggested," rather than saying, "However." I think, from where we sit, that makes a great deal of sense.

Having said that, if you now want to raise the other side, that is fine, but it is really not part of this sentence.

Mr Stockwell: I will raise it as a separate issue.

Mr Christopherson: Just to get this one done.

Mr Stockwell: But I would like to include it in that paragraph before we go into the explanation.

The Chair: Let's deal with the sentence and then deal with that. "The committee heard from groups that care must be taken..."

Mr Phillips: It was, "However, some groups suggest..."

Mr B. Ward: Yesterday, we as a committee gave directions to staff that when we rewrite this, they be more specific as to which group said what or which groups of organizations said what. I think this is another example, not all groups said this. Some did.

Ms Anderson: You say if three groups have said it, I pick one, then?

Mr B. Ward: Use your judgement.

The Chair: You could put in a bracket, the way I think the other was, OSSTF or whatever.

Mr B. Ward: I do not think that is really necessary. I think we clarified that yesterday and gave direction. I was using this as another example for the need for that action to be followed as we do our final draft.

The Chair: Shall we deal with Mr Stockwell's comments now?

Mr Stockwell: As I said, I do not think we should give the impression that there is a debate out there with sides lining up. There is one side, which is the Minister of Education, and the other side is everybody else.

Mr B. Ward: Not everybody.

Mr Stockwell: Well, everyone who came before this committee.

Mr Sutherland: Not on this specific issue. The "60% of what?" I believe came up when either Mrs Sullivan or Mr Phillips asked a question of some of the representatives: "Sixty per cent of what?" It is the same reference to the discrepancy Mr Phillips and Mrs Sullivan seem to have with the minister over whether, when the commitment was made in the campaign, it included pensions or not, capital and pensions. The "60% of what?" is not directly related to that, so it is not coming up in the same context of the disagreement they seem to be having with the minister. It is not every group against that.

The Chair: If I remember the response Mrs Boyd gave to Drummond White's question, it was that in fact it was very much her concern that the funding increases reflect a corresponding decrease in the burden on property taxes.

Mrs Sullivan: Did she say that?

The Chair: Yes, she said that. The gist of that conversation was that the province may give a great deal more money to education, the mill rate may go down in education, but it may be swallowed up with an increase in mill rate from municipal taxes so that the municipal taxpayer has a net zero improved position, and did not want to see it swallowed up. That, if I remember correctly, is the gist of that.

Mr Phillips: The minister said some things that are going to get you guys in a lot of trouble, but that is your problem. She said the 60% funding included pensions and capital, while the teachers the next day said, "You'd better clarify that or you've lost your credibility with us." The minister said there would be ceilings put on spending, and you saw the response of school boards. I do not remember the minister saying there must be a proportional decline in property tax. If she did, that also would be very interesting to the teachers of the province, because that will not be their interpretation of the election commitments.

I tend to agree with Mr Stockwell, actually. I do not think there was any confusion at all among the trustee groups or teacher groups about what is in and out of the 60%, because this is their rallying cry.

Mr Sutherland: I think the question is 60% of not what is included, but coming to a definition of what 100% is, even if you have certain elements in there.

Mr Stockwell: I think the point we are trying to make is that there is no discussion here, that there is not disagreement. There is a disagreement. What I am trying to point out to you is that we are giving the impression that there is a disagreement out there and there are so many people on this side and so many on that side. All I want to do is clarify that the ones who made deputations to us were very clear. They knew exactly what they were talking about. They were talking about 60% of operating, and the Minister of Education was disagreeing with everybody else. Rather than leaving it in there that there is some disagreement out there, there is not. There is the Minister of Education's version and everybody else's.

Mr Sutherland: But that in itself, until you agree upon a 100% figure, whether you include those things or not—

Mr Stockwell: Everyone is agreed on the 100% except the Minister of Education.

Mr Christopherson: But this language does not negate anything you are saying, it does not negate anything we are comfortable with. As a committee report on the issue, we agree with the researchers that this clearly reflects what is going on. Our suggestion would be that if you disagree with that to the point where there should be a delineation between who is disagreeing, then I think that could be done under observations, either the committee's or your own. But we are quite comfortable with this, and I think this is fair language.

Mr Stockwell: Could we not include, "A part of the argument lies in deciding '60% of what?' The Minister of Education's interpretation is..." and then "pensions and capital included, and everyone else's is..."

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mr Stockwell: No?

Mr Christopherson: I am just saying we are not comfortable with that. If you wish to go with that language in any dissenting position that is obviously your right, but we are not comfortable with it.

Mr Stockwell: You are suggesting that that in fact was not the case, or you just do not like the language?

Mr Christopherson: I said we are more comfortable with what is right here in front of us in draft form and are supportive of this.

Mr Stockwell: I understand that. I am asking you about what I suggested. Are you telling me that that in fact did not happen, that those were not the depositions we heard? I am very clear that that is what they told us, and I am trying to write a report that reflects—

Mr B. Ward: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: All discussion is supposed to go through the Chair, and it is obvious that we have a cross debate here.

Mr Stockwell: I am speaking through the Chair, Mr. Chairman.

Mr Christopherson: Clearly, the answer is that we are very comfortable with the language that is here.

The Chair: Could I just clarify what exactly Mrs Boyd said? It is right here. It says:

"Let me be very frank. You cannot, and that is why we are saying that under this particular funding system we cannot have the assurance that if we increase our funding that will necessarily mean that local boards drop their mill rate, nor can we be sure that if local boards were to drop their mill rate for the education portion of the taxes that the municipalities would not step in and take up the slack. That has happened in the past. This is a real issue around surety and certainty, around being sure that whatever moves we make will translate into property tax savings for home owners. Frankly, under the current system, the way it is, there is no way for the provincial Ministry of Education to ensure that this is going to happen. We can try to exert lots of public pressure and lots of moral suasion on local school boards around the way in which they raise taxes and hope that that rolls over into the municipal area, but quite frankly our experience in the past has been, and there was one particular point in time that a lot of school boards amalgamated...." So her comment there, I do know how you want to use that but that is exactly what said.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any other comments on page

Mr Stockwell: I do not get agreement on that, then

The Chair: I have not heard agreement.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you have that Hansard?

The Chair: That is just a rough draft; it is not a complete copy. Any other comments on page 9? Seeing no page 10. Are we happy with page 10?

Mr Phillips: I think one of the key observations many groups was a worry that the tax commission would be two or three years in reporting, and they were concerned at it being seen as something that delays some of the reforms they wanted. Certainly I found that within the educational community, saying they would not find it very comforting if that were used as a vehicle for holding back. So I would think one of the observations should be that somewhere, particularly under education, that in the meantime property tax needs relief. That is the idea I am trying to get at. Virtually all of the groups said, "We cannot wait for the Fair Tax Commission, or whatever it is going to be called, to report before we see some relief on our funding requirements."

I would think that a paragraph on page 10, before we get to "Committee's observations and recommendations" should be that while the Fair Tax Commission is seen as a useful vehicle for attacking the long-term problem in the next two to three years, the property taxpayer still needs relief from the educational burden. That was what I got out of them.

The Chair: I do not know how much of that was a clear position presented or whether it is more of an observation from a partisan point of view. There was a number of people who came forward, some of whom felt that many aspects of the Fair Tax Commission were legitimate in terms of the time that will be taken to look at things. Others felt that because of its priority, it should be set aside and some things addressed immediately, but to suggest that it was a clear position that property tax specifically was something that should be addressed immediately in terms of relief, personally I do not recall that.

Mr Phillips: Maybe we are going to have to go through all the briefs because that was clear signal I got from them, saying, "Listen, don't use the Fair Tax Commission as a delaying tactic for us."

The Chair: Yes, but there were also clearly positions taken by a number of groups that said they recognized the complexity of things. AMO came forward and said that in terms of property tax and municipal cost-sharing, it was interested in the relationship as much as anything else as put a figure merely of, I believe, an inflation rate to take them over. They called it a transition. We are in a transition time.

Mr Phillips: I am on "Education: Elementary and Secondary." I am thinking back to the school boards and the teachers' groups, and my clear recollection was, from their comments, "Be careful of delay on this important matter," using the Fair Tax Commission as something that will delay it.

The Chair: Have you any specific recommendations regarding and then we can debate that and decide whether it goes in or not?

Mr Phillips: I do not want to word-split the thing, but broad form is, at the bottom of that second paragraph, in the meantime there was general consensus from the groups that while the Fair Tax Commission's work goes on, the property tax will still need relief over the next 24 months."

Mr Christopherson: I do not know that there was general consensus. I am trying to be fair. I am just sensing a little bit of partisanship in terms of suggesting that it is going to be used as a delaying tactic. That is not our position at all. Obviously it is a question of things will move as quickly as they can, but some of the complexities involve time. Then, to go further, the Treasurer has said if there are recommendations that the commission is comfortable with making more quickly, before its final report, by all means, we would encourage that.

I am just not as comfortable that what you are suggesting is entirely non-partisan and merely reflective of what came forward. I think we would be prepared to look at anything the researchers wanted to bring forward, especially if it identified a particular group that wanted that, but I think, starting to get into general consensus and over-concerns about deliberate delaying, or delaying, I think it is a little problematic for us.

Mr Phillips: What I am saying is that the groups said they cannot wait for the Fair Tax Commission's report before they have relief.

The Chair: Can we leave it, then, that if the researchers can find a specific group that said that, it would be included at this point and attributed to it as its comment, and in the absence of not being able to find it, it not be included?

Mrs Sullivan: You might find it in the Ontario Public School Boards' Association presentation and in the AMO. It seems to me it was raised by both of those groups.

The Chair: Then if we can find that, is there a consensus that if the comments can be attributed to a specific group, it can be included?

Mr Christopherson: No. What I suggested was that we be prepared to look at anything the researchers would like to bring back and we would ask that if that is being done, having it attributed would help. We are not agreeing on anything ahead of time until we have something in front of us.

The Chair: Can we move along, then, and come back to that?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, during the draft.

Mr Elston: Just an observation: I used to do a fair bit of this work. I have not done very much committee work recently, as you might have expected. When Mr Christopherson indicated that when there was sort of a negative implication from some testimony from some of the groups, at least felt to have been expressed by Mr Phillips, that to have it included in this report somehow made it a partisan-type of an application, that is not the way this place used to work.

If there is bad stuff to be said in a report, it should be said, because it really then encapsulates what people have come forward in public to say. Just because we asked to have some material placed in the report does not make it partisan, but it does make it complete. I am not here to help sanitize the report or anything, if that is what you are suggesting. I do not know that you were, but it is a bit of a dangerous type of a statement. Just because somebody said negative things, and you have to go through negative things in government, you cannot remove them all from the report. I just wanted to remind people—

Mr Christopherson: No, that is fine. I would be prepared to stand by exactly what was said in the Hansard, but if my memory serves me right, part of the language used was that there was a general consensus and then incorporated in that thought was that they did not want the tax commission to be used as a delaying tactic. I think what I was trying to say was, without identifying a specific group and exactly what it said, my concern was with generalized comments like a general consensus and then pointing to possibly using the commission as a delaying tactic or as a delay. I had some problem with that just going in as language we would draft. I think I did say that if something comes back and shows who it was attributed to, then by all means, let us take a look at it.

I would also point out that there have been other clauses, I think, already in the report that we have approved and supported that are less than supportive of positions we have taken or will take. I appreciate your concerns and I think we are being consistent with the objective desires of the committee.

The Chair: Can we leave it at that then, that we will see the researchers bring it back? Next is "Colleges and Universities."

Mr Sutherland: There seemed to be a lack of reference to OSAP and I thought there were some mentions of OSAP and maybe some changes to that by some of the presentations. I was just wondering if we could have some reference to that added.

Mr Christopherson: That is actually page 11.

Mrs Sullivan: I concur with that. I am concerned about the use of the 10% figure in the bottom paragraph of the colleges section. In the Trump written brief and in questioning, what they said was that they need a 12% funding increase to finance the enrolment increase. They have used 10% to say that only a 10% increase could accommodate an enrolment carryover from the previous year. They are anticipating that enrolment will be added to by another 3% and they are asking for the additional 3%.

What they say is, "After a careful review of the present situation, it is our considered judgement that only a 12% funding increase will permit us to adequately finance the enrolment increase (3%) within the system and to handle a modest growth projected for fall 1991 first-year registrations and also handle employment and pay equity initiatives."

I think the wording should change to indicate the 12%. This is technically correct; in other words, they are saying they cannot accept a 3% increase that they know is coming, but they are saying to accommodate that increase they need 12%.

The Chair: Do we have any problems with that? Can we accept that?

Mr Christopherson: Was it just the percentage change then? Is that the only change?

The Chair: I think you wanted a rewording of the whole next sentence.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, I would reword the last sentence.

Mr Christopherson: Could we have a look at proposed wording from the researchers?

The Chair: Could you read what you are suggesting? That comes straight from Chris Trump.

Mrs Sullivan: I am not suggesting the words, but you could say, "The committee heard that"

The Chair: Could we add whom we heard that from?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, "from the Association of Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology that a 12% funding increase will be required to adequately finance enrolment increase within the system," and you could go directly to the text on that point, but rather than use the 10% figure, which is not what they were arguing for, they were arguing for a 12% increase.

Mr Christopherson: If it is attributed and the 12% is the figure that they use in the report, we do not have a problem with it.

The Chair: That was page 11. Are we happy with page 10, the bottom part of page 10 on "Colleges and Universities"? Now, are we happy with page 11?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. It is just that again, with the referencing in the second paragraph, we would like to see if we could reference to the student groups and OCUFA in that paragraph, specifically where they are in agreement. Correct?

The Chair: Yes. Their numbers were pretty close to being the same.

Mr Christopherson: We would just like to see that in there.

Mr B. Ward: I think if you look at the second paragraph on page 12, I am not quite sure and I doubt if anyone else in this committee is quite sure which groups made these observations or statements in their delegations to this committee, so I think that should be as an example, with the research staff identifying which groups of the business sector made these comments or suggestions.

I can recall asking the auto parts manufacturers whether they would be willing to work in co-operation with labour in developing a sectoral agreement on skills development. I think that perhaps could be mentioned, if not in that second paragraph then in the last paragraph, which more or less addresses the need for skills training our province. I think the researcher will take note of that is a fair observation.

Mr Christopherson: Perhaps we can finish the discussion on what is already here and then I have a couple paragraphs to suggest for inclusion.

The Chair: I do not know how we want to deal with this, but Mr Elston did raise the point that this would read as, "Ontario in the past has been an attractive location." Is that okay the way it sits from the point of view of the kind of message we want to send if somebody in New York reads it?

Mr B. Ward: Perhaps that comment or observation was made by a group, but we should be identifying which group because if you look at that paragraph in particular "in the past," and then it refers almost that under the Liberal government in fact our competitiveness has been eroded because of whatever reason. I do not entirely agree with that and I do not think the Liberals would either.

I think we should be looking at who made these statements. I think it was our job to sit and listen and then make recommendations based on what we heard. Whether we agree unanimously or not is another story. But as long as the research and the development of this section can identify which sectors of business or labour made the statements, that would make it a lot easier for anyone who is trying to read this report and follow the recommendations that will come forth.

The Chair: I think Mr Sterling would be very interested in the comment, "Recent tax changes in Ontario and neighbouring jurisdictions have reduced Ontario's advantages." I would think he would want to see that, see the numbers on that to see if that is an accurate statement to be made. I am just throwing that out as something to comment on.

Mrs Sullivan: I think there is a perception in the business community that came before the committee that tax changes are the significant factor in competitive comparisons. The sense of discussions as they were going through was that in fact there are other measures that have to be included in those comparisons, including things like cost of fringe benefits and so on and health care costs.

I concur; I do not like the wording in this area. I would take out the words "in the past" just to start out in the paragraph, but there certainly is a question about the tax advantages in Ontario now when taken alone without some of the other aspects included. What the writers may want to do is to say that presenters have noticed that tax changes which have occurred—first of all, put it in other jurisdictions in addition to Ontario; that changes the emphasis may have reduced Ontario's advantages. But I think we should isolate the tax increases alone, but also talk about fringe benefits, you leave tax changes in Ontario then that is not quite what we should be looking at, or maybe somehow the committee ought to be including that there are other things as well to talk about on Ontario's competitive position.

Some presenters, including the auto parts sector, indicated it was not only the tax and the fringe, it was cost ductivity that was reducing our competitive nature. I do not like limiting it just to tax changes or to taxation.

10

The Chair: If I remember correctly, they also commented, though, that there were positive advantages. When Mr Phillips talked about the cost of the medical plans in the United States as compared to Ontario—

Mrs Sullivan: That is exactly the point I am making.

The Chair: —there was a huge advantage for southern Ontario as opposed to the neighbouring state. With the concurrence of the committee and Mrs Sullivan, is that anything else that maybe we should include there?

Mrs Sullivan: That is the precise point I am making. The tax changes I do not think were accepted in our questioning as the only thing that reduced competitive advantages. Just take out the sentence maybe.

Mr Elston: If I could interrupt for a second, why would you just not reconstruct this to indicate that Ontario's continuing competitive position in the North American economy will be dependent upon taxation measures, competition from other jurisdictions in North America, both from a social and wage point of view, and the continuing need for provision of skilled labour? Why can we not make that paragraph say that? That would wrap up everybody's concerns about taxes, jobs and competition from other jurisdictions.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, that is good.

Mr Elston: That does not say we have lost anything, does not say we have gained anything, but that those are my-item suggestions.

Mr Stockwell: I certainly do not want to send any messages to people in New York who would apparently have concerns about some wording that we are using, but I think we have to be careful not to create a marketing puff piece here. Yes, there are very good points to what Mr Elston has said, but what did the people say when they came in? They said that Ontario in the past has been an attractive location; we are losing our competitive edge due to a series of things, but number one on the hit parade was taxes. Practically all of them talked about it and the cost.

I agree with what the committee is suggesting, but I think we have to be careful we are not putting together a marketing puff piece here. The facts are I think written quite well: "Ontario in the past has been an attractive location in which business can invest due to factors such as its location" etc., "but recent tax changes in Ontario and neighbouring jurisdictions reduced Ontario's advantages." I think that is very clear. That is what they said.

Although in our conclusions we can draw some other points into the debate that maybe were not brought forward, these are the things that people brought to this committee. I think we should be sure that we outline those. Otherwise, why do we not just go away and write a nice little fluff piece?

Mr B. Ward: Let me make a suggestion to speed things along because I do not think we are going to be able to reach consensus as a committee on how this paragraph should look. I would suggest that in particular that sentence dealing with the auto sector, which really talks about skills, should be included in the bottom paragraph rather than in the section about taxation. If they could rewrite that paragraph, taking into consideration the comments that were made, I think we will not have any concerns as a committee, provided that the research in the draft of the paragraph includes which group said what, so that it is not really a committee statement but it is what we have heard, and relates what we have heard to the groups that made these comments. I think if they do that it could address everyone's concerns in such a manner that we could reach a consensus on how this particular section should read in our final report.

Mr Elston: Not to deal with what Mr Ward has just indicated, I want to join issue with Mr Stockwell. If Mr Stockwell wishes to leave this thing about Ontario in the past having been an attractive location, I think it ought to be clear that it is still an attractive location even today. There may be some erosion of competitive advantage, and if that is the case, I think we ought to include a couple of clauses in this particular paragraph which underline or underscore the federal government's determination to erode the auto pact and the negotiations through free trade, which have placed us in a very, very bad position in the North American economy.

If he prefers to leave this at the basis of taxation, that would likewise be writing a bit of a fluff piece and in fact be perhaps some kind of a daisy in his hairpiece, but it would not be a particularly good piece of information to lead the people of Ontario to believe we did not understand the consequences of that particular assault on Ontario and Canadian integrity.

Mr Stockwell: I do not want to get into a long debate.

Mrs Sullivan: But I will.

Mr Stockwell: But I will. If someone had come in and said that, then I think that should be in the text. If we are discussing that and that is the issue and those issues were brought forward by one or two or three people, then it should be there. I am not here to pick and choose what I want to put in here. Frankly, I did not hear it, but if in fact you can find somewhere where somebody said exactly what Mr Elston has just told us, then fine, include it.

All I am saying is, people said this, groups said this. They came forward and mentioned these things. If you want to dig through and try to find exactly what Mr Elston said, be my guest, but do not put it in there just because you feel threatened by what people have said. As you said, we are not here to change the facts. We are not here to not put things in that are not acceptable by our standards. We are here to report on what the deputants put to us. If you find something that people said, then throw it in, but I know for a fact that people said this paragraph.

The Chair: I would like to say that yes, we are here to report on what the deputations said to us, but I think we are also here, as we have already done this morning, to include, where possible, information that perhaps was not given to us here. That is what we have done with Statistics Canada.

Mr Stockwell: Is that not under "observations and recommendations"?

Mr B. Ward: Mr Chairman, again just to speed things along, I think we concur with all the comments that have been made. We do not want to fabricate any of the information that we receive, but as long as we identify which groups made the statements, the comments that would be included in this report on this specific issue of taxation, I do not think we would have any concerns.

The problem with the wording is that we really do not know who said it. If you read it in its present context, it appears the committee is making the statements and that is something we want to avoid, because we want to include what groups have told us. If the research can take us back and identify which groups made the statements and include as much as possible on the issue of taxation, because it is a very important component of our province, if those circumstances are taken into account, everyone on the committee can agree with what the research comes back with and then we can move on.

The Chair: Okay, so here are the instructions that I understand from the committee, to take out that section on the auto sector, put it in the last paragraph, find the specific groups who made those comments and include it in that paragraph; or failing to find those groups who specifically said that, to reword this paragraph to reflect what Mrs Sullivan, Mr Elston and you have said with respect to the continuing state of the Ontario competitiveness.

Mr Phillips: I am just going by memory on what I heard about the challenges economically, this is pure memory, but number one was the high Canadian dollar; number two was the high interest rates; number three, to me, was just a more general environmental concern about debt or deficits. Taxes, I honest to gosh cannot remember. I honestly do not remember. I am trying to cast my mind to that even being in the top four or five. Can anybody? I cannot remember.

Mr Hansen: I think it was the health tax. That was the only one I heard as a tax. It came out because I think it was the parts manufacturers had come to the point where they would like to put a ceiling on a wage of $30,000 because in the auto industry—I think I asked the question—their concern was that there is a lot of overtime when they are rolling, so that increased their cost when they are very busy. If people make over $30,000, they are still paying a health tax. They felt it should be capped at $30,000.

Mrs Sullivan: I think the concerns that were raised included a number of areas. They included tax harmonization on the GST, a tax issue but not taxes. They included, particularly in the auto sector, low-wage-rate states. The corporate income tax was raised as a concern but as only one. The regulatory environment was raised on several occasions. Pay equity and occupational health and safety were raised by several people. Then the needs that were raised included research and development, skilled workers and so on. It seemed to me that taxes were not the overriding issue that was raised as people brought forward concerns about keeping Ontario in a competitive environment.

There was considerable discussion, for instance, about the cost of health care with some of the business groups, a comparative factor against their American counterparts. I vividly recall, partly because of being involved in some of the questions, the discussions relating to the cost of health care being about 2% or less than 2% and the American cost being well over 8%. Those are factual things that I think the research people can find.

The Chair: Let me have this correct. You would like to see that reflected in this paragraph?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. I would like to see a more encompassing list of pressures. There is clear concern about the continuing competitiveness of the Ontario economy. I would like to see a more delineated list of those, and I would like to see just emphasis on the corporate income tax.

Mr B. Ward: Identify which groups made the statements wherever possible.

The Chair: Can we leave that with the researchers to do now? Is there any clarification? Can we move along from this page or is there more?

Mr Christopherson: Once we have finished with what was here, we have two paragraphs we would like to suggest for inclusion. I will read it for the record, and if there is no problem then the researchers can incorporate it. If not, then I will maybe just give it to the researchers. If any event and have it included for proposal that way. I will read it, Mr Chair. It is brief. It would constitute paragraphs 2 and 3 on page 12, so it would push everything down a bit that many.

First: "The Ontario Federation of Labour, OFL, has given the committee an indication of the structural dimensions of the recession. The recession which is currently under way in Ontario has a much more significant structural component than did the previous recession of 1981-82. The layoff indicator points to a much higher proportion of job losses attributable to permanent and complete plant closures. The OFL believes that addressing the restructuring problem in this province will require the establishment of active labour market adjustment programs."

Second: "In the longer term, the OFL has impressed upon the committee the need for the government to direct its attention to reducing the vulnerability of the Ontario economy to the recession. The increased reliance on credit by both families and businesses often leads to a significant slowdown as an erosion of confidence is followed by a reduction of debt. In addition, the Swedish model of reserve funds is suggested by the OFL as an important countercyclical device, as it allows companies to set aside funds for an approved countercyclical purpose without incurring a tax liability."

Mr Stockwell: Do you agree with that?

Mr Christopherson: You will know when we talk about our positions and recommendations. All we are doing is suggesting that this reflects what they said, and we would like to see it incorporated in the body.

Mr Stockwell: A reserve account with no tax liability?

Mr Elston: Rather than debating America, which you can do later if you wish, it would be unusual, would it not us to excerpt the position of a particular presenter and include it in the body of the report, which is really what you have done with those two paragraphs, without doing equal time to other presenters?

Mr Christopherson: No. By way of background and being totally frank, what we saw in the last paragraph of this section, which appears on page 13, talked about the CFL, the Canadian Federation of Labour, and its proposal in rather clear detail. We did not want to leave the impression that it was the only position brought forward by labour, since we all paid careful attention to Mr Wilson's presentation. In fact, there was a rather lively debate as I recall on the first day, and this is our suggestion as to how the OFL's comments be reflected in the report. That is what it is meant to be, and we are certainly open to comments on that.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Chairman, I just counted up, and I have forgotten the total, but it seemed to me that there were 79 or 80 groups and organizations that have sent materials in to us. In many cases, the OFL conclusions were in concurrence with those that were presented by other economic groups and so on and by business in terms of the need for changes in approaches for skills management. There was nothing that was out of the ordinary in terms of the rest of this document, and to devote two entire paragraphs of the document to the views of one organization and individual who came before us, it seems to me, is out of the question.

Mr Jamison: The heading of this section is "Business and Labour," and I think we have a fairly good cross-section. The OFL is the representative of the vast majority of organized workers in this province.

Mrs Sullivan: Which is 20% of the workforce.

Mr Jamison: If we are going to pay credence to the CFL, which some people would confuse in an abbreviated form as being another organization, I would suggest that the main organization be considered in the point of view, specifically under the heading that we are using here, "Business and Labour." I think it is very unfortunate not to give the Ontario Federation of Labour's point of view a lineated within this section, and I see no problem with that whatsoever.

Mr Christopherson: I think Mr Jamison has very clearly outlined exactly the way we feel about it. It is a business and labour section. All through this, there are business and bankers and economists. This is the one area where labour has an opportunity, and so far there is only one paragraph, a good paragraph that should be there, that is about the proposal of the CFL. All we were suggesting is that the OFL presents the other half, if you will, or the other part of the labour perspective, and this is the one place where it has a chance to appear. So in total you have two paragraphs dedicated to labour's position, and I do not think that is an unreasonable position for this committee to take vis-à-vis the entire report.

Mr Phillips: Later on we will look at the wording, because I suspect we are going to have more areas where we may not be able to reach total agreement before we are finished with this.

The Chair: Okay. I thought we would go in at page 13. Are we satisfied with the section on "Business and Labour" with the instructions to the researchers to write back and come back with it? Can we move along now to "Agriculture?"

Mr Christopherson: Just a second. There may be something on that page to revisit; we can do it on a revision, though. That is fine.

The Chair: Is there any problem with "Agriculture?"

Mr Sutherland: Yes. Specifically in the last paragraph on that page where it says, "high interest rates, debt burdens, volatile commodity prices," I would like to change the word "volatile" to "low." I think they have stagnated for quite a while rather than fluctuated.

The Chair: Is there any problem with changing it to "low"? Fine.

Mr Christopherson: Also, the clause second from the bottom, the clause that begins, after comma, "the system of supply management which has an impact on the ability of the industry to meet changing consumer demand." Again, it is not attributed and would appear to be a position of this committee, and we are not entirely comfortable with that and would like either it to be attributed or have it withdrawn.

Mr Elston: But it is true, is it not?

Mr Sutherland: It is what?

Mr Elston: I am saying maybe it is true. Supply management, I mean, that is what it is designed to do, to deal with consumer demand for product. I do not understand what is so sensitive about it. I am not exactly sure.

Mr Sutherland: The implication there implies that there is no adaptability within the supply management system and I think there is some adaptability of the commodity groups and the producers who are involved with supply management to make adaptation to differing consumer demands.

Mr Stockwell: No, it is not saying that at all. What it is suggesting is that supply management has an impact on the ability for change. I do not think anyone would argue that. Even you would agree that supply management has an impact on the ability for change.

Mr Sutherland: Even though the word "strong" is not there, the implication is that you are saying it has a strong impact.

Mr Stockwell: No, it does not say "strong;" it says "impact."

Mr Sutherland: I realize that, but I think it is automatically implied when you are using the word "impact" here that it would be a strong impact and I tend to disagree on that.

Mr Elston: Perhaps, Mr Chairman, if we could just kind of give it a clearer, more positive context, would that assist Mr Sutherland and everybody else?

Mr Sutherland: If that can be done, yes.

Mr Elston: Supply management is designed in fact to work towards what the needs of the consuming public are supposed to be and it is supposed to be mobile enough to meet changing requests and things. If it does not quite say that or if it does not mean that, perhaps it can be made a little more clear.

Mr Sutherland: If it can be clarified, anyway, to reflect that, that would be super.

The Chair: If I read this correctly, the problem is not in the comment so much as in the context in which it is located.

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

The Chair: There seem to be negatives all around it, which would imply negativity to that. If I read you correctly, you see supply management as a positive and would like to see it somewhere else in a positive context. Is that correct?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, that would certainly help the situation. If we can get some clarification back at some point from the research staff on that, that would be great.

The Chair: Is that okay?

Ms Anderson: I am sorry, I am not quite clear.

The Chair: We want to put a positive spin to it.

Ms Anderson: You want to move it somewhere else?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Rampersad: It is to be moved or do we change the wording?

The Chair: Change the wording or move it.

Mr Elston: The whole paragraph, if I understand Mr Sutherland's problem, the whole context of that paragraph is, "The farm sector is in difficulty for a variety of reasons," including the supply management issue, which is why it reads that way to Kimble and I do not disagree with his assumption that we should not be perhaps quite so negative in this report.

Mr B. Ward: Mr Chairman, I concur with Mr Elston in the sense that if you read the whole paragraph, all those components—in fact, in the last sentence there is, all these components "have hindered the ability of the industry to adjust to increasingly difficult economic circumstances." I really do not think supply management should be reflected in that matter, and should in fact be pulled out of there and perhaps slotted in somewhere else or clarified so that there is understanding from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. It is my understanding that it is in favour of the supply management concept and that the report should reflect that support as far as the OFA is concerned.

The Chair: Okay. Page 14. Are there any comments on page 14?

Mr Sutherland: Yes. Actually midway down, again dealing with the issue of supply management, it indicates, "The sectors of the industry under the supply management system are likely to experience the greatest difficulty." I am not sure—if my memory is correct, and we only, I believe, had the OFA in from that area—whether it had indicated that or not. I was just wondering if we could find out. If they indicated that, fair enough. Otherwise, I think it is another statement that we should be conscious about, because my understanding is that when you look in comparison, supply management areas are better off than the areas that are not under supply management.

Mr B. Ward: A question, Mr Chairman. I cannot call the entire brief of the OFA, but did it not touch subsidies by foreign governments to its sectors as part of the reason? I cannot recall if that was included or not. In fact it was included in the brief, that should be touched as well.

Mr Jamison: The presenter also talked about how United States representatives were able to cloud their subsidies a little better than we are able to through our supply management system and subsidies and so forth and expressed that it was a concern. Their concern was clearly revolving around GATT and the international scene. Rather than those subsidies being looked at, the United States, for example, was finding ingenious ways of having subsidies come to their farmers. That really presents a problem, even in the context of realizing what is and what is not a subsidy between the two. That in itself was a major concern about the competitiveness between the two countries, and of course on top of that there was the GATT situation, where you have two major agricultural powers pretty well doing economic battle with one another over that very issue. Those issues, I think, should be well defined, because over and above what we do as far as our own management, they weigh very heavily on the final outcome as to whether or not our agricultural sector really becomes healthier than it is today.

The Chair: If I read you, are you asking for an expanded section here to take into consideration those comments?

Mr Elston: Why do you not just put a short word? You can put a paragraph on GATT and you could put a paragraph on free trade, if you want, but why not include the foreign subsidy problem under that paragraph that was just removed, the supply management?

Mr Jamison: This struggle going on concerning GATT between the United States and the European Community is one that has direct spinoffs, again related to the free trade issue and agriculture and what kind of product is coming in and really undervaluing or undercutting our own farm-gate price. There is a relationship there to what is happening, and I think if we are going to do justice to this section, we should really describe that in a very understandable way. It is nice to make the statements, but I think the OFA was very concerned about that particular issue and the long-term effects specifically on agriculture, and would just like it better defined.

The Chair: Are those instructions to the researchers sufficient to go back and to broaden this area a little bit to take into concern the GATT, the foreign subsidies and the subsidies war and all that sort of stuff that is going on?

Mr Hansen: I think the other area we are talking about, the system of supply management, we cannot help in Canada crank down when we have already gone ahead and when we do have an overabundance, let's say, in the United States or other countries. They wind up shipping ere a month or two earlier or a week or two earlier, and this is what has caused the low commodity prices. When our product does come on line, this is what has affected it. We are running the right system of supply management here, but the foreign countries are actually interfering in our supply management. Is that not what you are saying, Mr Elston? It is something that has to be shown.

Mr Elston: It has to be at least delineated. It depends on how long you want the report to be, how far you want to explain subsidies. I will tell you, once you start dangling little bits and pieces about subsidies, you start having people shoot little arrows at you, because you have not fully explained that in Europe it is this way and in the United States it is that way. It is better to highlight it as a difficulty, unless you want to prepare a separate paper on it some other time. Anne's job of explaining the subsidy issue succinctly and clearly in one paragraph is going to be difficult, because it cannot be done.

Mr Jamison: It is very important to show a connection, I think, between the various issues out there that we are dealing with on an international basis and also their connection to other things that have happened, concerning free trade for example. When you have a GATT situation and a GATT war going on in agriculture and then you have a free trade agreement, you have a nightmarish kind of situation there and I think that should be described.

Mr Sutherland: Provided it is referenced in the report. The issue of defining subsidies is really what needs to be in there. Somehow that has got to be—

Mr Elston: That is creating turmoil.

Mr Sutherland: That is an issue. Yes, creating turmoil, and defining it from different countries.

The Chair: Okay. Page 14.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to move to the last paragraph here I think there are some difficulties, on the bottom of page 14 and the beginning of page 15. First of all, the farm credit policy ought not to be similar to the Ontario family farm interest rate reduction program, OFFIRR. In fact, what they are looking for is something that is similar to Saskatchewan and Alberta initiatives. As well, the recommendation was for additional initiatives with the federal government on the Farm Credit Corp. So that definitely is to be changed; that is an inaccuracy. The other words that have to be changed there are "financial assistance," because the credit program is not necessarily a financial assistance; it can be planning, etc.

I am not certain that we had any indication, because the Minister of Agriculture and Food was not here, that the government might implement a stopgap program similar to OFFIRR. That was certainly a recommendation of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture though, so I think that sentence should be changed. In the third sentence, at the same time, what we should say is not "federal support" but "triticite stabilization programs such as GRIP and NISA will provide medium- and longer-term assistance."

Mr B. Ward: Are you suggesting that the first sentence on page 15 be removed?

Mrs Sullivan: We had no information before the committee relating to that, and I would think that what should be included is that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has recommended a program similar to OFFIRR for a one-year period and in fact they wanted particular targeting of that program.

Mr B. Ward: Then you are suggesting that be modified as well?

Mrs Sullivan: It has to be, yes. It is inaccurate the way it is here.

Mr Rampersad: The Minister of Agriculture and Food made a statement. He was quoted in the Windsor Star a few days ago as saying that the government is likely to implement a short one-year program similar to OFFIRR.

Mr B. Ward: But we never heard that.

Mr Elston: I do not think it really matters. If he said that and was quoted in the Windsor paper, make a note of it and throw it in.

The Chair: Just footnote it.

Mr Elston: If he has already said it, are we going to quibble over that?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, but I think we have to underline that the recommendation was there for that kind of a program from the OFA. That was certainly a major part of their recommendations to us.

Mr Elston: You can put, "and by newspaper reports, it appears the minister will recommend that," or something.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, I think that would be fine.

The Chair: Just footnote it. The thing is footnote, right? Footnote your sources.

Mr Rampersad: If you want footnotes, we can give you about 100 pages. I can give you footnotes on every statement.

The Chair: Are we comfortable with those two paragraphs now? Are we comfortable with the second paragraph on page 15? Are we happy? Can we move on to "Social Issues"?

Mr Elston: I wonder, just before we do move, because the food processing industry itself is critical to the other half of that—I mean you can provide a lot of support for the first part of our presentation, but without the second part you certainly erode the need for the farming community here. The processors move to the US and access product from there. I wonder if we maybe should not do something to underscore the negative effect that it has on a number of communities when these operations actually cease.

Somehow my concern in my 10 years here has been that the trend has been to kind of shove agriculture off to one corner, isolate it and say, "Ain't it too bad, but it really doesn't affect us that much," without understanding the effect that there is from a social point of view on whole communities, for instance, in Essex-Kent, and even in the peninsula, of course, Simcoe county.

For me it needs to be fleshed out a wee bit that there is a significant community problem associated with the loss of this industry. It is not like you just are not producing ketchup in Leamington any more. There is more to it. I wish that we could integrate agriculture back into the mainstream of consideration, if I could. We did some stuff and worked on it, but it is difficult because it is easy to push it off when people do not think about stuff—

The Chair: Out of sight, out of mind.

Mr Elston: —like that being part of a production facility with real men and women working the lines.

The Chair: Yes. One of the problems that we are actually facing here is that we did not have any food processors to give us a presentation.

Mr Elston: Nobody came to talk to us. Can we then just make an observation that they were not represented?

The Chair: That is what my suggestion was going to be.

Mr Elston: Okay, that is fine. I am sorry.

The Chair: But we should make a comment that we are sorry that we did not have this information available.

Mr Elston: I do not want to attribute blame for anybody not appearing, but perhaps we should have expressed the wish that we had been able to more fully examine the implications of a downturn in food processing in Ontario. I just think it is too important to skip by.

The Chair: I think there is probably general concurrence on that.

Mr Jamison: I think it is a major consideration. We may not have had any presenters on that, but I do not think there is anyone in this room who does not realize that the processing industry itself is in serious decline in Ontario. Restructuring again, all the issues that we talked and talked about prior to and the effect on rural communities and as far as employment is concerned, is dramatic. I would like to make specific reference to that part of the industry, being directly related to agriculture, and how it affects the ability of the farmer or the grower to really market his product. Maybe it will grow just as well, but if the processor is not there, it is kind of a fruitless effort.

Mr Hansen: One thing is that it is lowering farm income even to farmers who are winding up—let's say, growing peaches. There is not that canning crop left because that was always extra money that they got depending on the price of peaches, or let's say apples, or whatever the case may be. It has limited farm income quite a bit on the second-grade canning level, so it has been very costly in our area.

Mr Elston: Perhaps, Mr Chairman, if we need some quotable quotes, I am prepared to become a witness and put in front of the committee a few lines if you want us to include quotable quotes.

The Chair: Maybe the committee could handle it this way, we could put in this paragraph indicating that there is evidence that there is restructuring in the food processing and a great deal of concern in that this is one of the issues that we did not have enough representation on.

Mr Elston: You might still refer it to the attention of the Treasurer. Maybe in one of our recommendations or observations we could do that. Maybe I am skipping ahead of myself, but at least as long as we note it so that we not look like we totally neglected that side of it.

The Chair: We might be able to get a consensus or recommendation in that area.

Mr Christopherson: That is in line with what Mr Phillips mentioned before regarding public transit, where there was very little mention of, pulp and paper, mining environment and police. He suggested and we support the idea that we might find a means of incorporating that into the report so that it was not left out, even though we did not get a substantial amount of presentations on that. I think this is just akin with that and is an excellent idea that does not distort our findings and our recommendations to the Treasurer.

The Chair: If I read you correctly then—you can correct me if I am wrong—what you are saying is that we should indicate to the Treasurer that we did not get deputations in this area, but these are still important areas to be considered. "Social Issues."

Mr Christopherson: Before we start on "Social Issues," could I suggest that we look at breaking because that is going to take a fair while, I suspect, and it is a few minutes before the lunch hour.

The Chair: I am putty in your hands, if it is the will of the committee.

Mr Christopherson: Let me push my luck then and confirm that it is 2 o'clock that we are returning, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Yes, it is. I would like to nail down the break time for this afternoon at this point as well. What would be the break time? From 2 to 4, or 3:45?

Mr Christopherson: I think what we may want to do is leave it flexible only to the extent that we do have a limitation. We have Thursday and it all has to be done by then. If we get bogged down this afternoon and lose two hours, we may regret having set a time. I do not mind setting a target, but I would not want to set the adjournment time now. We may need it. We may want it this afternoon. It is either that or the possibility of starting who knows when Thursday morning or staying till who knows when Wednesday night, which would probably louse up agendas much more than staying until 5 or so tonight, so we had to.

Mrs Sullivan: Will we have proposals from you on your recommendations? Did you not say you were going to bring some?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, we have some. If we go through the report and we are prepared to start to look at some, yes, we are in that position. If you are in a position to respond to some of them, then we can focus on those. We are going to caucus again.

The Chair: I declare this meeting adjourned until 2 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1154.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1407 in committee room 2.

The Chair: I guess we are ready to begin the afternoon session. We are on page 15, looking at "Income Adequacy" under "Social Issues."

Mr Christopherson: I have a couple of points. This is another area where we would ask the researchers if they could contribute some of the comments, again for clarity's sake. I will leave that as an overall request for this section and for the balance, quite frankly.

I would also mention to our colleagues from the other two parties that in line with Mr Phillips's suggestion of "Other Matters," we would like to also suggest that we have a subheading under "Social Issues" of "Poverty" and another one under "The Disabled Community." Further—I do not think this will come under "Social Issues," although maybe—another heading we would like to have considered "Native Issues," in light of the submission received and the importance of it in today's context.

Those are our comments vis-à-vis "Social Issues," the rest part.

Ms Anderson: May I ask how you would see the "Poverty" section differing from "Income Adequacy"?

Mr Phillips: That is a good question.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, it is a really good question. It is an issue that sort of came up, and I think we now know which side was right in the internal discussion. I will not to gloat.

Mr Elston: You should not have to try too hard.

Mr Christopherson: Maybe a title change, and if there are any other aspects of the submissions that could be put in. Obviously, without being overly technical, we could like to beef that up a little if we could.

Mr Elston: More tactics?

Mr Christopherson: What did you have for lunch, Murray? Where have you been? You come back after lunch and you are all wound up. You are very troublesome and mischief-making.

The Chair: Murray went down and spent some time with the people in the tents.

Mr Phillips: The last sentence on page 15, "A whole package of welfare reforms, including" etc—I wonder if there is not a better way of saying that. It seemed to me that there was a consistency in the groups that suggested the continuation of the implementation of the Social Assistance Review Committee report. Somebody from outside adding this would wonder if this is not kind of a whole new idea suddenly coming at us, while it seemed to me that almost all three parties were of a mind on SARC. That is a theme I got out of the various groups that came before us, that they were suggesting we continue with the implementation of SARC.

I wonder if saying that is not a better way than that sentence, "A whole package of welfare reforms," just nothing along the lines that there seemed to be a consistency in the presentations recommending the continuation of the implementation of the SARC report.

Mr Stockwell: We are firmly behind you on that.

Mr Elston: Yes, quite a long way behind us.

The Chair: It is going to be a long afternoon.

Mr Stockwell: Why do we not just kick Murray out right now?

Mr Elston: I was told the morning session was much too staid and too formal. I just wanted to add a little life to it.

The Chair: What you are trying to do is get more oxygen to the brain cells, is that it?

Do we have any questions or comments on Mr Phillips's recommendation that this section be rewritten to reflect more of what the groups were saying about SARC?

Mr Phillips: Just the final sentence. It kind of looks as if there was a smorgasbord of ideas coming at us, with no consistency, whereas I felt there was a consistency, which said there had been a big study done on reform of the social programs in Ontario, called the SARC report, and there seemed to be consensus around the continuation of the implementation of it, I thought.

Mr Christopherson: We would not have a problem with taking a look at a redraft on that.

Mrs Sullivan: In the same paragraph: I think the implication in this paragraph is that people who have inadequate income to meet requirements of living are all unemployed, and there was some consistency in documentation that came before us about the working poor and people who have reached a point, either through the supports to employment program or going back to work, where other tangible needs have to be addressed, including child care, part of which is covered, but also including a continuation of some social assistance benefits.

I do not think that is reflected in here at all. It came in a number of the presentations before us. Perhaps the research people and the drafters could just shape it to indicate that the poverty issue is not one that is only for the unemployed.

The Chair: That we are talking about the working poor as well.

Ms M. Ward: Some of those concerns you are mentioning, are they not addressed in the first paragraph on page 16?

Mrs Sullivan: I do not think adequately.

The Chair: That one representation really went through a whole lot of things that presented roadblocks of a systemic nature as opposed to a straight welfare payment nature, and those systemic things could be included. Is that what you are asking for?

Mrs Sullivan: Plus the dollars as well. It follows right along in terms of social assistance. But some of the other issues I think were a very clear part. There was one that was a particularly dramatic presentation, but it was included in several presentations.

The Chair: We have the recommendation to have a couple of the headings changed and that section broadened to reflect those comments you just made. Are there any other changes to that section on "Social Issues"? Can we go on to "Housing," then?

Mr Elston: I just want to make another observation about the construction of the report, if I may, before we go any further. It has nothing to do with the things you did not hear or the things you did hear, but just a juxtaposition of the "Agriculture" section prior to this, as though it were more business as usual prior to getting into the real social issues of the time, if you know what I mean. There are social assets to this agricultural thing, where you can see the demise of a whole community lifestyle or series of communities in our province. I do not like the idea of saying this is a social issue, income adequacy for people in a different part of the province, while the rest of this is somehow business as usual.

Perhaps there was not an idea that you wanted to segregate this into an agricultural-business type of stuff, and then "Income Adequacy" or "Poverty," which are more seen to be items of an urban nature, but which, from my point of view, afflict rural Ontario as deeply or probably even more so as we go through more restructuring.

I find it difficult to isolate the agriculture question from the "Social Issues" section, if you know what I mean. You have a few paragraphs here and there are some more things to be brought forward, I understand that. But it is a whole social calamity that we are about to deal with in the agricultural sector. I do not know how you fix it, but I think it has to be remarked upon so that people do not believe there is not some sort of social element we are going to be wrestling with over the next few years.

The Chair: Can I maybe offer a suggestion here? Under the table of contents, agriculture does have its own heading. When we get the sections back on agriculture, if they do not deal adequately with the point of view that you are expressing, then maybe we could look at it at that time and beef it up.

I sense that there is a great deal of sympathy cross-party here for what you are saying.

Mr Jamison: Just a clarification: My understanding of what you are saying, Murray, is that because farm incomes have dropped so much, there is usually a secondary income on a great number of farms, and with the recession that income disappears and the impact or the poverty that exists at that point is to try to keep that viable.

Mr Elston: Mine is a more basic concern even than that, because when you deal with agriculture in Ontario, there is not only a financial or fiscal framework, which is what we talked about, basically, in this prior section, but there is a whole cultural and then social side about which we say nothing. What we have basically said is, "Okay, the agricultural thing is all fiscal," or at least it could be read this way, that it is all fiscal, and then we go on to what we determine to be "Social Issues."

There is nothing more social-issue oriented than the demise of several small communities all around rural Ontario. The dislocation and family problems that develop as a result of that certainly are as big a concern from a social-issue standpoint as from the fiscal, which we really isolated ourselves on during this report.

It is an old bias that I have had for some time. I just not like the idea of thinking that we can deal with agriculture by throwing a few more dollars after a farm support program, and not deal with a whole series of other social issues which are equally affecting rural and urban Ontario. It is a much broader one than you were identifying.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, I think you were correct when you acknowledged that there was a fair bit of cross-party support. Earlier, Mr Elston referred to the fact that agriculture historically has not been considered part of the manufacturing system, that it has always been something separate, and now raises the issue of social services not tying into it and the cultural aspect of agriculture, and I think there is a fair bit of agreement on our side with that.

You have said that in the redrafting of "Agriculture," it is not there—and I suspect if we do not give direction it will not be. I would suggest that we are very supportive of asking the researchers to include those, for lack of a better term, linking sentences, linking paragraphs that will at least acknowledge that we see those connections and we would like to see those connections worked on and some attention paid to them.

Mr Elston: Perhaps in the preamble or introduction we could acknowledge that while there are various sections that isolate particular topics of interest, we recognize crossover features, and perhaps highlight agriculture as one where, although we may focus on fiscal matters or financial matters, there are cultural and social problems to a pretty great degree which must be met relatively quickly if we are going to sustain several of our communities. I guess we around here represent a good number of those small communities.

Mr Christopherson: Without getting into timetable at this stage, because that may indeed be part of observations and recommendations and some departure points for us, I think we can agree on the importance of it and the linkages. The researchers should feel comfortable that we are asking that those concepts be incorporated into the draft.

The Chair: We can come back and deal with this more when we have the next draft of this.

"Housing." Is everybody okay?

"Immigrants."

Mr Christopherson: We are fine on all of page 17.

Mr Stockwell: I have a question on paragraph 2, page 17, on the immigrants. Are we trying to relate the group that came in, are we going to put in brackets or whatever which group said this, attribute certain sections in here? I was curious which agencies came forward that said it was "a cost-effective way of integrating immigrants into the community," and finally, "the funds available from the federal and provincial governments have been insufficient." I would just like to see who made those deputations, because I think we are taking it here as a fact. I am not saying it is not a fact, but I do not know it to be a fact or not to be a fact.

The Chair: "Women's Interval and Transition Houses."

Mrs Sullivan: The second last line: After "provide" I would put "increased." I would also add "second-stage housing."

The Chair: So you want to have "to provide increased services to abused women and their children." And you would also like an additional comment here about second-stage housing.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: Second-stage housing goes here?

The Chair: Right after that.

Mrs Sullivan: At the end, as one of the—

Mr Christopherson: "Additional staffing, pay equity and second-stage housing"?

Mrs Sullivan: Fine.

Mr Christopherson: We are okay on that.

The Chair: "Health."

Mr Christopherson: We are comfortable with what is here. We would like to see some additions. What we would like to do is offer to the researchers some direction.

The first one is on emphasis, a paragraph or two on the importance of the management of the health care system vis-à-vis the costs, the dollars, that this is something that needs to be focused on.

Second, we would like to see also an expansion on the community care issue. There is some here. We would like to see more, if we could, taken from the submissions that were made, with a particular look at the question of the analysis of costs. We did not look at the research material, but we suspect an acknowledgement that there still needs to be further analysis of what those costs are. Are the cost savings as great as some people think? Is it going to be revenue neutral? Will it cost more? Where are we in that termination, and should this apply to all sectors? Is it automatic that community care is the best way to go in all cases? Just something on that. Then lastly—

The Chair: Just a minute. Are you asking there for maybe whatever information is available on specific sector analysis? Just what exactly are you looking for there?

Mr Jamison: We are not looking at the picture overall, as far as communities are concerned. We are looking at the effectiveness of what services would be more cost-effective at the community level, more available, the availability of those kinds of things. We are just saying a closer scrutiny. The whole theme is how we can better administer the health care system in the province and better—maybe not administer, but fund and really track the funding. As far as community-based services are concerned, are we asking about the overall availability of service? Should we break those down and see which would be more effectively community based?

Ms M. Ward: I just wanted to add that our reason for the request was the sentence there, "Community-based care might lead to reduced costs over the medium term." The medium term is something that is not very self-explanatory, and also the word "might" leaves some questions and we would like any explanations or further detail that we could get about that.

Mr Christopherson: There may indeed be a need, objectively speaking, for a reference to the fact that those potential cost savings have not been determined. If you recall, I asked those questions of at least one of the delegations and it does seem as if it is unclear. Originally there were great savings in community care. Then there was the suggestion it was fairly even, and now there is some suggestion it may cost more. All we are looking for is, in the submissions, was there a clear position, or should we be saying that has not yet been determined and perhaps that is something that needs to be identified?

Mr Stockwell: I do not think there are any savings at all, and even leading them down the garden path that there might be savings is misleading. I would just as soon just strike it.

Mr Christopherson: But that is the difference. There are those groups that still maintain that there are significant savings to be made. This is where Mr Jamison is saying in certain areas there may be greater savings than others in terms of institutional care and other health care that can be provided at the community level. We are just saying it has not yet been determined.

Mr Stockwell: It sounds like an observation or a conclusion, recommendation.

The Chair: We are just a little out of order here.

Mr Stockwell: Sorry.

The Chair: Mrs Sullivan was next.

Mrs Sullivan: I had a couple of comments, one of them relating to the three areas on management vis-à-vis costs. Mr Christopherson has asked for an additional paragraph relating to that. It seems to me that there are a number of management questions that come up, including capping services and so on, that I would not want to see included in an introductory paragraph. If his party wants to bring forward recommendations relating to management, then so be it.

Similarly, if you go back through the whole move from deinstitutionalization, a major rationale for that move was not cost-saving, nor has it been anticipated that there would be a lesser portion of the provincial budget dedicated to health care. It was the delivery that was being changed. If you want to ask, for instance, for a cost analysis of a change in approach, that should be your recommendation, unless I am hearing you totally incorrectly.

Mr Christopherson: Let me respond in the hope of clarifying, and I remain open to comments back, of course. We are looking at this in the same vein that your colleague Mr Elston suggested, that if something really was said and it is relevant, then we ought to say it in here. We are not trying to make an observation or a recommendation from something that was not there, or if we are, we will state that very clearly. We are asking the researchers only to look where management of the system was referenced. To our recollection—and again, we did not go through the submissions—I acknowledge that in our discussions. We are asking the researchers if they would do that for us and where there was reference made—and we believe there was—then we would like to see something on that.

The other thing with the example of deinstitutionalization, first of all, I do not know that I agree with what was said, because I know a fair bit about that issue. But second, we are not looking again to have any kind of work done in terms of direction. We will make those recommendations in the appropriate place. But what we do want is the basis in this report. We see it as a big issue and all we want to do is ask at this stage that anything that was said about that issue be reflected in the report and attributed.

Mr Phillips: On community-based care, if I am not mistaken, it is kind of the cornerstone of the health direction that the new government wants to take. I think that Operation Critical—I think that was the big health report—called for the doubling of community-based spending by the new government. So as I say, I think that is the direction it is heading. I am not sure what wording we are looking at here, but I think the future is being based on that.

My question was back in the top paragraph. I would like the researchers just to check the numbers on the per cent on hospitals and others. I believe the number that I am familiar with is that the hospitals are 46% of the health budget and I would just like to make sure those numbers are correct.

The Chair: Do you have any source of those numbers?

Mr Phillips: The ministry's estimates are one source and the minister's annual report is the other; just different numbers than I recall.

The Chair: While they are looking for that, are there any other questions or suggestions for the health section?

Mr Christopherson: There is one more from our position. We would like to see an expansion on the presentation that the nurses made and would just leave the request at that and ask the researchers perhaps to do a paragraph on that presentation. That is page 18 for us.

The Chair: Are there any other considerations or things that we should be considering putting into this part of the brief? If I do not see any hands, then I assume that we can now give direction to the—

Mr Sutherland: Sorry. Just on that, we are making reference at the beginning of this report about the issues that Mr Phillips brought up and the ones that Mr Christopherson added. Even though we did not receive presentations, there is something to the effect that they are still relevant and important and need to be addressed. Or are we just coming through with specific recommendations on those areas later? Was that the direction you were looking at?

The Chair: You are looking for an indication in some preamble, are you not, about mining, natural resources, policing?

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Ms Anderson: Do you want to have that in an introduction to the whole report?

Mr Sutherland: If it is referenced to the fact that the committee felt that there were issues, even though they were not addressed.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Again, we would remain open to hear how big a problem that is for you. We agree with the suggestion by Mr Phillips that some of the things should be included. In fact, we added a couple of our own. My colleague Mr Sutherland is suggesting that perhaps we may be able to show that in the report through a separate section acknowledging areas where we may not have had a lot of submissions, indeed maybe none, but we think there ought to be at least a reference to those things in this report. It just ties in with what Mr Phillips and the caucus felt was important.

Mr Stockwell: What do you want them to write?

Mr Christopherson: That is why I couched it by saying I know it could be problematic for the researchers.

Mr Sutherland: I think if you go back and look at some of the past reports—in fact, I thought I had seen in a couple of the ones from either two years ago—they referenced them and just make note of—

Ms Anderson: Sometimes they have had a paragraph or two, just a heading called “Pre-budget Consultation Process,” and the committee has talked about it is sorry it has not heard from certain sectors and it is sorry it has not heard from people outside Toronto and things like that. That is just a whole separate section, a sort of preamble at the beginning of the whole report.

Mr Christopherson: If you could give us your best shot as to how that might be covered and we will take a look at how far that goes to meeting the needs that have been expressed by both parties.

Mr Phillips: Just a couple of other things. One is that there were a number of information requests through the process that we had. I can recall asking the Treasury people the very first day for some information around the implications of borrowing and what kind of premium we would pay as a result of no longer borrowing from the teachers' pension. They indicated that they would get back to us. I think my colleague Mrs Sullivan also had a number of requests as well and I am wondering when we are expecting those answers.

The Chair: I had not heard back. I will have Mr Decker run that down.

Mr Phillips: I guess the other observation I would make is the challenge we are going to have. I think we have a lot of the prognosis on the spending side here, but one of our challenges is just the revenue side. I know the Treasurer says that it is too unpredictable to predict, but I think that is going to be a challenge for us as we work our way through this thing here. I am not sure how we work our way out of it, but I think it is going to be challenging to give the advice he is looking for, because I think virtually all of these things are on the expenditure side and very few of them are on the revenue side. I just make that observation. I do not know how the final report will look, but this is to be in.

Mr Christopherson: If I could just follow up on that, Mr Chair, I am curious and I ask in total innocence—I know that you do not buy that, Murray—how normally is that sort of thing reflected in a report like this? That is why you make recommendations saying that the government should do this or it is requested to do that. Understanding that the final decisions are left in the hands of the cabinet on the budget, how normally would revenue issues be in a report like this? Are one of the two opposition parties proposing new taxes to generate revenue?

Mr Phillips: No, but your Treasurer has given us the economic forecast. He has in place all of his taxes. I guess we had half-expected him to say, "If the economy unfolds as we estimate it will and there are no new taxes, this is what we will have to work with on the revenue side," because he is asking for advice on the expenditure side from people who are giving us advice in a series of specific areas. But I am quite disappointed that we do not have some feeling of what we are looking at on the revenue side.

Mr Christopherson: If I might, I do not think anybody needs a crystal ball to confirm the fact that we are looking at a deficit in fiscal 1991-92, so the real question for us is, how much of a deficit are we looking at? What priorities are such that we feel they should be given consideration, not regardless of the deficit but in spite of the fact that there is a deficit? Or as in the case of Mr Stockwell, are there going to be recommendations in perhaps the opposite direction, that you should not make any expenditures when there is going to be a deficit?

Mr Phillips: But the crystal ball on the deficit has to be revenue minus expenditures. Presumably the only way you know the deficit is by subtracting one from the other. You are very close to the Treasurer, you talk to him on an hourly basis. What revenue might he be looking at?

Mr Stockwell: I agree with Mr Phillips. I think it is a joke to try to go through this, make a sandwich with one piece of bread. There is no question, if you are going to do a serious review of the budget, if you are going to prepare a budget and you are going to analyse recommendations, it is absolutely absurd to suggest you can do it without the revenue projections. Now, I know you are the open and accessible and free-thinking group that you thought you were when you got elected, but even those backroom Liberals last term, last year, supplied this committee with preliminary revenue projections. They did it. I cannot understand why—

Interjection.

Mr Stockwell: Just look for them. I found them.

I cannot understand why you cannot give us preliminary projections. Mr Chairman, I suggest we send a strongly worded message to the Treasurer saying:

"I know you have them. You are telling us you are going to have a bigger deficit next year than the year before. You must have some kind of revenue projections to say just that. If you want some serious recommendations that can be made to the Treasurer in the sense of working together, you have to give us some kind of idea what the revenues are going to be."

We are going to go through this whole charade, and no one will know what to recommend because we do not know how big the deficit will be. We do not know what your projections for revenue will be. We do not know where we can see growth and where we are not going to see growth, and we will sit around here navel-gazing.

I would prefer right now that this committee go on record unanimously requesting the Treasurer to supply this committee with what I consider to be a very reasonable request, preliminary revenue projections. The Liberals did it. The open, accessible, upfront and frontier-thinking NDP, I am certain, can do the same as the Liberals did last time.

Mr Jamison: That is an awkward thing to do, basically on this basis, that the Treasurer told us, informed us of a windfall of some $900 and some odd million that came back from the federal government that really he had no ability to account. That is a substantial amount of money. I do not believe he can do that within the accuracy Mr Stockwell is talking about.

Mr Elston: Along that line the whole point of budgeting is that they do that. In fact they not only do that once a year in preparation for a budget, but they do that on a monthly basis so that they can figure out whether or not their revenues are living up to what the projections are. In fact the whole process starts—at least, it did when we were over there—by about August or September when the preliminary estimates are made for the whole year on the basis of revenues and the strength or weakness of the economy.

Treasury has a whole unit that does nothing but, or at least has a number of people who do nothing but speculate on the future earning ability of the revenue sources for the Treasurer. That likewise is done through the people at the Ministry of Revenue who are charged with keeping the Treasury people informed so that they can make in-year course adjustments if that is necessary. So even though there is this $900 million that comes up because of some kind of reconciliation of personal income tax accounts and other things from the federal authorities, that should not stop us from asking for those revenue sources.

I might also indicate, by the way, that I would like to express some concern, because what we are seeing this year is similar to what we saw at one point when Larry Grossman was Treasurer. We have had floated out in the public now, at least from two sources that I have seen, the incredible numbers of $6 billion—I had heard originally—to $9 billion in deficit. I see in the Globe and Mail this morning that the number has shrunk from $6 billion to $8 billion in terms of deficit, with the idea being that the bad, bad tough message is going out there, "Ain't it going to be just awful," and then some smaller number may arrive as the deficit figure.

I believe that at this stage in our fiscal year, and in preparation for the budget which will be brought in, I guess, in May or April, Floyd has already, with his colleagues at Treasury, recommended to the Premier, and in fact the policy and priorities board of cabinet or whatever it is called now has already determined, what the target deficit number will be. Unless you start with that target number, then you cannot possibly start to clarify where you are going to move with all of the other decisions around which we are being asked to make recommendations.

Even as we sit here, Floyd Laughren and the Treasury department have already told the Premier, his advisers and the policy and priorities group in cabinet, exactly what their best guess is with respect to revenue and what their best guess is in terms of consumption of dollars on the expenditure side.

For us to ask for a little bit of guidance—we are not asking to the last penny—if he cannot provide us with some kind of guidance, he is not telling us everything they are doing. So I think we should be able to have some of that. I like the idea that this be shared with us to help us, because to be quite honest this whole process is not going to be very helpful if we try to go in and say, “There are a lot areas you should address,” and then he says, “By the way, we’ve decided to balance the budget this year, so we’re going to actually cut back expenditures.”

I cannot imagine him doing that, but it is a scenario that is possible. Until we know, how do we know what our recommendations ought to be so that we do not look like a bunch of goofballs?

Mr Christopherson: I do not think there is any guarantee that we will not look like a bunch of goofballs. I do not think anybody can provide that guarantee. But let me say this, we are now two days from completion of this committee’s work. The Treasurer was just here, as Mr Jamison has said, less than four working days ago and all of these questions were put to him by, I guess it would have been your predecessor on the committee last week, Mr Stockwell. Mr Sterling and everybody had their run at the Treasurer in terms of asking him for information and hearing his answers, not us carrying his message. You heard at first hand his answers to those questions and to those requests. You got the answers. They are there in Hansard to be seen, and obviously we are not going to be comfortable at this stage of the game with suddenly sending off a message from this committee demanding this, that or the other thing when indeed he was just here to answer those questions.

I think it is a bit of a red herring to raise at this point. The time to do it was when the Treasurer was here. We said very little. If you check Hansard, you will see that we did not take up a lot of the time. We made sure that the opposition members had 95% of the time available for access to the Treasurer. You asked your questions. You got the answers as best you are going to get from him. Whether that is satisfactory or complete or not is up to you, but you got his answers. I think that has answered those questions for the deliberations of this committee, for the duration of this committee sitting. We are not prepared, obviously, to play any kind of games at all, at all, at all.

Mr Elston: I am sorry; I was not playing games. I just told you about the process.

The Chair: Let him finish. Then we have three other people.

Mr Christopherson: We are not prepared to play a kind of games at all about sending letters to the Treasurer demanding, when indeed he has just been here. If he had not been here or had refused or if this was while he was still sitting there, actions taking place—now a number of working days have gone by and it has not been raised, and I have some real concerns about the legitimacy of the sincerity in asking these kinds of questions and making these kinds of requests.

Mr Phillips: There is actually nothing new.

Mr Stockwell: On a point of order, Mr Chair: There are questions of the speaker or do you go to the next speaker under this process?

The Chair: We go to the next speaker.

Mr Stockwell: Okay.

Mr Phillips: Do you want to ask the speaker a question?

Mr Stockwell: Yes, I did, but it is okay. Go ahead.

Mr Phillips: I think we have been trying from the outset to find some revenue estimates. I think you all know about the $2.5-billion deficit. I have predicted from the outset that revenues would be higher. The federal government publishes its numbers all the time. It is no secret that they already have their third-quarter numbers out. It is not a windfall. It is, in my opinion, a predictable number. I said that three months ago and indeed it has come true.

All I am saying is that in the end it is going to be difficult for us. I think, by your own admission, you said “It doesn’t take a crystal ball to know there is a deficit.” The only way you can get to a deficit, I repeat, is you subtract the revenue from the expenditures. We are going to be talking about expenditures as—that is not a bad expression; I may use it—one slice of the sandwich. That is all I am saying. It is going to be difficult for us. I realize the Treasurer is saying he does not want to give us the numbers, although I agree with my colleague that every single ministry already is working on next year’s budget. There is zero question about that. They have been given their direction and there has been a target expenditure estimate set.

We will proceed with this. We have no authority to demand the revenue numbers, or at least, we will not get the revenue numbers. It just makes it difficult. I do not imagine you at the Hamilton city council or regional council ever went through an exercise without having some idea of what your revenue is going to be.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly I am very familiar with the process relating to budget determinations and concur with my colleague that in fact those decisions have been made. The Treasurer indicated that he was not going to share them with us. They certainly would have been discussed around the table with Treasury officials and targets would have been set. We have had some indication, through announcements, of what the pressures on the expenditure side of the budget will be, and without an indication of what the range of targets is, in the absence of specific decisions that the Treasurer will have to hold unto himself until the final week or whenever the budget deadline is—ally the week prior is when the final locked-in decision made—there are targets.

We would like to know what the Treasurer's targets are and how he sees the elements changing. The previous Treasurer shared that information with the committee and indicated that within a targeted area, the target over a period of time was to reduce the budget to a balanced situation, and he did so and he indicated that he wanted to operate in the 1990 budget end at a balanced situation, even no changes in economic scenarios.

If, for example, the Treasurer is looking to increase a budget deficit and sees a validity in making changes that increase the budget deficit for the next year within a targeted framework, then it is valid that we can look at one of the recommendations that have been brought before us and say, "Indeed, within the context of recovery and deflation, these are recommendations that make sense for the Treasurer to include in that budget." We do not have to follow the Treasurer's plans. This is an independent committee, but within that budget-setting scenario it is useful for us and in fact important to us to at least have a framework on which his decisions are going to be made.

I speak in support. We have certainly had indications in announcements of pressures on the expenditure side. The pressures on the revenue side are very important to us. This committee is going to have any sense of validity.

The Chair: I just interject at this point. I have been informed that in fact what you are asking for is for the 1991-92 budget year. Is that correct, that you want those figures?

Mrs Sullivan: That is why we are sitting here.

The Chair: And that in fact those numbers have not been given to previous finance committees.

Mrs Sullivan: At least the targeted range was, at least in the direction of the budget was.

Mr Stockwell: Who told you that, Mr Chairman? Last time the Liberals provided the range, the parameters they were going to use.

Interjection: Where is that? Could I just have where that was referenced in the report?

Mr Stockwell: I have got it downstairs. I am not sure where the book—I picked it out and there it was; those numbers were in there.

The Chair: I will pursue this from the point of view of finding out exactly the correct interpretation of this information and will report back to you at the next meeting tomorrow morning. Did you want to make a comment?

Mr Stockwell: I have one last comment. I take great exception to the comments made by a government member with respect to the legitimacy of the request. I think there is great legitimacy to the request. I think, if you are going to look at a budget, you need both sides of the equation, and for you to sit there and suggest that this is politically motivated by some stretch, that we are in fact going to embarrass the government or, I do not know, that the beans on the budget, is absolutely insane and I take great exception to that comment.

You are the open and accessible government. You are the people who were going to give us all this openness and fair play. It is clear the only time it is open is if you are a member of the NDP. To suggest for a moment that requesting—get this, requesting—revenue projection parameters, guidelines, is in fact going to, as your Treasurer sat there and suggested, outline the 1991-92 fiscal budget, is a joke, an absolute joke.

For us to sit here going through this charade—what do we have here? We have got throne speech 2. We are talking about whether partnership should go before answers. That is how in-depth we are getting into this budget discussion. I take exception to your comment that there is no legitimacy to it and it is politically motivated. Baloney. You sat on Hamilton council. Tell me one budget you ever did where you did not have revenue projections when you set your budget. Don't be so stupid.

Mr B. Ward: Mr Chairman, he should withdraw those last two words.

The Chair: The last part of your comment, sir, is not appropriate language.

Mr Stockwell: "Don't be so stupid?"

The Chair: Yes, it is not appropriate language.

Mr Stockwell: I am not implying that he is stupid. I withdraw that. But it certainly riles me when he is suggesting that there is no legitimacy to our request. That is unreasonable.

The Chair: I am going to exercise my powers of the Chair. We can rattle around this debate for the rest of the day and, if that is what the committee wishes to do, that is fine. I will bend to the wishes of the committee. However, I would suggest that at this time we have exactly two days and somewhat to consider our recommendations and I think we can do some good work between now and then, in the absence of these numbers which we may or may not get and which I would suggest at this time it is highly unlikely that we will get. I would like to proceed with the next part of this process and get on with the recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: At the risk of being overruled by you, and I stand by any ruling you make, I think I am entitled to at least state for clarification purposes that it is not the issue I am talking about, but the timing of it. These positions and arguments were put forward prior to the Treasurer's coming before the committee. That was the purpose in his coming before the committee. Those questions were put before him. That was last Wednesday at noon. This is now 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the following Tuesday. To suddenly raise this as a crisis issue, that we cannot continue without this information now, is why I am suggesting, in my opinion, that it is political in nature and not as legitimate as it is being put forward to be, not as if it was put at the time that the Treasurer was here. That is for the clarification.

Mr Stockwell: You are assuming the answers the Treasurer gave us are legitimate answers.

The Chair: I would like that to be the last word, Mr Stockwell, please. I would like to move along because we have a lot of work to do yet and I am sure there is lots of time. Are we all ready to do some more work now? Okay, let us move to the next section, and that is to start considering the recommendations that will go into the report.

Mr Elston: I would just like to draw your attention, before you get on with the recommendations, Mr Chairman, that we did not go back to page 2 and some of the other pages that we were to have reports back from the NDP caucus on some of the variations to be considered. I think there were some lines on page 2, for instance, that I remember and a couple of others on those first three pages that you were going to chat about, I think.

The Chair: We have a revised version of the draft. Is it the wish of the committee to have it circulated now?

Ms Anderson: The first section.

Mr Elston: But does that also include the things that you were going to talk about?

Mr Christopherson: No.

Mr Elston: So we might as well hear what you have decided about some of those options.

Mr Christopherson: I can have those for tomorrow. I do not have them for this afternoon.

Mr Elston: Okay, fine.

The Chair: Where do we begin in this part of the process? I need some direction here.

Mr Stockwell: The government is going to supply us with its recommendations, I think, at this point.

The Chair: If I remember correctly, we were all going to supply each other with all of our recommendations at this point. I think that would be useful in terms of being able to move through it quickly in terms of finding out where the consensus are. Who is going to go first?

Mr Phillips: I think our understanding was the government would lay out its recommendations.

Mr Stockwell: That is what I thought.

Mr Phillips: In the final analysis, if I add the numbers up, we might as well start with where we are going to end.

Mr Stockwell: You could even read into their recommendations too, probably, some of the revenue projections and maybe adjust ours.

Mr Christopherson: Please do that, Chris. I want you to stay up all night calculating that for me, please. We would appreciate that.

Mr Stockwell: Honestly, I thought the government was going to supply them first.

Mr Christopherson: Again, not having gone through this or anything like it here, since all of us are new, and if the other parties are not comfortable with this process, we are prepared to entertain another way of doing it. What we thought we would do this afternoon is present some of the recommendations that we feel were probably the least contentious, that had the best possibility for support.

We, like you I am sure, have looked at previous reports and liked the areas where unanimity was shown and thought that that really carried some weight. We had hoped to find as much of that kind of ground as possible, so suggestion today was to run through a number of the issues, not in any particular order, mind you, because the report had not yet been finalized in terms of the headings and where the groupings might fall and we ran into a problem. If you just want to take a patchwork of recommendations that we think everybody is comfortable with, we think that might be a good way to start.

Mr Phillips: What about the title?

Mr Christopherson: "NDP Caucus Recommendations." Do you like that?

Interjections.

Mr Christopherson: Either not enough oil or not much, eh? All right. Again, I do not have a lot of rhyme or reason to them at this point, so here goes. As you can see, I am trying to couch this 16 ways from Sunday. "To enable disabled people to speak on their own behalf, enhanced funding should be provided to advocacy and self-help groups."

Mrs Sullivan: Is this in isolation or is it going to be with other recommendations? I do not think we can go that far with that sort of a sentence that sits there.

The Chair: It should go where it says "Committee Observations." Do we have any idea where we—

Mr Christopherson: Not at this point because I have not explained there is such a lack of preparedness just in terms of getting the process right. Our preference was to couch it and say, "Okay, at the end of this section where we have our observations and recommendations, here is what we are going to get as a package." Unfortunately, because the final draft is not done and we were all suggesting new headings, we do not know exactly where it would break down. So the best we have for you is just what I started to do: a whole host of recommendations. We have quite a number of them and they are like that. They kind of stand alone. They are not attached anywhere.

Mr Elston: So basically what you are going to do is—

Mr Christopherson: I mean, we can hold off—

Mr Elston: —if you wanted, you could actually go through this paper and just signify for our purposes whether your caucus had sort of provided your own endorsement and then we could think about the construction of the report tomorrow when we get our next draft. If you just want to enumerate them that way, that is fine, but otherwise the sections of recommendations and observations may not be too cogent, and it is very difficult to construct a report around those things if you are just going to sort of list them, well—

The Chair: There is a possibility, it appears, that if the committee was to go through these, the researchers can take them and plug them in where they—

Interjection: Well, I do not know about that.

The Chair: For example, I was just informed that on page 16 is where the report talks about handicapped, physically disabled, and you put in the committee's observations and recommendations.

Mr Elston: This is sort of bingo-card report-writing

Mr Christopherson: I think you will appreciate now why I was less than confident when I began reading them to you. I am really not comfortable. I would prefer, and I think we would, giving you a package in each—

Mr Elston: They are all leaving you, David.

Mr Christopherson: I think we would be more comfortable coming back to you and giving it to you in those package forms. We do not have it right now. We have done a number of the pieces but we are not ready to do that.

The Chair: Am I hearing that we should adjourn until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, at which point you will come back with the package?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. The only thing is, again, I do not tell you that we are going to be completely done, because we have not seen the draft yet. We do not know how many headings there are and where they will fit.

Ms Anderson: The headings will be the same as the ones that are in the table of contents, plus the disabled community and native affairs.

Mr Christopherson: I do not want to make a commitment we cannot keep. Tomorrow afternoon?

The Chair: I think we should start in the morning.

Interjection: I do not think we will be in a position tomorrow morning.

Mr Christopherson: I am prepared to say at this point we should have at least a quarter of the recommendations to go through tomorrow morning, given that we have a few days to do this in.

Mr Elston: Mr Chair, just to help out here, we do not want to make anybody think we are going to hold you to giving the whole package available for tomorrow. I think we should meet tomorrow even if it is just brief. If we find out that we cannot do it, we should come back here, take a look at the new draft and the material. You can give us what you have been able to put together and we can deal with that, and as soon as we cannot do anything more, we will take a break and work at it some more. We are not asking you to come up and do the impossible; just best efforts is fine.

Mr Christopherson: Nuts and bolts and honesty. We are not scheduled to meet again till tomorrow at noon, so in terms of taking the next step beyond what I have here—

The Chair: No. I would suggest then that this is found time, that you go do it now. If we are adjourning now, then this is found time. I suggest you go do it now.

Mr Christopherson: We have only got an hour, because we have got people who have a 4 o'clock commitment. The toughest thing has been finding time to caucus on these things, not that you need to hear our woes.

The Chair: Join the club.

Mr B. Ward: We will break and tomorrow morning we will do the best we can, right?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. How is that? We will come back and we will give you the best shot we have got.

Mr Phillips: I was hoping for a little more, but I guess that is all we have got.

Mr Christopherson: As we tell everybody else, do not judge us on what happens in the first six months; judge us at the end of the four years.

Mrs Sullivan: Six months? It feels like six years.

The Chair: I can assure you that is the way we felt about your first six months as well. Okay, tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock return.

The committee adjourned at 1509.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 6 February 1991

The committee met at 1012 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair: We are ready to begin the morning session. With reference to the inquiries about revenue projections for the coming year, the revenue projections that were available to the committee last year were found in what was called the grey book. They speculated on what revenue would be for this year as well. When I requested similar information from the Treasurer, he indicated that the grey book was not published; because of the expense, he decided not to publish it. However, I then pursued it and asked if there were numbers forthcoming on revenue projections and he indicated that is what they are currently working on and that they would attempt to try and put something together for us.

Mr Elston: That is also a big story. I know exactly what the process is in constructing a budget. I have been through several of them, and as much as some people here would like to say we maybe did not do as good a job as we could, I know damned well that those numbers are much better by this time of the year than what he has just told us. That is just one big pack of—

The Chair: You cannot use that word.

Mr Elston: —bumf. It is not true; it is just not true.

The Chair: I think that according to the—

Mr Elston: If he had said to you, "I don't want the committee to have them because I just don't want to release them," he would be accurate and he would not be dragging you out to dry, saying that story to us, but when he says you that, that they are just working on them, that is—

The Chair: I will tend to believe the Treasurer, given what is in our standing orders—

Mr Elston: You can believe him, but I will tell you, I am through five of those things and if he has not got a whole pile of those estimates, starting at least as early as August and coming forward and being refined—

The Chair: We do have the third-quarter figures.

Mrs Sullivan: We are talking about estimates for the next year.

Mr Elston: No, this is production of a budget for the next fiscal year. It is absolutely offensive.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chairman, we got into this discussion yesterday about the request. The request has been forwarded. We have a response from the Treasurer.

Mr Elston: The response is a lie.

The Chair: Excuse me.

Mr Elston: That is the problem. If he had said, "I'm going to share them," he would be accurate.

The Chair: Mr Elston, that is unacceptable language.

Mr Elston: It is not unacceptable. It is true.

The Chair: It is unacceptable language within the rules of parliamentary procedure to use that kind of language.

Mr Elston: Listen, I will withdraw the word, but I will tell you, he has given you a string of stuff that is not true.

Mr Sutherland: Excuse me, Mr Chairman, did I not have the floor here?

Mr Elston: He asked me to withdraw. I am withdrawing and I am explaining the fact that you guys have been fed a bunch of crap to come and put on the public record here that just is not true. It is offensive. He should have said, "I don't want you guys to know," and then he would be accurate.

The Chair: The assumption made in parliamentary procedure is that what we are told is the—under the rules that has to be accepted.

Mr Elston: Listen, you guys are living two different lives, because I will tell you, we were faced on a daily basis in the Legislative Assembly with your leader calling Peterson a liar, with Floyd calling the Treasurer a liar and you went along with it.

The Chair: I find that—

Mr Elston: You got away with it and you do not like it when you guys have these stories now being brought back to tell you what in fact is taking place. Listen, it is not going to make a difference to our report because we cannot get the information, but it is not because it is not available. It is because he does not want to give it to us and I wish he would just say that. I am sorry; I will not say anything more.

Mr Sutherland: I was just going to say that I believe the members of the Liberal Party have stated their opinion on the issue and could we please move on to some of the business that we need to deal with.

The Chair: I would concur with that.

Mr Sterling: Mr Chairman, on your report from the Treasurer, I would like to ask a question. What is the expense that he is talking about here?

The Chair: Will you show me that book?

Mr Sterling: Is it printing that book you are talking about that is an excessive expense?

The Chair: Let me give you exactly what he indicated to me. It was that the amount of distribution the book achieved did not warrant the expense. It was a very, very limited distribution to a very few people who showed an interest in it and therefore they decided they would not publish it this year in order to—

Mr Sterling: Yesterday I sat in a committee. I went to the standing committee on the Legislative Assembly because I am interested in the freedom of information issue. The New Democratic Party, over the last 10 years, has said that people should not have to pay for the production of information, that there should not be any fee associated with that. How does he match up what the New Democratic Party has said over the past 10 years on the production of information for the general public, not a legislative committee, not a committee that is charged with trying to give him advice on the budget? How does he match up the production when he can photocopy the information for us?

The Chair: I think your question to me on that issue is irrelevant. If you have a question, I think you should direct the question—

Mr Sterling: His answer is a joke. I agree with the member, Mr Elston. We are supposed to take the Treasurer's word, but when it stretches his credibility to the extent where he says he cannot produce a 60-page report because it is too expensive, that is a joke.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Sterling, as Chairman of the committee I am merely relating the information to you that I received. If you have problems with the information, then I suggest you put it in writing to the Treasurer, who is more apt to give you the answers you are looking for.

Mr Elston: Ask him if it is too expensive for him to write back.

The Chair: To direct the comments to me that you are directing, I think they are out of order and I am going to rule them out of order and I am going to proceed with the hearings for this morning.

Mr Sterling: Why is it out of order?

The Chair: Because I have no place to answer the questions or to make comments on the comments that you are making, because I am not—

Mr Stockwell: It just makes you uninformed.

Mr Sterling: It is not out of order. We are in here to discuss the budget.

The Chair: Then I suggest we move along to that.

Mr Sterling: Are we not open to debate? Are things not open to debate?

The Chair: This is not a debate.

Mr Sterling: What are we doing here?

The Chair: This is not a debate on the pre-budget consultations.

Mr Stockwell: I think I was next, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: I hope you will refer your comments to the budget because we would like to get along to these pre-budgetary consultations.

Mr Elston: The budget includes revenue.

Mr Stockwell: That, I guess, is the difficulty. My point I made yesterday was very clear. It is very difficult to do a budget when all you get is the spending and you do not get the revenues. I was told they did not exist yesterday.

The Chair: And that is exactly what you told me—

Mr Stockwell: Can you let me finish, Mr Chairman. Thank you. I was told they did not exist. Now, apparently something exists, and now I am told today something exists but it is too expensive to photocopy—

The Chair: No, that is not it.

Mr Stockwell: —because that is all I want, just copies, one for each of us. In fact, why do you not give per party and we will be charged with the responsibility of photocopying the information? I have no problem with that either.

I think what this committee should do, considering difficulty in making recommendations on budget items, request from the Treasury department or the Treasurer, we be supplied with a few copies of the information we have received and allow us to go back and photocopy information.

The Chair: That request in fact has been made and we have received word that they are in fact trying to put together the information you have asked for.

Mr Stockwell: That is great. Did they give you the time as to when they will have this together, since we can sit for another day?

The Chair: I have not received that information, no.

Mr Stockwell: Good. And the other thing is, when will they find it? Did they mention to you—

The Chair: They have not said they have found it. They said they are looking for it to pull it together.

Mr Stockwell: Oh, okay. Did in fact the previous government supply that information to the committee?

Mr Elston: That was the grey book.

The Chair: They were supplied in the grey book, if you wish to have a look at that, there are projections for this year in this book as well.

Mr Stockwell: But they are slightly outdated.

The Chair: They are slightly out of date.

Mrs Sullivan: Slight change in government, too.

Mr Stockwell: It is kind of interesting—open and accessible.

Mr Jamison: I think the comments from Christopherson yesterday concerning the presence of the Treasurer here last Wednesday—all of these questions should have been clarified certainly at the time; we were given at that point the time to do that. The questions were put to the Treasurer. The Treasurer answered those questions.

Mrs Sullivan: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: The questions were put and the answers were not provided.

Mr Stockwell: Accurate; exactly.

Mr Jamison: What has come forward is a concern about revenues. The Treasurer is trying, from my understanding of your comment, to put something together for the committee at this point.

The Chair: That is correct.

Mr Jamison: That is the information we have and I would say that we should continue on and go through some of the documents that have been given us this morning.

The Chair: Last comment, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: My problem—I am trying to be fair on the thing—is that we are having a little bit of difficulty with credibility. I go back again to the document that the Treasurer had in October when he said, “Listen, we have a $2.5-billion deficit and it is a result of a $1-billion shortfall in revenue and a $1.5-billion increase in expenditures.”

Then he predicted the corporate taxes were lower. This is the point I tried to raise with the Treasurer the other day. Published data from the feds said income tax is way up; not enough, as I predicted in the House. You people should be careful with this too, because one of the things that you are going to find is the Treasurer will say, “We cannot do the things that you want to do, caucus, because we have this terrible $2.5-billion deficit left by the Liberals.”

It is a bit of a fabrication; I will be honest with you. The revenues, as I predicted, are not $1 billion lower but $600 million lower, in spite of the fact we are now, six months later, in the worst recession ever. The revenues are not down $1 billion; they are down a maximum of $600 million. But, lo and behold, expenditures are creeping up everywhere in the budget here.

I am just saying that the Treasurer's estimates are causing a lot of us a lot of concern. I will not say that we have difficulty with how they were arrived at. The $2.5-billion deficit stays the same, but the composition is very different now. Actually Mr Stockwell was very specific with the Treasurer when he was here, and as Hansard will show, asking: How can we work? Where are the revenue estimates? Why can we not have them? The Treasurer, “Well, we are still working on them” and what not. Now we hear from you today that in fact they are in a book somewhere and it is too costly to reproduce the book.

The Chair: No, it is not exactly what I said. What I said was that the cost of the book was not justified in terms of the amount of circulation it was given, and that the out-of-date figures you are looking for they are now working on and attempting to get for us.

Mr Stockwell: It sounds like a lot of what you just said.

Mr Phillips: The temperature has gone up in here, but it is just because the first document in October was, those dastardly Liberals left us with this awful financial situation.” Well, now we find it is starting to shift a fair bit. For those of us who watch this sort of thing, we now are saying, “Well, remember the billion-dollar windfall.” Coincidentally there was a windfall the previous year. One could have thought you would have watched out for another windfall, particularly when the federal government's own reports on the first six months showed personal income tax revenue up 24%; corporate revenue down somewhat. Corporate revenue down was incorporated in his October statement; income tax revenue up was not.

Mr Chairman, I am just having some difficulty wondering why those numbers may not be forthcoming. It is not going to make all of our tasks more difficult, because we are going to have to prepare a report on expenditures with no idea of what the revenues might be.

Mr Stockwell: Mr Chair, I would like a clarification. When will we be receiving this information?

The Chair: I was not given a time.

Mr Stockwell: So really we are still operating in the dark. We have no idea if we are ever going to get the revenue figures before this committee rises. Then I would move adjournment until we receive that information.

The Chair: Okay, then—

Mr Sterling: Mr Chair, I would like to speak in support of the motion in that it just seems to me that since we were supplied this kind of information by the previous government, the impediment to our getting this seems to be rather minor in that to photocopy 11 or 12 copies probably could be done by 2 o'clock this afternoon, or it may even be able to be done in an hour or an hour and a half, and we could have a copy of it. I would suggest that if the Treasurer is willing to co-operate, we can come back and make some reasonable recommendations to him on the basis of all the information.

Mr Sutherland: I would certainly like to speak against the motion. We have business to do. We have been working on the draft report and can continue to do that. I think the request has been put in. Your concerns have been noted. They are officially on Hansard. I think we should proceed with the report from there. If you go back and read the report last year, the 1990 report, in there the entire report—while the figures might have been provided—does not make reference to what the revenue figures are in determining their recommendations. So if that was the case then, why can that not be the case this year, if there are issues to be dealt with?

Mr Elston: Big deal.

Mr Stockwell: Give us some numbers, then.

Mrs Sullivan: There is a singular difference in the kinds of recommendations that are put forward.

The Chair: Are there any other people who would like to speak on this, in order?

Mr Stockwell: Is the number 6, 8, 68—

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Stockwell. Seeing no further requests for speaking, I am calling the question. Those in favour of adjournment, please signify by raising your hand. Those opposed? Opposed wins.

Motion negatived.

The Chair: We will continue with the hearing.

Mr Stockwell: You are on your own fellows. Good luck.

The Chair: I think it was agreed yesterday that this morning we would continue with the draft version of the first part of the document, and this is the first revision that you have before you. I would like to work through that in a similar manner that we did before to clear up questions or wordings.

Mrs Sullivan: I wonder if that is the appropriate way to go. I think we were given an indication by the government party yesterday that it would be coming back with the recommendations. Going through the introductory document, it seems to me at this point in time when discussion on the recommendations from the government party have been promised for a day—when we adjourned early yesterday, our expectation was that we would have those recommendations this morning to discuss them, and I think that is the way we should be going.

Mr Jamison: We have some recommendations available this morning, so I think it is important to try to make sure that the document itself reads the way we intended it to read. That is part of the process also. I can assure you that we do have recommendations available. We would like to quickly go over this document to make sure the appropriate changes that have been recommended have been made.

Mrs Sullivan: It seems to me that when a recommendation is put on to the floor as a recommendation that will go from a legislative body to the Treasurer of Ontario in relationship to the budget, the context around which those recommendations are made is very important. We have spent two days editing a context with nothing to fit in, in terms of what the specific recommendations are going to be.

I have never seen the process work like this in a committee before. It is very bizarre. I think it is time to get on to the recommendations. The editing of the introduction to those recommendations can take place latterly.

Mr Jamison: Does your caucus have recommendations also prepared at this point?

Mrs Sullivan: We have been given a commitment from the governing party that your recommendations would be put on the table so that we could have those to discuss.

Mr Jamison: We are working as a committee. That is my point. We have some recommendations to send forward. Does your caucus have any recommendations at this point?

Mrs Sullivan: Let's see your recommendations.

Mr Elston: Basically, if I might, we had been told by Mr Christopherson, who was I think sort of organizing the government caucus response to this, that he was going to put in front of us this morning what your caucus felt were places where there would be substantial agreement, that we could agree on some things, that we would agree on those areas and then we could perhaps start debating or discussing the areas around which there was going to be some real concern.

That being the case, we did not specifically decipher that item 1, item 2 or 3 and then list them as the areas we would bring forth. We thought we might as well wait for that matching, since Mr Christopherson has made it fairly clear that there are going to be certain areas in which the six of you, as representative of the government caucus, are going to want to press your advantage. That is the way this committee is structured and it will work that way.

It seemed rather a strange duplication, although we have our feelings about some of the recommendations, it would have seemed to be a very strange duplication effort for us now to file our list with your list or whatever when we have been told for the last couple of days that was coming forward. I do not have and we do not have a particular list prepared, but we have talked about the areas in which we have a sense of direction and a need to go to and we are prepared to comment in that line.

The Chair: Could I suggest at this point that we move through the document and whatever recommendations are available as we finish a section, we can include those recommendations?

Mr Elston: Except that they are not exclusive, take it, that these—

Mr Jamison: We have observations and recommendations available on a number of sections of the document. I felt that the document is not just the observations and recommendations, but it is also a document that is going to be read, as was pointed out very clearly by Mr Elston yesterday, by a wide-ranging number of people interested in the economic outlook of the province. I think it is important to ensure that it reads the way that we feel it should, and in the related form, I think that is part of the process.

The Chair: I am trying to find a compromise here.

Mr Elston: Let's be realistic about it, there are five there used to be six but one has disappeared—government members and the three of us. If it is the will of the government caucus that we move to read this, let's not waste more time. Let's just read it, because you control the committee. Let's just do it and let's not fight about it any more. It is a waste of time.

Mr Phillips: I think Hansard would show that yesterday we started on one recommendation and then the discussion was, "We must see the whole." I think everybody felt we would be better to see the whole package rather than debate each little one. I think Mr Christopherson said, "We are going to go away and we will give you a package." Then there was a debate, "What about your recommendations?" And I think the comment was, "Why don't we start as close to the end as we can, because knowing how these things work, that is probably where we will end up, so why don't we start with your recommendations?"

I think Hansard would show what we were expecting this morning was a package, maybe not 100% there, 85% there, to begin the debate on the kind of crucial stuff which will be the recommendations. That is what we expected.

The Chair: I believe Mr Elston said he would expect the impossible. I think that was it.

Mr Elston: No, no, we did not expect them all.

Mr Sutherland: I would like to just move for a five-minute recess.

Mr Phillips: One thing I would not mind knowing what is the timetable when we will see those recommendations, so we have some idea.

The Chair: Let's have a five-minute recess and come back, and we should be able to enter it at that time.

The committee recessed at 1036.

The Chair: Okay, what have we decided?

Mr Hansen: We have a fair amount of recommendations to the standing committee here. We have them printed. We just felt, and I know the direction that I had from Mr Christopherson was that we go through the pre-budget consultations, so that is why we are sort of following that direction, but we would like to go through these recommendations, what we have prepared to date, and we will hand copies out to the other parties.

The Chair: Would you prefer to do them in the context of what is written, or do you want to just do the recommendations?

Mr Sutherland: They are presented in a way consistent with the way the draft report has been written, except these recommendations do not start at section 1. I believe they start at the section on finance and economics on page 16 of the draft report, but I think they should be able to follow in a fluent way as they are set out in the copies they are getting.

The Chair: Could I make a suggestion that we turn to page 16 of the report, that section, and deal with the recommendations on that section. Is that acceptable?

Mrs Sullivan: In the old draft?

The Chair: In the old draft? What is the topic then?

Ms Anderson: I think it would be page 20.

The Chair: Social issues, page 20.

Mr Sutherland: Yes, I think the page does change in the new draft.

The Chair: Could I say that we quickly read that section and then do the recommendations. Is that acceptable? Let us read through it.

Should we begin the discussion on this section? Are we prepared to begin the discussion on the recommendations for this section?

Mr Elston: Perhaps if we just had some informal chats back and forth on some of this wording. I am not prepared for "Legislation that reinforces poverty," thanks very much. You may think of us as Stone Age-type folks, but we are a little more advanced than that.

The Chair: Could I ask then, do we want to go off the record and just do this? Do I have consensus to go off the record to do this?

Mrs Sullivan: Why should we be off the record? Everything else has been on the record.

Mr Elston: I was just exchanging a view with Norm; I was not speaking to the committee.

The Chair: When you said that—

Mr Elston: If you are ready to go on dealing with the wording, that is fine, but I was not.

Mr Sutherland: He does not want to—

Mr Elston: I was just asking for an explanation. I did not think it made sense and I was just asking to talk about it. If you want it on the record or if you do not want it on the record, it does not matter to me. I just wanted clarification.

The Chair: This is completely up to the committee.

Mr Elston: Leave it all on the record then, and then you do not have to worry about it and people can clarify what they mean.

The Chair: Okay. We are still on the record, but these guys are just talking.

Mr Sutherland: I think what was missing was the part about "Legislation that reinforces poverty can be abolished." I think the abolition is—

Mrs Sullivan: The abolition?

Mr Sutherland: No, that "Poverty can be abolished by the following measures." I think that word kind of changes the context.

The Chair: Where are we?

Mr Elston: This thing right here that says, "Income adequacy is fundamental." Then it says, "Legislation that reinforces poverty by the following measures."

1050

The Chair: What they should probably say is, "Legislation that impedes"—

Mr Sutherland: No, I think the wording should say, "Legislation that reinforces poverty should be abolished by the following measures."

The Chair: I am not sure you would want to say that.

Mr Elston: There is not any legislation that specifically says there ought to be poverty.

Mr Sutherland: No, sorry. I think maybe it is a question of where the emphasis is going in sentences. "Legislation that reinforces poverty should be abolished."

Mr Elston: Minimum wage is changed by regulation, so I mean—

The Chair: This next one says, "The government should improve STEP by enabling recipients to keep a greater percentage of the income they earn." Is that what you are referring to? That these kinds of caps should be raised and that people should be allowed to have more money from their income?

Mr Sutherland: I think it is just a question of getting the wording straightened out in that first one.

The Chair: That is a legislated thing, that you can make only so much money before you start having it deducted from your welfare.

Mr Elston: That is actually a regulation.

The Chair: Yes, that is a regulation that creates a problem. The wording is terrible, I agree with you, but maybe that is what they are trying to get at.

Mr Elston: Is this the guy responsible for this?

Mr Sutherland: I do not know—

Mr Elston: Name names.

Mr Sutherland: Why do we not just reword it as "the following legislation should be introduced."

Mr Elston: "Should be introduced"?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, replacing what is there. Okay?

Mr Elston: So we end up having: "Income adequacy is fundamental to welfare reform. Legislation should be introduced"—

The Chair: "That."

Mr Elston: —"that should"—

The Chair: "That" should be "to." You have to change the wording, "to raise the minimum wage to"—

Mr Sutherland: No. "Legislation should be introduced that the minimum"—oh, okay, sorry.

The Chair: I am trying to make it grammatically correct.

Mr Sutherland: That is right.

The Chair: My name is going to be on this, you know.

Mr Sutherland: That is right.

The Chair: As is yours.

Ms M. Ward: Why not just say "We recommend"?

The Chair: "Legislation should be introduced to raise the minimum wage and the government should be instructed to examine the two-tier delivery system for social services."

Mr Sutherland: Sounds good.

The Chair: Is there any debate on the intent of this recommendation?

Mr Elston: Probably not the intent, as long as we get it clear. What has happened here is that the people who have put the recommendations have tried to bullet-point them for ease of expression and have actually cut themselves off. They should have just done separate ones saying, "Income adequacy is fundamental to welfare reform and to dealing with the problem of poverty." and "To do this, the level of the minimum wage ought to be addressed."

Then they should go on to the second one, "The two-tier delivery system is an impediment to welfare reform," or whatever the committee wants to say, and then have a separate bullet for it. You are trying to do too much with the bullet points, that is all. Just write the sentences, it is much easier.

The Chair: Yes, this could be simplified in the language if you just said that the committee recommends that the minimum wage be raised and that the two-tier delivery system for social services should be examined, or some form like that. You do not really need to rationalize this part.

Mr Sutherland: "The committee therefore recommends that the minimum wage should be raised and the committee therefore recommends the examination of the two-tier delivery system for social services."

Mr Elston: I do not mind the thoughts that go behind that. The Social Assistance Review Committee was quite interested in the level of wage rate, but I am not quite prepared—I guess we should go through the whole level of things because it does not look to me like there is enough onus being placed on government to clean up its act. They have talked a little bit about STEP here, they have talked about perhaps indexation, but they have really done enough here for government.

For instance, as my colleague Mr Sutherland just said, what about a recommendation to eliminate a number of lower-income-earning Ontarians from paying income tax? Mr Nixon has consistently over the years kept raising the level and eliminated more people from the lower end of the tax obligation scale in Ontario, even though the government did not do it. I think we ought to see that trend in the future continuing. The package is not complete, and I do not want to say yes to the first until you know what the whole package is going to look like. It is fine the way you express it but

Mr Jamison: All right. We want your input and your discussion on it. If you have recommendations that you want to put forward to improve upon what we are saying here, we will certainly consider them.

The Chair: Two things. I think I am hearing a consensus that the philosophy of what the committee is trying to say is there and that what we are grappling for are ways to express the actions. I have this attempt, "Regulation that reinforces poverty should be replaced by the introduction of legislation that raises the minimum wage and that allows for the examination of the two-tier social service system."

Mr Elston: Nice try, but—

Mrs Sullivan: Are you suggesting, Mr Chairman, that the number one paragraph on this page be followed by that? I am just not certain where you are going here.

The Chair: I am at the will of the committee. I assumed that since we were doing the committee's observations and recommendations, that paragraph would be included there and then, "Therefore, the committee recommends that." I believe that has been the format in the past. I think we agree on the philosophy. All we need to do is agree on the words. Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: If I could just talk about the kind of practicalities of the recommendations and inclusion in the budget, it seems to me that what we are asking for in putting recommendations forward is that the Treasury take these into account in defining and drafting and implementing the next budget, so the recommendation should be specific to that budgetary period.

If the questions, for instance, of income adequacy are the priority questions to be addressed, then surely the context in which those questions have to be put is the first phase of the SARC recommendations, which have been accepted by all political parties in the Legislature. The SARC report has been seen as a positive recommendation for change in that area, and perhaps given an introduction to the social issues area relating to poverty, the fundamental recommendation should be that the government should announce in this budget a timetable and funding for implementation of the next phase of SARC recommendations.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chairman, that recommendation is already there. It is down a little further.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, we take that and give it the priority.

Mr Sutherland: If you want to change the order of the recommendations—

Mrs Sullivan: Because all the other income adequacy recommendations fit into the next phase of SARC.

100

The Chair: Does anybody have any problem with moving that up and doing it the way Mrs Sullivan has suggested?

Mr Hansen: No problem there. Would you do that again so that the researchers can have it?

Mrs Sullivan: Okay, it would be, "The government should announce in this budget a timetable for implementation and funding of the next phase of the SARC recommendations."

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, I thought you were referring to the actual recommendation here which is, "The government should announce a timetable for the implementation of SARC recommendations."

Mrs Sullivan: What I am saying is, in the context of budgetary planning, funding is what the budget is about.

The Chair: The SARC report does have recommendations for funding in it. Do you see some fundamental difference between "The government should announce a timetable for the implementation of the SARC recommendations" and "The government should announce a timetable for the implementation of the SARC recommendations"?

Mr Sutherland: I think it is inherent in "implementation" that if you are going to implement it, you are going to have to provide the funding for it.

The Chair: Then why are we worrying about that wording?

Mr Sutherland: That is why I am wondering why we need that wording. "Implementation" implies that.

Mr Elston: Mr Chairman, just to help Mr Sutherland out, a big deal was made during the last election that too much had been passed to municipal governments perhaps to help fund some of these social reforms. In fact, I know a good number of your colleagues who may not have been quite as successful as you are, who tried to make those points very pointedly and said that even though we had announced the plans and expenditures, there was not enough money coming forward to do it all. We want to be very clear too. It needs to be consistent.

Mr Sutherland: I think that issue, though, was dealt with when we dealt with the issue of municipalities and I am not sure if it is in this group, but there will be recommendations coming forward about that whole issue related to provincial-municipal financing and different issues.

Mr Elston: Of course, you know something that we do not. That is why it is difficult for us to—

The Chair: I agree. As the Chairman—

Mr Sutherland: It is a separate issue, though, Mr Elston.

Mr Elston: Not from social reform.

The Chair: —I am having a little difficulty. I would like to get this moved along and I do not see that there is a big problem with including funding. The SARC report does have recommendations for funding and if you are going to put in a timetable, the adding or deleting of that word is—

Mr Sutherland: What I suggest is that we agree on the concept of moving up that recommendation to the first, then maybe we can have a little more discussion early this afternoon about the exact wording of that recommendation.

The Chair: I guess we can; I am not saying we cannot. I believe my task is to try and move this along. I do not want to turn this into a semantics argument about where words should be and what words they should be. If the basic intent of the recommendation is agreed upon—

Mr Sutherland: Do we have consensus that we move that up and then the other recommendations here come after that?

The Chair: That is my line.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, I was just trying to help facilitate the process, Mr Chairman.

Mr Elston: For the purposes of discussion and for putting this thing together, let us go ahead and assume that. My problem is this: You ask me to approve that and say a little later you disagree with the whole package, yet you approved of it before, why did you change your mind? Then I cannot feel comfortable with your assurance that my concern here will be dealt with because you are thinking about doing something in another package of items to come forward. Do you see what I mean? But for the purposes of discussion and construction, let us just move ahead.

The Chair: I agree with that and I also would say that once the whole report is put together we should try and have some time to revisit the whole thing just to make sure that it is in the context that everybody feels comfortable with. Would that satisfy you?

Mr Sutherland: Sure.

Mr Elston: Take a look at it at some future point.

Mr Phillips: Maybe I am changing the subject, but on the minimum wage now, have we dealt with that?

The Chair: I believe we have consensus to move that up, yes.

Mr Phillips: I think we probably all could agree that the minimum wage should be raised, because it is raised every year. But then if you get into a debate, "What did you mean? What did they mean?" I think the challenge here is that any analysis that I saw done says there is a major job impact if you take the minimum wage up.

I guess you have already announced what you are going to do with it, but if it just says the minimum wage should be raised, then when someone says, "What did you mean?" I think I mean what would be consistent with a reasonable economic impact study. What you will mean is the 60% of the industrial wage that you have committed to, I think. So if it is as vague as that and each of us can have our own interpretation of it, that is what I would be saying.

If the minimum wage should be raised and the implication is to your policy, then I would say there is no way we could agree to that, because we have put a different interpretation on the minimum wage and it is jobs, jobs, jobs.

So if that were to stay in and implied that it meant your 60%, I think we would have to be looking at something that says, "Consistent with ongoing economic analysis of the economic impact studies of the implications of the raises." I am saying if this stays in there as vague as that, I do not think anybody could argue, because I think when we were in, we took it up every year.

Mr Hansen: So you agree with the statement that the minimum wage should be raised?

Mr Phillips: Yes. Then if someone said, "What did the committee mean by that?" I would say the committee was silent on what we meant. If it meant that the committee agrees with the NDP policy, I would say we would not be supportive of it.

Mr Elston: We would have to say it was a majority view.

The Chair: What I am hearing is to leave it like that; no, not leave it like that. Mrs Sullivan, do you want it more clearly defined with, "The minimum wage should be raised"?

Mr Phillips: As long as you realize that our interpretation would be as it is done every year and consistent with economic analysis. If you say, "Well, we have our policy on that and that is what it meant," then we will be much more specific.

Mr Hansen: We agree with that.

Mr Elston: Could I just raise a question about the preamble, the sentence that talks about, "The committee is disturbed by the lack of adequate levels of social assistance benefits to those in need." The first clause of the next sentence, "Although the present economic reality may not allow for significant expenditure increases in many areas," whence does that come?

Is there some compromise of our sense that social assistance benefits are not quite right and so, as long as there is some economic uncertainty, we allow those to stay, or are we committed to the idea that was expressed in the first sentence? Can you just take that thing right out and say the committee feels that it must stress the importance of dealing with the overall structural causes of poverty, just eliminate the economic thing.

Mr Jamison: Not really.

Mr Elston: Why?

Mr Jamison: Because this committee has to recognize the time and space that we are in as far as the economics of the province are concerned. If we just ignore that altogether, we are not giving a picture at all of our thoughts.

Mr Elston: How can you make that judgement when we do not have anything that tells us what the real revenue forecasts are all about? We do not know yet what the—

Mr Jamison: I think the Treasurer made it fairly clear on Wednesday that it looked like we were going to be into deficit budgeting. That is a clear indication in itself.

Mr Elston: So as a caucus are you comfortable with the position that as long as the Treasurer says, "There is a deficit and I am not prepared to change the structural causes of poverty," you would stay at that?

Mr Jamison: It is a fact that you have to take into consideration when you are making your recommendations. These recommendations go forward and are based on the government's fiscal ability.

Mr Elston: So you would say this fiscal outlook is going to cause your caucus to withdraw from your commitment to changing the structure around poverty.

Mr Sutherland: That is not how I interpret what is there.

Mr Elston: That is what that sentence does for us.

Mr Sutherland: I think that is your interpretation. It would suggest that is not our interpretation.

Mr Elston: These are the first weasel words that allow you to soften up the readers of the report to the Treasurer backing away from your philosophical position. That is why this sentence is in there. It allows you to soften up so Floyd can say, "Even the committee of the Legislature recognized I have some fiscal problems, they didn't recommend I do anything right away."

Mr Sutherland: If you look at the last part of the sentence which says, "The committee feels it must stress the importance of dealing with the overall structural causes of poverty," to me that is a very strong commitment. That is not backing away from the issue.

Mr Elston: It would be even stronger if you just eliminated that first weasel-word clause.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think the term "weasel word" is appropriate in this case.

Mr Elston: That is what it allows.

The Chair: Under the rules, I do not think that is one of the forbidden words.

Mr Elston: Everybody understands what that means. You are trying to have it both ways by that sentence. No matter either you are committed to it or you are not. If you want this report to allow Floyd to back away from some of the stuff you campaigned on, that is okay, but you ought to say it directly.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Elston, you are proposing to eliminate all the way up to the comma. Is that what you are suggesting?

Mr Elston: Sure. Either you believe it or you do not. Then it is up to the Treasurer to make the decision.

Mr Sutherland: Leave it until later.

Mr Elston: Right? That is what SARC is all about—dealing with the underlying causes. How can we endorse SARC, which is supposed to deal with the structural nature of the poverty cases, and then say, "Although the economic reality may not allow"?

Mr Phillips: Maybe we should say the Ontario government has reacted to predictions of an economic slowdown by dropping its liberal pretence and showing its true conservative nature.

The Chair: I do not think we are going to get a consensus on that.

Mr Phillips: That is what he said last year. That is the DP report from last year. I just thought maybe you would want to restate that.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, it would seem that there is a proposal put forward. May I suggest for the purpose of progressing here on some of the other recommendations that we come back to that this afternoon.

Mr Elston: Do you want it in or do you not? You can decide that now, can you not? What are you going to do with that?

Mr Jamison: It is a report on finance and economics. As far as I am concerned, that is a reality that we are now living.

Mrs Sullivan: Budget-making is making choices and one of the things that this whole area related to poverty has been addressing so far is the choice of addressing the inadequacies of incomes. If the committee in a consensus position believes that it must stress the importance of dealing with the overall structural causes of poverty, that is what should be there. That is what should be the lead-in, without words that in fact weaken that position.

Mr Sutherland: If you look at the last few words where it says "increases in many areas," that is just highlighting that we are in difficult economic times and some areas may not be getting what they say they want. Then if you continue on to see what it says, I think it is emphasizing the fact that this committee wants to deal with these issues of poverty.

Mr Elston: Listen, you guys are anticipating that David is not going to go as quickly with SARC as some of the groups want to. That is what that whole thing is about. The people who helped you write this have that precisely in mind, because, listen, we know what happens. David has been asked with Floyd; he is just a parliamentary assistant. You guys have been in touch at least with David, if not also with Floyd, and Floyd says: "Listen, we can't do everything we want to do. Soften this thing off so that I have some room for manoeuvring."

Mr Sutherland: That is Mr Elston's interpretation and I would suggest it is not everyone's interpretation.

Mrs Sullivan: In that case, and if that is not the case, then I do not see why the members of the committee cannot do what in fact appears to be the consensus. Leave out the weasel words and in fact include latterly the commitment to a recommendation from this committee that the Treasurer include the funding and the timetable for the next phase of SARC. That is the question. Those are the choices the Treasurer has to make. If we want to go ahead with a consensus of this committee with providing income adequacy, those are the next steps and those are the funding requirements.

Mr Sutherland: I think it was stated earlier that we should consider this and get back on that specific proposal put forward by the other members.

The Chair: I would like to point out that we are a day and a half from having this done, signed, sealed and delivered to the researchers. If we continue to put all these things off until later on, we will never get through this. I would really like to see, when this comes back this afternoon, that we know exactly where we are going with this and what is going to happen.

Mr Sutherland: We are well aware of the time constraints placed on this committee and the issue will be dealt with.

Mr Phillips: It may be helpful to the government, you may find it useful just to re-read your report from last year, because it kind of makes the case we are trying to make to you in terms of I think you were quite strong last year saying that, "The Liberal government is now spreading the message that 1990 will be a year of financial restraint," etc. We see some—I guess a strong word would be "hypocrisy"—in this thing.

The Chair: You cannot use that word; I know that.

Mr Phillips: Okay, "inconsistency."

The Chair: Mr Elston pointed that out to me.

Mr Elston: He did not actually use it; he just said he saw it. He was remarking that it was available for viewing.

The Chair: I saw that too. Can we move along on this to get consensus on the rest of the recommendations for this section?

Mr Elston: Basically I noticed that, as this was constructed, I read the whole thing as a package. I notice there is a repetition of about three or four ideas on the two pages. I do not know whether it was to make sure you did not miss them or if there was a particular style of construction that required you to repeat at least a couple of these. We have, "The government should improve STEP by enabling recipients to keep a greater percentage of the income they earn." That is on page 1. On page 2, "The government should improve STEP by enabling recipients to keep a greater percentage of the income they earn." I am not sure exactly what you want to do with that.

Mr Sutherland: I think that was just a question of, in the process of developing, a couple of recommendations came from different areas.

Mr Elston: Okay. Then, "The government should consider that income adequacy is essential to ensure welfare reform." Then it continues on the second page. If we speak only to the issue of implementing SARC, it speaks both to dealing with the institutionalized barriers to elimination of poverty and a whole series of other things. You can say the same thing by very simple words, or at least very simple sentences, rather than trying to construct something that is more complex than it needs to be.

Mr Sutherland: I think we will take under advisement your vast experience in these areas on helping with these committees.

Mr Elston: Oh, I have no experience in the last five years in helping with these committees. It just means that it becomes simpler. If we say, for instance, "SARC," what does that entail? Most of the people who are interested in this document—Treasury, Comsoc people, Health, anybody who is interested in the advocacy field, people who are recipients, all those people—even Conrad Black for different reasons, but still is interested—and when you say move to the second stage to deal with those barriers, then that is understood at least and you do not have to repeat. You might want to do something. The STEP thing is an important issue I think in the sense that you are saying, “Change the way it’s set up.”

The Chair: Do we have a consensus on that one? Okay.

Mrs Sullivan: If we are sort of moving ahead on things that are here in terms of recommendations, I would certainly like to see added two committee recommendations. The recommendation from the committee that additional low-income earners be removed from income tax rolls, I think it is a continuation of a policy that has existed over a period of time and in fact provides equity and fairness to low-income earners. I think that should be a recommendation.

I am also quite sceptical about including as a recommendation from the committee the recommendation relating to the guaranteed loan plan. We have had one group that appeared before us that talked about its experiences through a privately funded, non-profit organization that had some success there. I am not sure that we would have a consensus as to whether that kind of a program ought to be taken over by government or whether we ought to expect the private sector to continue with those kinds of initiatives.

Second, whether—

The Chair: Could we deal with these just one at a time?

Mrs Sullivan: But it is in the same context.

The Chair: All right.

Mrs Sullivan: Second, the question of providing a guaranteed loan program, perhaps reviewing, but I would think that would be the least of the recommendations that ought to be included when we are addressing questions of income adequacy.

Mr Sutherland: Would you support the idea of just having some more examination of that type of system, the guaranteed loan program for business development?

Mrs Sullivan: It seems to me if the question is income adequacy, SARC and the income tax rolls have a far, far higher priority.

The Chair: There are two things there. One is the removal of or changing the income tax.

Mr Hansen: The bracket.

The Chair: The bracket. No problem with that?

Mr Hansen: No problem with that.

The Chair: Okay, we will include that. I have consensus on altering the income bracket. Could I have some wording on that? How would you want to word that on the income?

Mrs Sullivan: On income tax?

The Chair: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: “The committee recommends that the Treasurer remove additional low-income earners from the income tax rolls following the pattern of the previous years of budgeting.”

The Chair: “Should remove”?

Mrs Sullivan: No, “remove.”

The Chair: Okay, that has a consensus, so we going to move along from that. The next one is the guaranteed loan. Do we have consensus on that? To remove, leave it in? I thought we were leaving it in. Did I misunderstand?

Mr Elston: I certainly did. I thought Barbara was gesting that it be out.

The Chair: I have missed something here. Could review what you said about that?

Mrs Sullivan: I am not keen on it. I think in terms of income adequacy, it does not fit.

The Chair: Would you see this as being recommended somewhere else in the text?

Mrs Sullivan: As a budget initiative, no.

The Chair: Okay. Just from my own recollection somebody made a presentation that she had difficulty cashing her cheques at banks or trust companies, that did not have accounts or something, and somebody investigating the possibility, some previous government about having identification that would then require banks and trust companies to cash those cheques because they are government cheques.

Mr Hansen: The problem was that the cheque, coming out, it was dated the 30th and people were receiving them on the 27th or 28th. They would not cash them because they were actually dated ahead.

The Chair: They could go to the Money Mart people and cash them.

Mr Hansen: Yes. Actually, when it came down to the cheque was due on the 30th of the month and they received it two days earlier in the mail.

The Chair: Do we want to make a recommendation around that? That is a systemic thing.

Mr Hansen: I have no recommendation on that. Whatever the cheque is dated at should be the date it is cashed. It is going to be up to whoever is sending the cheque out to date it back two days.

The Chair: One of the problems though, and I am throwing this out for discussion, is that they had difficulty sometimes cashing the cheques even in the banks because they did not have the proper identification.

Mr Elston: Generally the person is supposed to cash the cheque at any financial institution. If you do not have an account or if the cheque is not drawn on your own bank, that is—

The Chair: Then they would go to the Money Mart and they would wind up having to pay a surcharge on top of a discount. Is that something this committee might want to recommend having something done about?

Mr Elston: To the Treasurer?

Mrs Sullivan: It is not a budget decision.

The Chair: No? Okay.

Mr Jamison: We would ask for a short recess, 10 minutes, at this point.

Mr Phillips: Did something happen we did not see here?

Mr Jamison: No, it did not. This is of course our initial draft and certainly it is there for discussion. But we have some concerns for the committee at this point and we would like 10 minutes to address them for the committee.

The Chair: Sure.

The committee recessed at 1125.

43

The Chair: Since we have had this break, where are we going now?

Mr Hansen: Do you think we could on to housing?

Mr Elston: I am quite agreeable. I did not know what we were about to hear, so I am happy to go wherever.

Mr Hansen: There was not anything unusual.

Mr Elston: I thought it was in relation to social matters that you wanted to have a talk.

Mr Hansen: No. That is why it was so abrupt and quick.

Mr Sutherland: The points that you have brought up, we will come back to this afternoon and try to deal with them more specifically then.

The Chair: Housing. That is page 21 as well. We will take a minute to read the preamble.

Mrs Sullivan: I do not see any budget recommendations here. What I see are some comments, but in terms of budget recommendations to the Treasurer on which fiscal and financial decisions can be made, I do not see recommendations on which his decisions could be based. I would suggest that if the committee is to have legitimacy it ought to become far more specific, including perhaps reflecting the government party's promise to the people that we would construct 20,000 non-profit units a year and talk about some other aspects of the housing question which have been raised in this committee.

I also look in the housing documentation that the government party has raised suggesting 10.5% mortgages, a mortgage fund, availability and so on, other recommendations that came from groups from the non-profit and co-op communities that were very significant and right before the committee. All I see here is something that the Treasurer could make no decisions on. Antidiscrimination policies are not budgetary decisions, and I just do not understand. Once again, what I see here is the waffling.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, just before we continue, I believe the reason is—and apologies for that—if you remember when the draft report was being drawn and we were talking about the sections under housing, a great deal of those issues came under the topics of construction. Those recommendations for those areas will be coming forward when those recommendations under that area are brought to you this afternoon. Okay.

Mrs Sullivan: Then perhaps we should go on to another topic.

Mr Elston: Our committee should just sort of wait till this afternoon. We have only got another 10 minutes or so this morning. I mean, can we make progress with the next section? I looked over these things quickly yesterday. As you know, I am not as into these presentations as some of you, because I did not hear the presentations actually, so I looked at the recommendations. But for instance, housing was a $900,000 request basically from the Victorian Order of Nurses with respect to home-sharing programs operating under VON, and there is an amount for—what is the name of the program?—Let's Build Ontario or something. Those types of programs are fascinating for more than one reason. One is, of course, that it supplies housing, which we all want people to have. Second of all, there are jobs and other fiscal and economic advantages put forward as part of the rationale for their being in recommendations to the Treasurer.

It seems to me that it would be of some merit for us to maybe debate or at least talk about some of those types of programs, not saying we will do them all but to say, "Listen, Treasurer, there are at least a menu of items that have come forward that have merit because they include employment plus the development of housing."

Mr Sutherland: Maybe we should, and that is a possibility of doing that. We could probably get the next two topics done at least before we adjourn for lunch.

Mr Elston: Okay.

Mrs Sullivan: There is a section on disabled. I assume that is one of the topics we will be coming back to, or has that been included as the end of the social issues?

Mr Sutherland: I believe if you look on some of the things that you commented on that were in there twice, on page 2 of the document that was put forward, it does deal with some of the disabled issues.

Mrs Sullivan: What I am asking is if you intend to come back to those or if you feel that our discussion on social issues has covered that entire topic area.

Mr Sutherland: If you feel those recommendations are satisfactory, then I would suggest that we—

Mrs Sullivan: We have not had a discussion on those pages.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. So you would like to have some discussion on them.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

The Chair: Can we do these two observations and recommendations for the immigration? We can wrap this and we will have lunch and we will come back.

Mrs Sullivan: Once again, I do not see a recommendation here that would enable the Treasurer to respond in fiscal and financial terms, which are the context of budget-making. It seems to me that if the committee is going to make recommendations relating to programs surrounding the integration of immigrants into the community, the recommendations relating to the budget have to be phrased in financial terms. Therefore, the kind of wording that ought to be here would include such things as, "The government of Ontario should pursue additional agreements with Ottawa and fund in the next budget its own commitment to ensure the range of settlement services" and perhaps even put a commitment funding level in. Without the recommendations from the committee of financial involvement, there is no recommendation for budgetary action.

Mr Sutherland: I would disagree. What is stated there advised that if you are going to negotiate an agreement, I would suggest that is going to be a joint agreement between the province and the federal government and would imply that there would be funding from both parties. It would seem evident to me that that is implied in the statements there—that if you are going to have an agreement, both parties are going to be part of that and both of them are going to have to pay the cost of that, and I think that is very clear in both those.

Mr Elston: I know that theoretically that is true. The practical workings of dealing with the federal authorities is that the Treasurer will not allocate money on the basis of perhaps coming to a successful conclusion and agreement with Ottawa. He will say to the people from Community and Social Services or whoever goes to negotiate: "You come back. You tell me what you have, because my friend Michael Wilson has told me they ain't got nothing in their budget for this year. It will have to be next year." So there is nothing there. He will just say: "Well, nice idea. We will both send those people away and I am not going to budget for it."

I think that what we have to be sure of right here is that we make a specific point, a recommendation—we wrestled with this ourselves—a specific recommendation to the Treasurer that this government pursue fiscal ways of assisting people who are coming to Ontario for the first time from other countries to settle, to find a home here, and to help them access services that they need.

I think that we cannot manage the Ottawa thing and we know what the pressures are in Ottawa in the sense of where we think they are going. We have to make the point to the Treasurer. Those people who come here as immigrants need our help and are required to be helped. I know that when we dealt with the immigrant settlement issue, Ottawa just said, "We don't care." In fact, Barbara McDougall, I think, even made it clear this fall again that she was not going to pay any part of the cost of settlement of immigrants. She was not going to pay for any of the education. Even though one of your ministers at the time I guess that is Marion Boyd, said we should get some money from Ottawa, Barbara McDougall basically said, "Don't count on it."

If we are going to make a recommendation that the help required, then maybe we should make that statement first and clearly indicate that it is our recommendation something be done fiscally to assist the organizations provide settlement help for immigrants.

Mr Sutherland: So you would prefer something that has the effect that the government of Ontario should ensure an adequate range of services.

Mr Elston: From a constitutional point of view, the federal people will say: "You have to make sure that the people are settled here. They are landed immigrants. They have status which requires you to respond to the educational and social needs of these people."

The other problem, which is a real one—you probably did not hear anything in terms of the presentations made was the hesitance that Ottawa has in granting the people who come here as refugees work permit status. That is the real problem that I know about from our own practical experience. I do not know if anybody talked about it here. I would be so bold as to recommend that the Treasurer in consultation with the Minister of Community and Social Services take upon themselves to ensure that work permits are available for immigrants, whether or not Ottawa allows them to pursue work permits here. That is a big issue in terms of the consumption of social dollars in helping people who could work but who are prevented from working because of their poverty issues.

We have wrestled with this with Ottawa for a while. I am prepared to be much more aggressive about it than I would prefer to be much more aggressive about it here because I know the inertia that is attached to this issue in federal-provincial relationships.

The Chair: We have three minutes left. Can we adjourn and come back this afternoon? What time would you like to be back? Two o'clock? Okay, we are adjourned at 2 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1157.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1416 in committee room 2.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, would you lead the way please?

Mr Christopherson: I do not know about that, but I will talk first.

I understand from my colleagues that this morning there were some changes made that were agreed to and there were other changes suggested by the opposition that were taken under advisement. In the reworked document that has been circulated with today's date and timed 1:30 pm, some of those changes have been incorporated. If I can, just to bring me up to speed, I believe the first paragraph is not a problem.

Mr Phillips: On the first page? Actually, it is a problem.

Mr Christopherson: Is it?

Mr Phillips: Yes. I think our concern was that although the present economic reality may not allow it—we are in the area, I think, of poverty. I am not sure of the reading. Is it "Poverty" that this fits under? I cannot quite remember the report now.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, we are.

Mr Phillips: I think you are signalling that in this area things that might have been said in the past—and I have quoted last year's document, the minority report around how you reacted to government—

Mr Christopherson: I am glad to see you use at least one other document besides the one.

Mr Phillips: In any event, it kind of jumps off the page as—"weasel" was the term used, particularly as this is the first time we have seen this phrase. "Hypocrisy" was the word we could not use, but it might be seen, relative to the previous words, as unusual. So I think we were suggesting that we simply say "disturbed by the lack of" and the committee feels it must stress the importance of dealing with the overall structure and causes of poverty," and not single out poverty as an area where we are not prepared to make significant expenditure increases.

Mr Christopherson: That concern was brought to our collective attention. In an attempt to be as accommodating as possible, if there is a desire on your part and that of your colleagues that that particular clause appear somewhere in the document—

Mrs Sullivan: How about never?

Mr Christopherson: No, I am saying that is our response to that. We are prepared to do that.

Mr Elston: Our desire was that it not appear, so how can you give us an option of choosing that?

Mr Christopherson: Because in terms of what we are prepared to accept in our position, that is what we are down to.

Mr Elston: Basically, then what you should be saying is that you are not prepared to have it removed. Do not say we have the option of putting it someplace else.

Mr Christopherson: Well, You do.

Mr Elston: That is not an option.

Mr Christopherson: That is your choice.

Mr Elston: David, that is not true. We said the thing should be removed.

Mrs Sullivan: Just to summarize the point of view of our caucus, we believe the introduction to this section of recommendations from the entire committee should begin with, "The committee feels it must stress the importance of dealing with the overall structural causes of poverty," and continue from there with specific wording. We are not prepared to have those particular words injected in this or other sections of the report.

Mr Christopherson: For the time being, then, that remains an unresolved issue.

The Chair: You can resolve it if it is a motion. Do you want it resolved?

Mr Christopherson: Well, I would like to keep us moving along in the areas of agreement as best we can. When it comes back to the hard rub and we have to do that, then so be it.

The Chair: Okay. Can we move along, then?

Mr Christopherson: I believe the only change along this line right now is that the recommendations have been realigned; the Social Assistance Review Committee one was brought to the top. I am not sure exactly how many of these were agreed, so I will just read them and we will see where we are:

"The committee therefore recommends that:

"the government should announce a timetable for implementation and funding of SARC recommendations."

I understand the request for the word "funding" came from the opposition and we were comfortable with that. We think that is indeed appropriate.

The Chair: Also, the committee this morning said the committee recommends that: "the Treasury remove additional low-income tax earners from income tax rolls, following the practices of the last five years." That was also one of the recommendations from this morning.

Mr Sutherland: I think that one still had some discussion, particularly about its wording.

Mr Christopherson: Next: "The government should consider indexation of social assistance rates to the consumer price index to ensure that rates reflect more adequately the true cost of living."

Hearing, nothing, the next point: "The government should improve STEP by enabling recipients to keep a greater percentage of the income they earn."

Next: "The province should push ahead in the CAP negotiations.

"The government should raise the minimum wage.

"The government should examine the two-tier delivery system for social services."

Mrs Sullivan: This particular point is one which was going to be left to a discussion of the municipal section of the budget. In our discussions this morning, it was specifically left out of discussions relating to poverty. It seems to me that it fits in here, but we did not address that particular issue. There are some matters that my caucus wants to put on the table in relation to that recommendation.

Mr Christopherson: I am unclear on that anyway. How are we considering your caucus's points, positions, in terms of process? What is proposed?

Mr Elston: We generally debate here. This is your first cut at stuff, and we have just been joining the debate on the items as they are raised. In fact, the ordering here came out of some of the discussions we had, I think, and are significant.

Mr Christopherson: So your input at that point represents your position, if you will, on these matters.

Mr Elston: Except, as I said earlier, that we had a real concern about the issue around funding. Kimble had rightly said that you were saying some things further down the track about municipal funding for social services programs. We said it was impossible for us, then, to agree completely on a particular item until we saw the other half of the equation, but that we are prepared, for the purposes of getting something down and in written form, to go ahead with it.

Mr Christopherson: Fair enough. Sure.

Mr Elston: As long as you understand that we are giving the checkmarks along the way on the basis that there may be something further coming and that the package may look much better than the whole, I think you will understand about our position.

Mr Christopherson: That is not a problem. It is a two-way street actually, because, quite frankly, especially as we are all new at this, we may want to revisit some of these ourselves in light of issues you raise, discussions here, before the package is finally approved. So I think we have a great deal of comfort there?

On this specific then, Barbara, what were you looking for? To have it pulled and reinserted in another area or a discussion on that?

Mrs Sullivan: My point was that because it was, in this morning's discussion, not talked about because it was felt by members of your caucus that it fit into a different place in the report, under the municipal section, we have not addressed this. Indeed, my initial reaction is that this is a weak recommendation. If a recommendation goes forward from the committee, it ought to be that the government should not simply "examine," but that the government should replace the two-tier delivery system and fund social assistance from the provincial base. That is the recommendation from the SARC committee and that is what we think would be appropriate to be included in the report, but we have not had that discussion.

Mr Christopherson: I am hearing from my colleagues around me that in light of that discussion, we do not have a problem pulling it from here, reinserting it in the proper municipal area, recognizing that there may still need to be a thorough discussion, on all our parts, around it. We will put that out for now with the intention of reinserting.

"The government should consider that income adequacy is essential to ensure welfare reform."

Mr Elston: I do not disagree with this, but it seems rather redundant—does it not?—bearing in mind that we are talking about the SARC project, if I can describe it that, and it speaks to the issue of income adequacy, as well as other items, but certainly the income adequacy and systemic problems around poverty. I do not know that we need to repeat this as a recommendation. It does not take us any place further than what the SARC report or SARC project gives us.

Mr Christopherson: I think the only reason you see as a separate issue is that for many years the whole issue of adequacy as the absolute first step was so important that we just did not want to drop it and say it is included somewhere.

Mr Elston: But that is SARC, that is the whole point around the first step in SARC, that we are concerned we had not gone far enough for a second step and all that. The first step was taken, as was required by the report, and dealt with the initial problem of income adequacy, then the second stage was to deal more appropriately with the adequacy question. So I think this is pabulum. Nobody disagrees with it, but why are we recommending it when the SARC report, which we are endorsing for the government's further implementation, says precisely that.

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at it.

The Chair: Maybe you could take it up in a dissenting opinion attached to the first point.

Mr Elston: One of the things you do not want to do is end up having a whole series of worthless clauses in the thing. If it is something that goes without saying, do not bother saying it.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Chairman, I apologize, because I am just grabbing my notes from the previous discussion but our recommendation for the very first bullet point was more specific than the one that is here. This relates to the timetable and funding of SARC. Our recommendation was: "the government should announce in the 1991 budget a timetable for implementation of funding of the second phase of SARC recommendations." We have to be more specific on that recommendation, and we feel it speaks right to the integrity of introducing the next phase of SARC.

Mr Christopherson: Well, we hear your concern and we will look at it again, but I am not sure how much more room we have for movement there.

Ms Sullivan: Could you explain that?

Mr Christopherson: Explain that?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: I said we would review it, consider what you have said, although I am not sure that we have a lot of room for change in our position.

Mrs Sullivan: I am not certain why. Could you explain why there would not be room for change?

Mr Christopherson: Because we feel that it is fairly far right now, from our point of view.

Mr Elston: Meaning that you do not want to mention second-phase funding should be provided in the budget, I see it. At least if you had a timetable expressed. Is that no, you do not want to have it in, or no, that is not what you intend?

Mr Sutherland: No, that is not a correct interpretation.

Mr Elston: So as a caucus, you are in favour of second-phase funding?

Mr Christopherson: As a caucus, we are in support of what we have here in front of us right now.

Mr Elston: No, no, no. That is not the question. You are being highly evasive here. All I ask is this: Are you in favour—

Mr Christopherson: Well, I am not on the witness stand.

Mr Elston: —of recommending second-phase funding in SARC? If you are in favour of it, tell us. If we are in favour of it as a group, then we should state it. If you are not prepared to go that far, just say you are not prepared to move to second-phase SARC funding.

30

Mr Christopherson: I have said very clearly twice, and I will say it a third time, that we have heard exactly what you have said and we will consider it in a caucus forum. I am not prepared to make any changes to this without having a chance to talk to my colleagues, so we will take a look at what you have said.

Mrs Sullivan: With respect, you have already caused, and—

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, please, we are trying to be as co-operative as possible, and I can appreciate that more experienced veterans may feel that we should move through these things a little quicker, but we are moving as quickly as we possibly can and trying to make the process—

Mr Elston: David, we are not trying to do that sort of thing at all. Where I get a little bit of frustration is that we are pressed to do second-phase funding of SARC and the Treasurer, Mr Nixon, had to say no, because we had some problems. We moved a little bit further, sort of little bit by little bit. We had people who came in and said second-phase funding should be done, and the report of this committee last year was to the point of having certain things recommended that the Treasurer could not do. We were frustrated for that, and that is fair game, but that did not prevent the majority Liberal composition of the committee from going ahead and saying, "Listen, we believe that certain things ought to occur."

I know each of you people is in favour of second-phase funding. What is so difficult about us as a committee of the Legislature saying, "We think second-phase funding could be done"? It is up to the Treasurer and your executive council members to say, "Things aren't quite the way we want them to be, so we're not going to do what the committee recommends." It is not our job to do the executive council's business, and I know all of you are in favour of second-phase funding for SARC, so why do we not say it? It is not asking much.

Mr Christopherson: And I have said that we will take a look at what you are saying and we will get back to you. We are not giving a definitive answer, yes or no, in terms of the arguments you are making, Murray.

Mr Elston: Yes. Okay.

Mr Phillips: We use the throne speech and the Agenda for People as kind of the blueprint that we assume the province has to fund one way or the other. In the throne speech, it does say, "We pledge to continue the reform of the Ontario social assistance system." We are using that—I am repeating myself—as the blueprint that somehow or other this is what the government is going to do, and the finances of the province are going to have to accommodate it. That is all.

The Chair: Can we move along?

Mr Christopherson: Next: "The government should consider that income adequacy"—pardon me, that is the one we were going to take a look at also. "The government should consider funding as a pilot project the Ontario SARC Network—Corporate Strategies for a period of two years."

Mr Elston: The presentation, obviously, was highly persuasive, but it seems to me—I raised this informally before the Chair came in—that when you have choices to make with respect to funding, and your choices are providing assistance at various levels of adequacy and you are also asked to develop or to give money to the Ontario Social Assistance Review Committee Network—Corporate Strategies, as you are all in favour of SARC anyway, why do you want this group outside of government forging ahead to spend government money when it could be applied to the STEP program or it could be applied some place else? Is this so integral to the government's planning that you would recommend that the Treasurer fund this particular item ahead of all other activities?

Again, I am sorry I did not hear the persuasiveness of their argument. It may be that it was so persuasive, but remember you have a lot of places where you are not going to move, and I am not sure that I, as one committee member, would endorse the particular funding of this item ahead of everything else.

Mr Christopherson: Okay. We will look at it.

Mrs Sullivan: So are you prepared to yank that?

Mr Christopherson: No. We are going to take a look at it. You have raised some interesting points and we will consider them.

Mr Elston: I understood it was privately funded before, and if it was privately funded before you do not necessarily want to replace that funding source.

Mr Christopherson: Next on the sheet: "The committee was impressed by the comprehensive nature of the submissions made on behalf of the disabled community. Support for the recommendations made by these groups is very strong."

"The recommendations made by the committee are as follows:

"Social assistance reforms should continue. Unless changes are made to the principles underlying the system, there will continue to be dramatic cost increases without corresponding benefits in the lives of individuals with liabilities.

"The government should consider extending the assistive devices program."

Mr Elston: On that point, just because there is a committee already in existence, it formally exists inside the assistive devices branch in the Ministry of Health and actually has members of the advocacy community involved in it as well. They are doing that actively now and have been, over the past—well, for as long as I have been involved with it. I think they started in the days of the Conservatives when the assistive devices program was first funded.

Asking the government to consider extending is not very effective because each budget year the Minister of Health will come forward asking for more dollars in that regard. "Should consider extending" is not very persuasive to me, when they are already doing it. If there was no committee even looking at it and there was no possibility of extending, I would say fine, this is a good first step. But I know it is ongoing all the time because it is an existing program, has a history now and in fact I am sure—

Mr Christopherson: What would you prefer to say?

Mr Elston: I think if you were suggesting something as a committee and you found that there was a deficit of funding in a particular area of assistive devices, you might recommend, for instance, that the Treasurer consider funding X programs in which there was something that was a real problem in the community.

If, for instance, it was a staged program and you found that item A was only going to be available in seven years at the current rate of phasing or whatever, you might recommend that item A be funded immediately or be considered for funding this year out of phase or out of sync from what had been planned. That has to be very specific in these ones because you are not talking solely programs that are the responsibility of the Treasurer, but it is basically generated through requests for more funding from the ministry itself and he is not going to generate a request from a ministry on his own although he might be sympathetic if it generated that request. Do you understand what I mean?

Mr Christopherson: Oh, I hear what you are saying, yes. I understand fully.

Ms M. Ward: A question I would have is, are the appeals generally successful from the Ministry of Health for the funding?

Mr Elston: Yes, they have been progressively. I was there when we started out a fairly detailed phasing program. The phases tend to get extended now and again, but there have been progressive extensions over a period of years in line with what had been established as, in my day, a much shorter time frame but which has generally expanded. What the last one was I do not know. I think hearing devices were last added, and I could be out of time now, but they took longer to get in the field but they came.

If there were some places that you felt we should be adding an assistive device coverage that is not now in, would be more aggressive and probably more to the point for recommending to the Treasurer.

Mrs Sullivan: Just on the same point, I have a problem with this entire section. I will go back to some of the things that I was talking about this morning. The budget is the document that outlines the funding for the principles and priorities of a government within a given period of time to show how that government is going to carry its mandate forward. One of the things that I am concerned about with the recommendations that are coming forward is that they are very nebulous. They do not put the time frame or the priority that is being evidenced in other documentation that has come forward, whether it is the throne speech or the Agenda for People or whatever. The urgency that has been addressed in some of those other documents is not addressed here in any kind of a selective way.

We are not the Treasurer; this committee is not the Treasurer. The Treasurer can see from this committee the best advice that is coming forward relating to the implementation of the principles and ideology that have been expressed in other documents. Indeed there may be an objection from the opposition to the funding of those principles and ideology. That is something that the opposition has the freedom to do. But if we can come to terms with certain of those priorities and funding issues, then let's come to terms with them.

What I see here as I look at this section on the disabled is something that is really problematic, because when we look at the kinds of groups and agencies that came before us in terms of presentations that were made, they were speaking of many of the issues that have been discussed in the SARC report, that have developed as a result frankly of changes as new methods of implementation of delivery programs have been identified, through changes in SARC. As new issues have been identified, they were clearly presented before us.

So when I look at "The government should consider extending the assistive devices programs," that was not what we heard. It is not where I had the sense that there was a movement of committee opinion on. Extending the assistive devices program can mean anything from providing needles for diabetics to providing some of the things that were being talked about, like extending the program that included clothing for people who had to use crutches.

Murray has already talked about the committee that exists that reviews the assistive devices funding and the inclusion or exclusion of facilities that are in it and the services that are provided. But in making the recommendation, it seems to me that we should not be saying "should consider extending." We should be saying "should fund specific extension of the assistive devices programs in these areas." If those areas relate to programs that would assist the disabled to move into the employment community, those are things that were addressed that I felt that informally there was consensus on. If this thing is going work, if the committee is to have a legitimacy, it should become far more precise.

I also look down to the home care issue in the same chapter and I see the word "spouse." It springs out. I have a lot of people in my constituency who are delivering home care to the disabled and it is not the spouse only who is delivering; it may be the son, the daughter, the son-in-law. Why are we limiting through a word a recommendation for funding—remember this is a budgetary commendation that we are making—by limiting it to a spouse? If we are going to take this recommendation seriously, we have to address the family member.

You should know that in the last session of the Legislature there was a private member's bill on the floor of the Legislature—as I recall, it was defeated—on this very issue. Great debate surrounded it. I cannot remember—perhaps the clerk could see where the votes came—but there was certainly concern raised in that debate relating to the caps on the system, the policing of the system, taking advantage of the system if that home care to the disabled is in fact compensated through government. In my riding it is a problem; in lots of other ridings it is a problem.

The question is, how does government come to terms and what do we request of the Treasurer in saying: "Will you fund X? Will you fund a pilot project? Will you fund an entire program? How are you going to limit it? What is the recommendation going to be that is not going to be so road-brushed that it simply will not be touched?" I guess that is where I am coming from.

The other question in the last paragraph is, "The government should investigate the issue of overprescription of drugs to the disabled." This was a matter that was raised by a group. I concur that it is an issue but it is not a budgetary issue. It goes right back to questions relating to the direction of the health professionals in monitoring questions of prescriptive drug uses. I do not see this as a budgetary recommendation.

That is where I am coming from and I think my colleagues are coming from the same position. We want to be specific things and we will be prepared to support very specific measures when they are made specifically in relationship to the upcoming budget and when the recommendation relates to funding decisions that the Treasurer is going to have to come to terms with. Budgets are choices.

The Chair: Is there any comment? How are we proceeding?

Mr Christopherson: I think the last thing we touched on was assistive devices, and there was concern surrounding "should consider extending" and points raised there. I think that is where we left off.

Next: "While funding is an important issue, there may be cost savings if the possibilities for saving money without hurting individuals are explored. Disabled consumers could be consulted in a more meaningful fashion than the ministries of Health and Community and Social Services have done up to now."

Mr Elston: You know, of course, that is a bit of a partisan shot at the costs. You may not have thought of it in that sense, but that is what that is. We are the party that was in charge of Health and Community and Social Services. We did a fair bit of consulting, but that says, "No, you didn't do anything that was real," and I regret that. It may have been a bit of a slip, but I regret that I certainly am not able to join with you in supporting that. That is enough, of course, for us not to sign the report.

Mr Christopherson: I think that probably was part of Mr Stockwell's submission to us that came in late last night. No, I hear what you are saying and we will certainly take a serious look at that.

You raise an interesting point, though, one that I might just expand on. Let me just highlight this. When you talked about signing the document—and again we have done the usual things and researched this and talked to people and checked the previous documents, etc, and I am just going to lay it out—as I understand it, what will probably happen, and I truly ask you to clarify it for me if I am wrong, is that where there can be agreement by all the parties, it is so noted, recognizing the fact that, without the Tories here at all, that may be impossible, regardless of what your caucus and our caucus might agree on.

Other than that, the report itself, in a majority government situation, is usually not supported by the opposition parties and dissenting opinions and dissenting recommendations are part and parcel of the overall report. So please clarify that for me. When you talk about, "That may be enough for us not to sign," is it your intention?

Mr Elston: No, I basically said, "Listen, if that was in there, I certainly would not endorse it." It goes that far and it may have been more of a figure of speech. I understand how those reports are made and the fact that the chairman will present on behalf of the committee the result of it. But I just said, with respect to that, that you cannot reasonably—

Mr Christopherson: No, I hear that. I was getting to the signing of that in itself.

The Chair: Given that we have a lack of representation from the Conservative Party here, it looks as if, unless that changes, there will be no unanimous consent on anything.

Mr Christopherson: We are cognizant of that too. We want to be as fair as possible and make these things as comfortable for everybody as possible, but it really, really hinders us as the majority vote on committee when one of the parties has decided not to participate at this point for reasons it considers justified. I think that is part of the reality that you see as well as we do.

Moving on then to the next point, there was already a comment from Mrs Sullivan, but I will read it again to enter it into the record:

"In many families, a non-disabled spouse acts as both a care giver and a wage earner. A rate increase to lessen the strain on these families should be considered, if only because of the enormous costs spared the health care and social services system by the unpaid efforts of such couples."

There was a point made as to why it is just the spouse. That is one comment that I have heard and made note of.

Mr Elston: Perhaps what we could do is just change it quite quickly and say, "Many family members act as both the care giver and the wage earner for disabled family members." That clarifies it quite quickly, I think, and it probably covers most everything.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, that is fine.

Mr Elston: It is a minor change in terms of the words, but an important one.

Mr Christopherson: We will not get into the legal aspect of what is a family member. We will just leave it at that.

Mr Elston: I think it is fairly wide.

Mr Christopherson: I only know that it is an interesting point because of the unrelated family members bylaw and what happens at the local level, etc.

Anyway, next point: "The government should investigate the issue of overprescription of drugs for the disabled." The point from Mrs Sullivan has already been that her thought is that that is not a budgetary issue and I have made note of that. We will take a look at it.

Next:

"The social impact of housing on the people of Ontario is disturbing to the committee. It is the committee's request that housing be made a priority for the new government.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"Housing policies and housing supply programs must be addressed from the perspective that housing is a right.

"Beginning in the 1991-92 fiscal year, the government should budget for a non-profit housing program to succeed the Homes Now program that would be the start of a continuing non-profit housing initiative.

"Ownership housing developed on government lands must initially be affordable and measures should be taken to safeguard the long-term affordability of such housing.

"The government should consider that increased non-profit housing allocations will generate significant employment in the manufacturing and construction trades sectors. Moreover, building during a downturn will result in a larger number of units being constructed since costs are lower.

"Antidiscriminatory policy should be mandatory for the receipt of funds for non-profit housing projects. Affirmative action policy should be introduced to meet the housing needs of 'disadvantaged' people."

New paragraph: "The committee is in full support of assisting newcomers in their—

Mr Elston: In relation to the housing section, I raised the issues around—actually it is a point close to Mrs Sullivan's, but my point this morning was that when you take a look at all the series of recommendations that were brought forward in our list in this document prepared on 4 February or 5 February, there was a series of pages of fairly specific items that talk about, for instance, in one case, the 20,000 non-profit housing units which of course jibes with An Agenda for People.

Then there are other programs—Let's Build Ontario is one I mentioned this morning—and perhaps we should be talking about specific items that talk about areas where there were opportunities in the housing area to affect more than just the supply of housing. For instance, it also affects the supply of jobs. My sense would be that if there is an advantage in our recommending anything on housing, we should try not only to advantage the supply of housing but also the supply of jobs and work for people in the province.

Mr Christopherson: I think that is there, Murray.

Mr Elston: You think it is here?

Mr Christopherson: I believe that is in the second last point: "The government should consider increased"

Mr Elston: Okay. I realize that it says something generally, but I just said, "Should we not consider some of the specific program recommendations that have come forward to us rather than just generally saying housing will provide employment?" I was just paraphrasing what I said this morning and not listening to what you had read as part of that.

There are so many recommendations. Can we stop the presentation to the Treasurer on the basis of three or four general observations? I guess that is really what I am suggesting. Is there not any specific recommendation that was brought forward to the committee that would merit interest from us? Because there is a lot of—

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at that.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to go back to the same discussion, I suppose, that we had on the housing issues this morning, relating to what it seems to me is a fairly wide approach to the question of the provision of affordable housing, given inclusions in the throne speech, in ministerial statements and in the Agenda for People which included very specific commitments to the construction of 20,000 non-profit housing units a year, to 10.5% mortgages, to $1.4 billion in mortgage funds available at the government's long-term cost of borrowing. None of these recommendations, platforms, commitments, have been addressed in the material that we see before us from the government caucus.

Once again I see a lack of specific recommendations relating to the budget year that this committee should be putting before the Treasurer. It is the Treasurer's choice to determine whether or not the 20,000 units will be part of his budgetary program, but once again the budget document and the integrity of the budget document relate to the commitments that have been made. We do not see that kind of very specific recommendation included here in the recommendations of the government caucus.

Mr Christopherson: Next paragraph.

Mrs Sullivan: Could I just ask, are the government caucus and the parliamentary assistant prepared to come back with more of a specific recommendation?

Mr Christopherson: We are prepared to consider very seriously what you have said, and we will caucus on it so that all our members, as you would do, will have a chance to have some input into any changes that we might agree should be made. I think that really is fair. It is certainly sincere, and it is the only thing that I can do right now as our spokesperson without having a chance to go back to my colleagues. I am making notes; so are my colleagues. We are listening very carefully to what you are saying and will consider it and get back to you with a response.

Mr Phillips: On a slightly different matter, I assume that we will be dealing with infrastructure under another heading somewhere—"Construction" or—because I think a lot of housing people said infrastructure is related to housing. I assume that will come in another package of recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: We have more recommendations coming, so anything here does not mean that it is not being included. It just means we may not have that exact wording hammered out yet.

Mr Phillips: Fine. I just do not want to lose the opportunity because I think that was—so it will be dealt with back under "Construction" or—

Mr Christopherson: I cannot specifically tell you something will or will not appear later, except to say to you that we have still got a fair distance to go, yes, and another document to present to you.

Mr Phillips: Okay, because that was a big part of the speech from the throne and the—

Mr Christopherson: Next paragraph: "The committee is in full support of assisting newcomers in their efforts to integrate into the community. After all"—we had a wording change there that does not show—"much of the history of this country"—perhaps I could ask the Liberal caucus to note that. It is "much of the history."

Mr B. Ward: I do not think they heard.

Mr Christopherson: I am assuming they are hanging on our every word, as we are theirs.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The government of Ontario should re-examine its funding on settlement and language training services with an attempt at enhancing service.

"The government of Ontario should actively pursue an agreement with Ottawa to ensure that an adequate range of settlement services and language training is provided to newcomers to the province.

"As the province renegotiates the Ontario agreement on training, efforts should be made to explicitly advance the province's multicultural strategy. In addition, the agreement should recognize and enhance the role of non-profit community-based organizations in the face of continuing privatization.

"The committee was moved by the presentations made on behalf of interval and transition houses. The crisis faced on a daily basis by these groups must be addressed immediately. To avoid action would mean jeopardizing the safety and wellbeing of women in this province.

"The committee recommends that:

"The funding formula for interval and transition houses should be reviewed with an attempt to institute block funding.

"The committee was impressed by the presenters' attempts to deal with the issue of the growing costs of the provincial health care budget. The committee agrees that the competing demands on the health care budget call for more innovative and accountable management.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The government should increase its support to community-based models of health care service delivery.

"The government should initiate community discussion around the limitations of health care spending, such that direction is provided to politicians, health care professionals and other public decision-makers.

"The government should consider fairer compensation to nurses a priority.

"Some form of local project stimulation and support is needed in Ontario—this fund could be administered through a coalition of partners and advisers in conjunction with the provincial government, or by a coalition—a healthy communities network.

"The government should examine the role and benefits of the pharmaceutical industry in terms of its overall industrial strategy. It has a great deal to offer in terms of enhanced manufacturing ability, augmented R and D presence and international competitiveness."

Mr Phillips: It is more in the revised body of the paper that I am interested. The reason I raise it now is that I still have some concerns about the numbers that I would still like the staff to investigate. There is so much paper here; it is driving me nuts.

It started with the 55% of the Health budget, and I know I have—it is page 23 of Revision 1. I am not sure you want to get into the text of the document today, but I just thought we should use the time between now and tomorrow to get the numbers. This is "Health," Revision 1, page 23 at the top. These are the Ministry of Treasury and Economics numbers. For 1989-90 it shows hospitals at 43% and this document shows 55%.

Ms Anderson: I took the numbers from Dr Barkin's presentation where he had 55%. I can see how we can reconcile that to the—

Mr Phillips: Will you? I would like to know that. In the document, it says, "There was general agreement among presenters that the health care system did not require a greater proportion of the provincial budget." I am not sure I heard that. Hospitals said they needed more money. Nurses said they needed more money.

The Chair: No, the nurses said they did not need any more money.

Mr Phillips: The nurses: I guess that is the other thing. I think the nurses said that their proportion of the budget was 25% and the hospitals said it was 40%. Can we go to the authority on this, the Ministry of Health, by tomorrow and get the right number? It seems really unusual to me to have two parties bargaining over billions of dollars and not knowing within 15% who is right. It is a recipe for conflict.

The reason I raise all this is because there is—not in the recommendations—an implication that there is lots of money in Health, that it is just redistributing it. So far I have talked to every participant in it. They may say it is redistributing it, but they need more and somebody else needs less. It is a vicious circle that one goes in and in the end I think you are going to find that everybody needs more, everybody wants more.

I would like for tomorrow a reconciliation from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics that says hospitals are 43% and the Ministry of Health that says hospitals are 55%. Who is right would be interesting.

Second, the Ontario Hospital Association says hospital nurses are, when you include fringe and salary, I think they said 40% of the budget and the Ontario Nurses' Association said 25% of the budget. That is important, at least to me, because of the preamble.

Mr Christopherson: Was there not a gap? They talked about $3 billion or $4 billion, a huge dollar figure that they said was really—

The Chair: And the numbers: They also cast aspersions on the number of people who the OHA says worked in the hospitals in the different categories of nursing and support staff, and they wondered where the—it was somewhere in the neighbourhood—the OHA said there was X number of people working and the nurses came back and said that is not possible.

Mr Phillips: I think, for this committee's sake, it would be very good to know what is the reality there.

The Chair: I will try my best to have those numbers for you tomorrow.

Mr Phillips: Remember I said, "Can we get the information that was promised to the committee?" The Ministry of Health said they could send us their estimates. Remember that? "We are working on it." The Hansard will show that.

Second, we had the questions of Treasury on the very first day and it said it would provide the answers to them. We are now 25 hours away from a final report, and I would really appreciate, personally, those data for tomorrow.

The Chair: We will continue to try to get it. It is an ongoing process with us. We are trying to get the information in. I would like to guarantee success. We will do our best.

Mr Christopherson: We are supportive of that. I would just say that we would offer our support for the Chair that we really can get that information.

Mr Phillips: Does it not strike all of us as odd that the biggest single item on our budget is 34%, and we have one part of the government saying we have 55% and another part in this graph saying 43%?

Mr Christopherson: There are a lot of strange things you find when you get in the driver's seat.

The Chair: Remember, we are new here and we are finding a lot of things strange.

Mr Christopherson: The next paragraph:

"The committee is very concerned about the continuing problems facing the agricultural sector. The high interest rate policy of the federal government, combined with consistently low commodity prices throughout the 1980s, has forced more farmers out of business and placed an added burden on those who have managed to survive. The current situation provides little incentive for young farm and is undermining the fabric of rural communities.

"The committee would like to stress the significant relationship between the $40-billion-a-year agricultural industry and the health of Ontario's economy as a whole.

"Therefore, the committee recommends:

"The government should fully understand that interest rate assistance is vital to farmers. The OFFIRR model provides a good starting point for a detailed discussion of design of a financial assistance program.

"In the absence of core funding from the federal government and in the light of assistance programs instituted by other provinces, Ontario should explore a farm credit policy that ensures equitable access to affordable credit.

"The government should explore joint initiatives with the Farm Credit Corporation, provided that the federal government is prepared to make a financial commitment.

Mr Elston: You just talked yourself out of that one.

The Chair: Would you explain?

Mr Elston: Farm Credit has become the next thing another chartered bank. Most people are just right out of business in terms of helping farmers the way they used to and they now ask for application fees virtually.

The Chair: Farm Credit?

Mr Elston: Farm Credit, the federals really in a way did not do very much work on the farm credit end of things. They have a structure now that really has strayed a long way away from helping the farm owner who used to go to them as a last resort. They are virtually a chartered bank in a lot their lending practices. That is probably been a little bit harsh, but I tend to see that. I tend to feel that way about it when I see the change in mandate of Farm Credit.

"Provided that the federal government is prepared to make a financial commitment." It is a nowhere recommendation because you know darn well that the feds are on that path where they are just slashing everything. They are prepared to give up a whole series of farm support programs and farm organizational programs, including supply management, if it does them a budgetary service to do so. That is why they are bending over backwards to give away certain things in the GATT discussions if they can.

I am concerned. I guess you can put it in. It is not going to hurt to put it in, but it is not going to help anybody as soon as you put "provided that the federal government is prepared to make a financial commitment" because it is not. I think it is as simple as that.

Mr B. Ward: This federal government.

Mr Elston: Yes, the current federal government. You are not going to see a new one for another couple of years anyway, and I know what your preference would be, but that is not necessarily a sure thing these days. It may be that the federal authorities, in any event, will not be able to do stuff.

Mrs Sullivan: That is also why the Ontario Federation of Agriculture recommendations were shaped the way they were, because it understands the way the Farm Credit work and is looking for specific farm credit initiatives in Ontario, as are being done in the Saskatchewan and Alberta models, but it is looking for very specific commitments and funding initiatives in Ontario for Ontario. They were not looking for exploring joint initiatives related to the FCC.

Before we leave agriculture, I also have some concerns once again relating to the specific nature of the recommendation relating to the Ontario family farm interest rate reduction program. It seems to me that the committee ought to be recommending that an interest rate reduction program be included in the next budget. That is where our commendation should be. We have heard indications relating to the targeted nature, and those are decisions that the Treasury can make, but the OFFIRR model provided a good starting point for discussion. The crisis is now. There is an urgency on this issue. The interest rate problem is a symptom of the longer term farm credit problem. This is a matter that has to be looked at with some urgency in the next budget.

Mr Elston: Having said that about agriculture, can I pop back, just for a moment, to the health care section?

As I was rereading your second bullet point, "The government should initiate community discussion around the limitations of health care spending," I got the sense all of a sudden, as I read that for about the third or so time, that somehow it starts to make me think about rationing or things like that. I do not suspect that is what you intended, but if I read or misread that incorrectly myself, knowing where your organization, your party is on this, that sounds like a discussion towards saying only so much is going to be available for people. I think that should be clarified.

I am not prepared to go into a rationing discussion, nor am I prepared to allow the officials at Treasury who might be to get into discussion around that, to think that this committee is suggesting rationing of health care should begin.

Mr Christopherson: No, I think I can say—

Mr Elston: Can you work on something that might be just a little bit clearer to make sure we get taken away from that misinterpretation?

Mr Christopherson: Along what lines?

Mr B. Ward: For clarification, could you define what you are interpreting as rationing?

Mr Elston: As soon as you start saying "community discussion around limitations of health care spending," some people have talked about implementing, and in fact they have implemented, some user fees. They talk about implementing user fees in Quebec as an effective way of limiting people's access to a health care dollar. I do not want—at least I would not support the recommendation that we start talking about those sorts of measures. I will tell you, there are enough people who could read this that they would make it look like this committee was telling the Treasury, "You should look into having means by which people's access to the health dollar is restricted."

Mr B. Ward: By rationing, you are not saying that we only have so much but that we implement user fees? Is that what your party—

Mr Elston: That is just a variation on a theme of restricting people's access to health care. Right? People will make the argument—a doctor, for instance, came to me not that long ago, again knowing my past history and everything, saying, "Well, if you just allowed us to charge those people $5 or $10 every time they came to us, that would keep them away from the office." Of course, if the government ever did that, then people would blame us for any problem if there was somebody who did not get enough health care, I think understandably.

This to me is so close to the subtle types of messages I got in letters from people during the extra-billing debate that I am perhaps more sensitive to the writing of this than others might be, but this could be seen to be a clear signal that the government wants to put an end to free or universal access to health care, and I do not think that is the message you want in this; certainly not one that I would endorse.

The Chair: Evelyn was very clear that that is not—

Mr Elston: I know.

Mr Christopherson: I think we are open to ensuring that you have the comfort level you are looking for, because I would not want you not to sign the document.

The Chair: Have you got a wording that you would like to see?

Mr Elston: If I understood exactly what you are trying to tell me here in this sentence, that the government could initiate community discussions around limitations of health care spending—what do you mean there? Are you capping it? Are you just saying each person can have access up to a certain level or do they have to pay a fee? I know that you probably do not mean those, but what is it that you are trying to tell me?

Mr Hansen: On page 23, the second paragraph, I think this is where actually we have come up with this particular recommendation.

"There was general agreement among presenters that the health care system did not require a greater proportion of the provincial budget but that the money should be managed differently. The Ministry of Health indicated that they had instituted new steps for improved management of health care within the ministry and that better management practices are being instituted in the hospitals with, for example, a shift from in-hospital care to more day surgery."

Mr Elston: Of course, that has been happening over the last seven or eight years, not just with us. But that talks about proportion. Remember, when people talk about proportions, we are talking about maybe 34% of the budget as opposed to getting 40% of the budget or something, but they do not talk about the fact that it is limited to the current level. I think $15.5 billion is this current fiscal year's spending on health care. They do not mean to tell you, however, that they want this stopped at $15.5 billion from now on.

It is just the word "limitation." I read it in the more sensitive fashion than you do because when we were discussing the extra-billing issue, when we were going out and dealing with all of the dissenters—and there were a number of them—around that issue, every word that you used had a whole series of connotations that could get, in those days, me in trouble.

The Chair: Could you live with something or could the committee live with something—

Mr Hansen: Is there a word there you want in?

The Chair: —like “Government should initiate community discussions around the maximization of—”

Mr B. Ward: We will take it under advisement and talk about it tonight. We understand where Mr Elston is coming from.

Mr Phillips: Go back to point 3 on page 23. I think I would want to see the evidence of that. I think the Ministry of Health, when it came in, could not tell us what it wanted, so I do not think it would necessarily agree with that. The OHA would not agree with it. The doctors would not agree with it.

Mr Elston: This is the greater proportion.

Mr Phillips: Yes, with the statement “There was general agreement among presenters.” The nurses I think suggested it, but until I get some idea of the numbers—I just think it is on that basis, as you are pointing out, that you put that in, ie, that, “Well, money is not the question; it is divvying it up properly”—I am having real difficulty in buying in to that.

As I say, if you remember when the minister was here, I was asking, “How much money do we need to accomplish your objectives?” “Well, we are working on that. We will try to give you estimates” and what not. So I think Mr Elston has his finger on a key issue. If, by agreeing to that wording, we are agreeing that the money is fine, it is just the allocation, I think we are going to be fooling ourselves, personally.

One other way out is, there is the Premier’s Council on about three things—health, wellbeing and social stuff—and whether it should not be that this encourages that council to continue its discussions around the most effective use of the health care dollar, because that is really its mandate, I think, what is right there. So maybe under advisement you would consider that.

I think what the government members are looking for is some way to have broad consultation on how to allocate, how the dollars will be spent. I am just saying you have that vehicle in place now. It used to be called the Premier’s Council on Health. It is now the Premier’s Council on Health and a couple of other things. Rather than initiate community discussion around the limitation of the health care spending, it should continue its dialogue using the vehicle of “to ensure that health care spending”—I do not like the word “limitation” because it assumes that, as I said before, there is enough money in the system already to meet the goals, and I think you are going to find—I will be very surprised if you do not find—in the next six months that is not going to be the case. To accomplish the goals you want, it is going to be very difficult, if not impossible, to keep it at the 34% of your budget.

The Chair: So there are basically these two areas that we should revisit.

Mr Christopherson: I am sorry, I had to step out just a moment. The areas to be revisited are in the draft in the proposals we are going to make.

Mr Elston: Both.

The Chair: Both, page 23, second paragraph, and second point.

Mr Christopherson: And the second bullet also is still unclear. Maybe my colleagues are a little confused now, but I thought it was fairly straightforward. And was the way it was left? Okay.

Mr Elston: You are not as concerned then as I am about the message be that we are suggesting a limit or a cap on health care spending? I mean, I am. I think maybe if you take it under advisement you can reconsider what we are suggesting because that certainly is a long way away from the position of your party. You have been a long time in favour of making sure that universal health care exists, and if you are concerned about a discussion in the community about limiting health care spending, that is a remarkable change of status for your organization.

Mr Christopherson: I think any expression of disapproval in the province along the lines of the increasing health care costs is not to be considered surprising by anyone. I did not see this, in my mind, as being any kind of a battle, but we have heard what you have said and we will take a look at it. If it needs to be clarified, we will.

Mr Elston: My experience, though, is that there are organizations that will say that this government’s stance to look at limiting health care spending is a flag which will sound a rallying cry for a lot of people, when I do not think that is where you are at, or at least I would be doggedly surprised if that is where you are at.

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at it.

Mr Elston: Sometimes when you get to Treasury and you start talking the language that is talked internally in the Treasury organization, you quickly become harder to guess to the words. But the community advocates in particular positions see those words and they hear them and they respond to them, and I do not think you need to struggle at the moment with everything else happening.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, let’s be clear. There are many of us, although we are green provincial politicians who have spent a good number of years on city and regional councils and understand the responsibility of passing progressive legislation and still working with Treasury people in trying to have good budgets and be able to give the people, so I am not quite as frightened about our view as you are.

Mr Elston: That is not what I was frightened about. Your virtue is the least of my worries. You look after your virtue; I will look after mine. It is just that I do not want this document to say something that is a long way away from where you know your organization is.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate truly your concern for ensuring that we do not send out mixed messages.

The Chair: I think the last page here, where we—

Mr Christopherson: I think we have completed this document, as I understand it, because the last thing I have seen is a number of notes I took after listening to Mrs Sullivan. So what I would suggest, Mr Chair, with the time remaining, is that I think perhaps we could look at trying to tackle the draft that came back to us from the researchers.

It is our intention, I will tell the Liberal caucus, to have in place the balance of our first round of recommendations by the end of the week, when that is completed, as much of the responses to that as we have talked about today as we can have ready for the morning session, with every intention obviously of wrapping everything up by tomorrow afternoon. So if there is agreement, perhaps we could start looking at the report, having thanked the researchers for working around the clock to provide it to us.

Mrs Sullivan: Once again, I have to apologize, because I had to make a phone call to a constituent and missed discussion on the interval and transition houses. What I would like to suggest here is, once again, a firmer commendation that the 1991 budget for interval and transition houses should include block provincial funding, with implementation in the 1991 fiscal year. It captures the intent of the recommendation but makes it more specific.

The Chair: Is there any discussion on that?

Mr Christopherson: Could you repeat the exact wording so that I have it right, please?

Mrs Sullivan: The 1991 budget for interval and transition houses should include block provincial funding, with implementation in the 1991 fiscal year.

Mr Elston: Is that 1991-92?

Mrs Sullivan: That is 1991-92.

Mr Christopherson: So you have backed up to that point, is that right?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: We went by it once and I am just confirming that it was not something I missed the first time; it is something you revisited and are suggesting that change.

Mrs Sullivan: I was on the phone.

Mr Christopherson: Oh, I see. I sure hope the Tories will not come in and do that. We will be here until next Thursday.

Mr Elston: Trust me, I think they are not coming back. If it looks like they are coming back, I will stand at the door and talk to them.

Mr B. Ward: Were they here this morning?

Mr Elston: Briefly.

Mr Sutherland: We will fill you in.

Mr Christopherson: There has always been some thought that there might ultimately be two parties. I do not know if anybody thought it would be the Liberals blocking the Tories at the door, but it might be a different variation.

Mr Elston: Actually, we put that in the form of a commendation.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, the second draft, if you will, of the report itself on the pre-budget consultation process, first page: We are comfortable with that.

Mrs Sullivan: Sorry, can you just say that again? Oh, first page? You are comfortable with the whole thing?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: Is that what you are saying?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, it is.

Mr Elston: I was concerned; it may be correct that there was a lack of expression of concern from other regions of the province—that is, other than Toronto, but we did meet in Toronto—and although we had the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, which is an umbrella group—it speaks in general terms and things—we say, “It places limitations on our ability.” It is not stated as—

1530

Mr Sutherland: Strongly?

Mr Elston: —sympathetically to the other areas, I think, as I would like to see it done, because it looks as if there was a problem on those other areas’ part, if you know what I mean. If we had gone to Thunder Bay, I am sure we would have had the northwest making presentations on northwestern Ontario’s need. If we had been in eastern Ontario, there would have been a presentation more specifically from eastern Ontario, because I know those concerns are out there, and I guess I would just like them expressed that we regret that we were unable to hear more about the regional needs in the province perhaps. But I thought this pointed a finger a little bit at those people who did not bother coming to talk to us, if you know what I mean. I am sure it was not even intended that way, but that is how I read it.

Mr B. Ward: So soften that up?

Mr Elston: Yes, be a little more sympathetic to the fact that we are in Toronto.

Mrs Sullivan: Just on the same point, I too do not like that particular sentence, because one of the things that we have to recognize is that as the capital city of Ontario, a lot of the groups and associations who are the umbrella organizations representing a point of view locate here. While their physical address may be Toronto, Ontario, they will be representing people from Sarnia to Ottawa, etc.

Additionally, in the list of sectors and so on which we did not hear adequately from, the tourism sector is one that was identified in the Treasury documentation as a sector that is facing great change in this economic climate. We had one presenter from the amusement sector of that industry, and I think that tourism could also be listed as one where there were not adequate presentations to the committee to come to a judgement.

Mr Christopherson: I think the points are well taken regarding tourism. It is an important one. On the question of the greater Toronto area, I think certainly if that is the message one might get from that language, let’s change it. But let’s recognize too that we made an initial decision that we would put funding in the budget, I believe, if we so chose to travel to other parts of the province and, for whatever reason, we did not take up that option that we gave ourselves.

Mr Elston: I have no problem with the fact that we chose to sit here. Well, maybe I do and maybe I do not, but that is not the important thing. We sat here, and as a result we are not just quite as amenable to other people from other areas. Perhaps we could just take that whole section out and we could say, "The committee wishes to stress that although certain sectors and certain areas of the province were not represented at the hearings, we still continue to believe," and we can—you know, show that we are not just a Toronto-only province.

Mr Christopherson: No, I think that the emphasis should be on the fact that we did not facilitate that in some fashion.

Mr Elston: I do not know that you necessarily have to do that. I just was trying to save the ire of somebody in northwestern Ontario reading this, for instance, saying, "Boy, those people have the audacity to say we did not come and talk to them." So I am not pointing fingers here, other than just to say let's take that first sentence or that "consequently, the lack of expression" sentence out, and just say, "The committee wishes to stress that although certain sectors and certain areas of the province were not here," and so on.

Mr Christopherson: Good. We can support if the researchers want to take a look at that.

Mr Elston: Sure, exactly right because I think that is quite clear.

Mr B. Ward: Add tourism, right?

Mr Elston: And then you can add tourism, sure.

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Good idea.

Mr Hansen: One thing, the subcommittee, when we did meet—Mr Kwinter was actually your representative there.

The Chair: Mr Sterling was there for a little while.

Mr Hansen: He is not here today. But the thing is, we did discuss that on meeting in other parts of Ontario. We had an open mind that if anyone was wishing for us to meet in the north, we were willing to go there. So, it was not the point that Toronto was the only meeting point. I think that should be sort of expressed in the writings also.

Mrs Sullivan: Maybe you could just eliminate the second and third lines of that paragraph.

The Chair: We did have representation from Sault Ste Marie and from Ottawa in various groups, and Windsor, Niagara. We did have some representation, and maybe a phrase there: "While we did have some representation from areas outside of Toronto," we could just express the regret that we did not have—or something.

Mr Hansen: The other thing is that the largest population is down in this area, too, representation-wise—

Mr Elston: There are all kinds of reasons. I do not want anybody to think we are ignoring them, that is all.

The Chair: I think I understand that what we are trying to say here is that we do not want them to think that we are ignoring them because we were not there, but that we do have sympathy for their concerns and we will be looking to meliorate them or to do what we can for them. Is that good enough?

Mr Elston: On the second page, at the end of second line and going into the third, starting after "1991 will just read: "and that there will be slow, steady rate growth in"—I presume that we should either keep in "a" at the end of the second line, "a slow, steady rate growth" or we should just say "there will be slow, steady growth in 1992."

So you are going to leave the "a" in, or should we take out "rate of growth"? The fewer words the better: "There will be slow, steady growth in 1992."

The Chair: That is right. We have to pay for this the page.

Mr Elston: And by the word, when we translate it.

The Chair: Let's keep these words to a minimum.

Mr Christopherson: I think that is us for page 1.

The Chair: We are on page 2.

Mr Christopherson: And 2. Sorry, I confess to talking with my colleague about something coming up. On page 2, in the second paragraph, where it says "thus," I did not go into this in any great length, it was just reflagged by one of our caucus. "Thus, Canadian manufacturing plants had laid off workers in the early 1980s when they reduced the size of their operations, at least temporarily. In the current recession..." Does it flow? I mean, taking the other part out, adding that sentence, and then reading from the top of the paragraph, does that still flow?

Mr Elston: Take out the first sentence, too, is what you are saying, basically? Say "Canadian industry is now undergoing a restructuring process."

The Chair: I think what you started to say there was that in the recession of the early 1980s there was some downsizing of their operations, but it was more of a temporary nature, whereas the current recession is undergoing a restructuring process resulting in a greater degree of permanent job losses.

Mr Christopherson: The thrust of the three sentences is fine. It was merely, when we looked at it, did it read and flow properly and say what we wanted?

Ms M. Ward: Why not put the third sentence in place of the second sentence, just change them so that you are looking at the past and then you are going on to the current situation?

Ms Anderson: "Canadian manufacturing plants had laid off workers," then, "Canadian industry is now undergoing a restructuring process," then, "In the current recession."

The Chair: So it flows a little nicer.

Ms M. Ward: And take out "thus."

The Chair: I guess the main point there is the emphasis that this is a different kind of a recession with more permanent job losses.

Mr Elston: But if you reorder your sentences along that line, the "in the current recession" sentence also becomes a bit of a—you will have to clean it up a bit.

The Chair: I need a point of clarification, whomever has a dictionary here. I do not know if there is a word "learnt." I think it is "learned."

Mr Rampersad: "Learnt" is correct.

The Chair: It is? "Learnt." I'll be darned.

Mrs Sullivan: How many kids did you fail?

40

The Chair: Are we on the record here? If you have other graded papers, by the time you finish seeing how many of the words have been misspelled by so many students in the same way so many times—

Mr Elston: That is how you create new languages.

The Chair: I'll say. You really begin to question your own—

Mr Elston: The real reason why our system is in such a bad shape is that it—

The Chair: I never failed anybody; they did it to themselves, self-destruction.

Okay, are we happy with page 2, with "learnt"? Have we all learnt something today?

Mr B. Ward: Staff is going to clean that first part up?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: The second paragraph on page 2. Getting back to Mrs Sullivan on the request for language at the end of the new first sentence regarding "expenditure decisions" and then a suggestion from, I think, Mr Phillips—although I may be wrong there, perhaps it is your own further suggestion—that it be "expenditure and revenue decisions." We have looked at it and considered it and we can live with the fact that "expenditure decisions" would rightfully be placed there. How is that, Mr Phillips? Are you shocked? When I tell you we will consider things, Mr Elston, we consider them.

However, the only thing we did have a concern about was that in terms of including the revenue decisions, and I think you were referring to revenue expenditures forfeited, the GST—we do not have a problem with that. I think it is legitimate in the body of the report to express that; that is a fair comment. However, we think that also there needs to be a recognition to separate that from the recognition that there is also reduced revenue overall that had nothing to do with decisions we took as a government or that the previous government took, but is a result of the recession. We can find language that accommodates that fact, we are prepared to accommodate your fair request that "expenditure decisions" be noted.

Mr Phillips: Maybe one way of doing it is to articulate the $2.5 billion and just say it is a result of $600 million in reduced revenue because of the recession; $70 million in reduced revenue because of the GST decision—

Mr Christopherson: How much did you say?

Mr Phillips: I said $70 million. I think that is what—

Mrs Sullivan: It is $70 million in the current fiscal year.

Mr Phillips: Welfare costs, I think, are up $550 million, and then expenditure decisions of $1.2 billion.

Mr Christopherson: The problem is that I do not think it is that neat. I am not being argumentative—

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: Hold on, hear me out, please. I do not think it is quite that neat, because you would also then have to include the windfall transfer that came in from the federal government. I mean, if we are going to be using actual figures in that sentence, which was not our intent, then we have to sit down and analyse everything that happened from the time that we started making decisions as a government to date. I just do not think it would be neat enough to be able to do that.

As I said earlier, we are prepared to accept the fact that expenditure decisions should be noted, and if you want to tie in the revenue decision, fair enough. But all we are asking is that there also be a recognition that part of the problem, a large part of the problem—my words—is the fact that overall revenue is down, regardless of any decisions.

Mr Phillips: But it is just the fact—I am not arguing one way or another—that there is a $2.5-billion deficit. Revenue is down $600 million over what we estimated as a result of the recession. It is $70 million as a result of the decision you made; $550 million in welfare costs; $1.2 billion spending decisions. That is all. It is just taking the Treasurer's report and articulating what the 2.5 is; it is not one way or the other.

Mr Christopherson: Reference the Treasurer's report if you want, but to start getting into dollars—again, I am not saying what it would look like. The dollars are there, the figures are there. It is a matter of public record and your position on those is a matter of public record. But I just think that it starts to cloud up and muddle that sentence to the point where we lose the whole point.

The issue here is to show that we have a $2.5-billion deficit. It was drafted in such a way originally that you felt there was some responsibility on the part of government that ought to be noted. We are saying we agree with you. However, in fairness, also acknowledge that when you are talking about being short on revenue, it is not just our decision. In fact, that is the smallest piece. All we are saying is, can we find a way to do that? Otherwise we will just leave it stand.

Mr Phillips: I want to get on the record again. The windfall is not a windfall. The corporate taxes were down, the personal income taxes were up. That was clear, and clear that it was coming. We will never agree on that, I guess. I am relatively sensitive about it.

Mr Christopherson: Well, we have a problem.

Mr Elston: I do not think you have a problem. It was just that he was sensitive about it. That still does not prevent you from saying that revenue items—you can separate the two if you wish. I do not know how you do it cleanly, but you can—

Mr Christopherson: But that is all I asked to do. If we do it by language, we have no problem. When we start getting into dollars—it is not that it will make us look any worse or better; it is a matter of I really think it will cloud this up, so there is where we start to get into a problem.

The Chair: Mrs Sullivan has had her hand up. This debate is getting a little free-ranging. I would like to bring it back to some focus.

Mrs Sullivan: I wonder if, rather than just saying "and reduced revenues," we might want to say "and reduced tax revenues, and expenditure and revenue decisions," or be more specific and say, "reduced corporate and retail sales tax revenues"—

Mr Christopherson: Do the former again.

Mrs Sullivan: Simply "reduced tax revenues, and expenditure and revenue decisions."

Mr Christopherson: Fine, we can live with that.

Mr Phillips: In the end, I do not think there is a dispute on the facts, that is all. I am just taking the facts off the sheet. Now, you may not want me to say it here, but I will say it elsewhere.

Mr Christopherson: But that is not the point. You are misrepresenting my point when you do that. My point was exactly what we just agreed to, and the dollars you are talking about are there. There is nothing to be hidden by putting it in or taking it out. It is a matter of extending that sentence to the point where you just lose what it—because really that is just a lead sentence, to set the stage. So you can take that position, but I would continue to disagree that that was our intention in not wanting to put the dollar figures in there.

The Chair: Since we have an agreement, can we move along? Are we happy with page 3?

Mr Christopherson: One more. There seemed to be a little confusion, after the language that was removed—six sentences underneath where we were just discussing—where it says, "Rates of increase in transfer payments to the provinces have been declining."

For some reason I had it noted as a problem, but it does not appear to be now that I look at it again.

Mr B. Ward: If I may, it is just that it is "reduced rates of increase in transfer payments," in the sentence before and then we repeat it again.

Mr Christopherson: That is right, thank you. I knew I wrote that down for a purpose: "as a result of reduced rates of increase in transfer payments." That is it, because I have a line that says "start." I was going to suggest that the new sentence after the language we have just crafted would begin with the word "provincial": "Provincial governments have had to find ways" or "Provincial governments, therefore, have had to find ways of meeting the shortfall." The preceding words are redundant.

The Chair: It will save translation costs. We are making this a one-page document. Are we happy with page 3? Moving along to page 4.

Mr Christopherson: We are okay on page 4.

The Chair: Are you happy with the last sentence on page 4?

Interjections.

Mr Christopherson: We will certainly doublecheck it, but I did not have it flagged.

Mr Phillips: It would not be acting in bad faith if tomorrow we came in and have looked at some detail, because we just got this, like you—

Mr Christopherson: I think we have already said terms of our proposals, and yours when you asked for a chance to go back.

Mr Phillips: Thank you.

Mr Elston: On the page 4 stuff, I have a bit of a problem with the overall of this, because in another place—I am just looking for it quickly—there is a clause that says this is a homegrown recession. Some places I have read that, yet the homegrown part of this thing is not stated either in the first paragraph on page 4 nor in the "Causes of the Recession" thing. Maybe it comes later.

The Chair: Here it is. It is the first line on page 4: "Most forecasters agreed that the economy is in a recession that was principally homegrown."

Mr Elston: Yet we do not talk about the causes of the recession in the same way. "Numerous factors have converged to cause the downturn in economic activity including changes in the international economic and trade structures." Then we go on to talk about the American recession which makes us deeper.

The Chair: Would you feel more comfortable if it was put in there saying that the primary cause of this recession are the homegrown interest rates or whatever that—

Mr B. Ward: On the top of page 5, it begins to discuss that.

Mr Elston: I see, "responsible for the local recession." If I started reading, it just seems like I am putting that out of the way of the—

Mr B. Ward: Perhaps we should move that to after "Causes of the recession," move that paragraph word it in such a way that that has more importance than that "The onset of the American recession" kind of comes in after our recession.

Mr Elston: Maybe if that was their first paragraph and then you went on to say other factors have come together, maybe that is the way we could clear up any misunderstandings.

The Chair: Does anybody have any other comments about moving that, pro or con?

I think that might be the solution there, to take out the second paragraph on page 4 and merge part of the idea from that with the last paragraph on page 5 the second paragraph.

Ms M. Ward: Actually the idea that is in paragraph 5 is basically in that last paragraph on page 5, is it not?

The Chair: We could even leave paragraph 2 completely, I think.

Mrs Sullivan: Done.

The Chair: Why do we not take that second paragraph out? The second paragraph is basically removed.

Mrs Sullivan: Done.

Mr B. Ward: Wait a minute. It could be merged with the last paragraph on the page.

The Chair: Quite frankly, I would like to see it go completely.

Mr B. Ward: Is there consensus that we want to focus mainly on what caused our recession in Ontario and Canada and the primary cause is that it is a made-in-Canada recession?

Mr Elston: I just suggested that perhaps we could start off by saying, "While numerous factors have converged," then repeat that whole sentence and then say "circumstances peculiar to Ontario." If we bring the two of those as one sentence together with that first paragraph on page 5, we have got it all there.

Mr B. Ward: While they are doing that, perhaps they should look at—if you look at that very first paragraph on page 5, when you read it it does not flow very naturally, so you may want to punch it up or adjust it so that it flows a little more evenly.

Mrs Sullivan: Leave it all to drafters.

The Chair: Are there any other changes on page 5? I want somebody flip a page. Does that mean we are on page

Mrs Sullivan: I do not know if people want to talk about the first paragraph, but the second paragraph—I used that question as a result of a Globe article but I have since looked at the piece from Statistics Canada and in fact it does not do what the Globe said it did, so that sentence should probably come out.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr B. Ward: Which one is it?

The Chair: "Some observers, such as"—

Mrs Sullivan: "Some observers." That was an addition. In fact the material does not reach that conclusion when you see it in the original.

Mr Christopherson: Did the researchers have a chance to look at it?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: And you concur with that and you put this in anyway, or do agree that what you said is correct?

Mrs Sullivan: I said it. That was my add.

The Chair: That was the add that we included yesterday.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, I realize that, but the researchers have said they have looked at the piece also. I am just asking which is it, that they agree with Mrs Sullivan that the piece did not say that or that they agree with what they put in, that it did say that.

The Chair: We told them to put it in. They do not disagree—

Mr B. Ward: Whether they agree with it or not.

The Chair: It is for us to put in or take out.

Mr Christopherson: I do not have the luxury of having seen it, so it is difficult for me to say. I would just like an objective—

Mr Rampersad: The article in the Globe and Mail came to the conclusion that the outlook was grim. The information that was put out by Statistics Canada listed figures for November. It did not actually give a commentary as such to say that the outlook is grim. This was the conclusion of the newspaper in question.

Mr Christopherson: But is it a legitimate conclusion?

Mr Rampersad: It is a legitimate conclusion, I suppose, if you look at the whole range of figures. We were only looking at one month's figures in this case.

The Chair: I read that article and I thought that somebody had taken a tad too much licence with the numbers to be repeated here. Remember, the repetition here gives it almost, for some people, the word of gospel.

Mr Elston: So it is safer to take it out.

The Chair: Take it out. Oops, I am not supposed to make comments like that.

1600

Mr Elston: Actually, I do have a comment on the first sentence on page 6 as well: "uncertainty in Canada cannot fail to." I am not so keen on the negative sense of that. I do not know how to state it better. I would have said it yesterday if I could have, but I am not any more pleased with it today than I was yesterday.

The Chair: How about "might have"? We know that it is, but "might have" is a little mellower language.

Mr Elston: "Cannot fail" is fairly definite language.

Mr Rampersad: If you say, "In the long term, it is possible that constitutional uncertainty in Canada might have an adverse effect," you are hedging your bets twice.

Mr Elston: So you just say, "In the long term, constitutional uncertainty in Canada might have," what you suggest.

Mr Rampersad: If you add the phrase, "it is possible," you are just double-hedging your bets.

Mrs Sullivan: Is that not what we were all told in school, "Write tight"?

Interjections.

Mr Christopherson: I was not even here, neither were any of my colleagues. Shall we go down that road? I think we can live with either the changes proposed by Mr Elston in the first paragraph, or withdrawing either one. Mr Chair, we are comfortable with whatever you would like.

The Chair: Do we leave it in or take it out?

Mrs Sullivan: Leave it in.

The Chair: Then we will leave it in with the phraseology that—now the clerk is getting in on this. He said, "In the long term, constitutional uncertainty is unquantifiable."

Mr Christopherson: If it pays more over there, Todd, you should think about transferring. There is a future there for you.

The Chair: Are we happy with page 6, or where are we going?

Mr Christopherson: One thing that was brought forward by one of our caucus was, in the second-to-last paragraph, second-to-last line, the word "Canadian." In that context, should that be "Ontario"?

The Chair: Okay, the first line is "Ontario."

Mr B. Ward: Everything else is "Ontario," and all of a sudden we have "Canada."

The Chair: So "may boost output in demand in the Ontario economy"? If Ontario starts to boom again, then presumably all of Canada will. Shall we replace it with "Ontario"? Is there any problem?

Mr Christopherson: It was our suggestion that if you read it, the word really should be "Ontario," unless there is a point we are missing.

Mrs Sullivan: Leave out the modifier.

The Chair: It can just be "boost output in demand in the economy in 1992."

Mr Christopherson: You folks are really good at that.

The Chair: Okay, page 6, are we all done?

Mr Christopherson: We are, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, Mr Owens, are we okay? Shall we move to page 7? Are we happy with that?

Ms M. Ward: I had a question about that chart.

The Chair: The chart on the back of page 7.

Ms M. Ward: It says "% change unless otherwise stated" but is that true? Basically what I am saying is under "Real growth" those look like actual percentages, and the same under "Unemployment rate." That is not change in unemployment rate, is it?

The Chair: No, those look like absolute employment rates.

Ms M. Ward: Yes, that is what I thought. So I just wondered if that heading up there was true.

Mr Rampersad: We will check that.

The Chair: "Real growth" is percentage change; "CPI" looks like it should be percentage change; "Unemployment rate" looks like it is absolute; "Employment" looks like a change and "Retail sales" looks like a change. The rest are absolutes.

The Chair: "Partnerships," page 8.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, could I ask, in terms of timing, what we are looking at today? The usual hours for the committee were set to be 10 to 12, 2 to 4. We extended it to make time for submissions so that nobody got left off. Our caucus has a fair bit of work ahead of us still to give you what we committed to tomorrow, which is our last day.

However, I do not want to leave the impression that we are trying to cut short committee time or the opposition's opportunity to raise or discuss anything. I put that forward, Mr Chair, only to suggest that the more time we have today to caucus, the more finalized work we can present to you tomorrow, recognizing that we also have a caucus meeting scheduled for noon tomorrow, so we are utilizing every minute that we can.

Mr Elston: We can take another look at the draft here ourselves and we can go and talk about that and you can deal with your material and we can be prepared perhaps have some specific suggestions, if we have any, that could entertain.

Mr Christopherson: We have completed the work on this. There are a couple of things, but very minor. Technically, we are okay with what is here, with a few exceptions.

Mr Elston: You can go away and do your recommendations and then bring them back. We can go away and do the remaining pages.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, and tomorrow what we do is we will present to you in the morning the balance of our recommendations.

The Chair: Before we go, the writing team would like to have some indication as to what they should do with the recommendations that have already been discussed. I realize there are some with questions. Does the committee want the writing team to go back with the first draft and include the recommendations that have been done? Or bring back something tomorrow, including those that were looked at?

Mr B. Ward: Including ones that we have consensus on?

Mr Elston: I think that is almost necessary, if you are going to get into things—

The Chair: I think they should include the ones that we do not have consensus on and that we will see it with in the context of the document and consensus can be arrived at tomorrow. Recognizing that this document is incomplete and that nobody has really given the final word on it, we would like to give them instructions to include what we have here that is removing only what has been concretely decided. Is that okay?

Mr B. Ward: Just to clarify, what are they taking out of the recommendations? The ones that we have reached consensus on and putting in the outstanding items? Or are you giving them direction to do?

Ms Anderson: I would say putting in almost all the ones that are on your list here, because I am not sure how many of them have actually reached agreement.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, so put all the recommendations in?

Ms Anderson: Then they can be removed tomorrow when we will change as necessary, but at least they will be in then.

Mr Rampersad: It is also useful for the typing staff to have this in in batches. Otherwise they will end up with vast amounts to be done.

The Chair: Also, the last draft is easier to present than the first one because you push the button and present it. Do I have a motion to adjourn and to reconvene at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr Christopherson: So moved.

The committee adjourned at 1609.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 7 February 1991

The committee met at 1011 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair: We have a lot of work to do today. Can we begin?

Mr Sterling: Mr Chairman, before we begin proceeding through the report, could you report to the committee on whether the Treasurer has given you any further indication of whether he is going to provide those revenue projections?

The Chair: That request is in the Treasurer's office and I have no further information.

Mr Sterling: He has not communicated with you or the committee at this time to provide us with any more information on that?

The Chair: No.

Mr Sterling: I would just like to indicate that my party will be submitting a dissenting report to the overall report and I want to tell the committee that that will be done before the report is printed.

Mr Christopherson: On that point, Mr Chair—

Mr Elston: No, you cannot do a dissenting report.

Mr Christopherson: No?

The Chair: You mean I am going to have to write this report by myself?

Mr Elston: It is looking pretty grave.

Mr Christopherson: I met with Wildman, Cooke and Earlton and they told me how you go about this. Here is what you put in the dissent.

The Chair: Then, Mr Sterling, this afternoon we will have to set the time frame within which the report should be submitted to the committee.

Mr Christopherson: I think we had originally suggested five days and asked if that was going to be sufficient for the parties.

The Chair: I believe that Mr Stockwell informed us that it was written and ready to go three days ago.

Mr Christopherson: I am glad that everything was considered and carefully weighed.

Mr Sterling: Actually, it has not been finalized, to tell the truth. We were counting on the revenue projections to finalize it, but unfortunately the Treasurer will not bring it forward.

Mr Elston: It is not on PC letterhead yet.

Mr Sterling: So we are having to revise part of it and on other evidence.

The Chair: We have also in front of us this morning Pre-Budget Consultations Report: Revision 2, with the recommendations of the government caucus placed in. What is the will of the committee? Do we look at this or do we finish all of the recommendations and revisit this later on this afternoon? What is the will of the committee on that? How do we want to handle it?

Mr Christopherson: We are easy.

The Chair: Are you leaving the decision up to me to make?

Mr Christopherson: I am just trying to be as cooperative as possible on the last day of our discussions. That is all. We are quite flexible as to how we approach.

The Chair: From my perspective, I would like to deal with the rest of the recommendations and revisit the entire report in the afternoon with the idea of having it completed. Is that acceptable?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. We have the balance of our recommendations, which I believe have been circulated. We are prepared to discuss those. We can begin discussions. I do not know how far we will get this morning, but we can certainly begin discussions on the document that was tabled yesterday and our ensuing discussions. There is one more chunk of the package, if you will, which should not be more than two pages at most, that will be tabled first thing this afternoon, immediately after lunch. Then everything is, if you will, tabled before the committee and just remains for discussion and final approval.

The Chair: I would like to begin then with the New Democratic Party Recommendations, Part II. I think perhaps it would be good if you started.

Mr Christopherson: "The committee is in full agreement over the need to re-examine the financial relationship between the two levels of government. The municipalities, when not included in the decision-making process, are put in the difficult position of having to find the necessary funds.

"The committee, therefore, recommends that:

"The Fair Tax Commission should be directed to include examining the tax structure of municipal governments, with a view to recommending a new financial relationship with the province.

"The government should support the exploration of alternative sources of revenues and the establishment of a revenue-sharing act as potential revenue-generating mechanisms for the municipal sector.

"The province should aim to provide the Association of Municipalities of Ontario with regular updates of government priorities, as well as tentative time lines for the introduction of new programs and policy initiatives.

"Budget decisions should take into account the fact that service delivery frequently involves more than one arm of government."

The Chair: Discussion, please.

Mr Phillips: I did not see where you were, what page.

Mr Christopherson: Sorry, that is page 9, revision 1.

Mr Phillips: The thing that is missing here is any recommendation on what the Treasurer might have been looking for, which is advice on this year's budget and whether the government members were planning to respond at least to AMO's request that grants for the municipalities in one case keep pace with the inflation rather than match the increased costs. I gather not.

Mr Christopherson: I just do not recall it. Did we address that yesterday?

Mr Phillips: No, I am saying that AMO came here with those recommendations, I thought, but there are no recommendations in here, I do not think, about how the Treasurer should respond to the municipalities in this year's budget.

Mr Christopherson: No, what you see before you is what we are recommending in that section.

Mr Phillips: Is there any reason why you chose not to respond to AMO's recommendations on grants?

Mrs Sullivan: Transfer payments.

Mr Phillips: Yes, transfer payments, I should say. Pardon me.

Mr Christopherson: We felt that the recommendations contained here, particularly the first one, dealt with that whole issue. Being from a regional government, I know you could do an entire document alone on the individual specifics of where the cost-sharing arrangement is not currently working. We felt that the first one adequately covered off those specific concerns as well as others.

Mr Phillips: So when AMO says to us, "What was your recommendation on our grants?" we would say, "Well, it's the Fair Tax Commission that you look to for the answer three years from now." I am just saying that would be tough for us to—I mean, you may be able to articulate to AMO on its transfer payments for this year, but I think that would be seen as a fairly interesting shelving of its request for at least two to three years.

Mr Christopherson: Let me take your points back.

Mr Phillips: This is a good try, though.

The Chair: Do you want to clarify that? That is almost like a dangling participle. A good try in terms of referencing to what?

Mr Phillips: I am just saying the Treasurer is looking for advice on this year's budget, what should he be doing and did AMO make a good case for the unconditional grants and the conditional grants or not? When they come back to us and we say, "We sent it off to the Fair Tax Commission," they will say, "Wait a minute, we've got our property taxpayers coming up this fall"—in fact it is an election—"and what you've really done, committee, is just put us in the filing cabinet," for at least two years, I would think. That is all, and you may want to do that.

Mr Christopherson: Like yesterday and the preceding day, on the first runthrough we are taking what you have to say and we will get back to you.

Mr Phillips: Thank you.

Mrs Sullivan: I think as well, unless you have covered it somewhere else, you might want to address the issue of the timing of the announcements of transfer payments. It was raised by a number of groups and organizations. In the past, as a matter of courtesy and custom, to assist the municipalities and the school boards and the hospitals in determining their budget-setting, it has been done much earlier, in fact in early November. As a consequence, this year there have been severe problems for all the municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals or MUSH sector. It was raised by all of them, and I think that it should have been addressed.

Mr Christopherson: Just for clarification, are you referring to this year specifically or are you referring to what has been done in the past and the timing of it even then?

Mrs Sullivan: In the past the transfer announcements have been made earlier.

Mr Christopherson: Than this year?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. This year is significantly late.

Mr Christopherson: That has been acknowledged when it was announced they would be delayed and the reason why of it. I am just trying to clarify now, did you have something mentioned on that? If so, I could probably comment now. If you are talking about when it is traditionally announced, then that would be a different matter.

Mrs Sullivan: I think there should be some recommendation from the committee that the announcements ought to follow the pattern that they have followed to enable the municipalities and hospitals and schools to meet their budgeting requirements. There have been significant difficulties this year and this budget relates to the 1991 fiscal year, which will also include another transfer payment.

Mr Christopherson: The announcement this year, I understand it, was certainly not meant to change the timing of when announcements are made. It was unique this year as a result of the election, the new government, a whole host of things. So I think it might be a little difficult for us to address as a recommendation per se in this report.

If we would like to make a recommendation, however, that talks about the timing of announcements in general and that they be made at the earliest possible date to allow for the councils and boards to set their budgets, then that is, as I said, a separate matter.

Mr Elston: I just want to bring to the committee's attention, because the you may not have been able to get through the pile of material that just landed on your desk probably this morning. One of the feature pieces, I think, is because it deals specifically as well with municipalities is a letter that has come in from the city of Toronto's Mayor Art Eggleton, who is recommending that several things be done with respect to specific items.

I do not know if you can tell which pile is current. It was in the current pile of material that landed on my desk when I arrived here this morning. It is a letter dated February from Mayor Eggleton, and he has expressed some very real concerns, I think, which are extremely important when it comes particularly to his concern about environmental remediation. It also speaks about taxes and couple of other items.

While Mr Christopherson is taking back a few of the concerns that had been expressed by Gerry and Barbara to consider, I wonder if he might not want to include in consideration at least two or three of the items which I see are that are particularly large projects. The mayor, for instance, wants to continue with the Ataririri project, which is a big non-profit housing component development downtown Toronto. He talks about the change in business taxes, talks about the series of issues that we spoke out when we talked about taxes, ie, taking some of the load off the municipal property tax base and moving it into provincial funding.

Just to bring it to your attention, because I realize it is new, there is some very good and helpful material. I think everybody would recognize that Eggleton, over the course of his tenure in city hall in Toronto, has shown a pretty big interest in renewal of the downtown of the city. There has been a lot of effort put into ensuring a balance of development and maintenance of a homy atmosphere in downtown Toronto.

In fact, it is a significantly recognized city as being an inner core compared to a lot of other places. I just bring it to your attention, and you might consider the possibility of including some of Mayor Eggleton's suggestions in the recommendations as well. They are fairly specific, and I guess you could probably say yes or no fairly quickly if you reviewed his letter.

Mr Christopherson: We will be glad to consider the letter during the break. I would ask the clerk if we could get a better copy, though. This one is pretty faded. Unless one of my colleagues has a better copy, this one is pretty faded. Could we get another one, please? We will do what we can to try to respond to some of those concerns.

The Chair: This was faxed to us and apparently the original is on its way. Since it only has six blocks to go, we should have it relatively soon.

Mr Elston: They are not using the post office.

Mr Christopherson: If not, we will struggle along.

Mr Elston: I know now, just as a point of interest, a small village in my riding that is about 12 miles from Kitchikton that will get seven-day mail delivery between Kitchikton and it now. The post office has reorganized and become more efficient. They dispatch a letter from Kitchikton to Kitchener where it sits for four days before it takes it three days to get shipped that 12-mile distance.

The Chair: Is this because they have closed the post office?

Mr Elston: No, it is because they have changed their mail flow and they no longer sort all the mail in Kitchikton to be sent with the delivery person and pickup person around the area. They have to take everything back to Kitchener to sort and then send it back out. So if they are doing anything like that here, we might have to be waiting again next noon.

The Chair: Maybe we could get magnifying glasses and try to read this then.

Mr Elston: It is a little hard, but I was able to go through a bit. It is not the best, I agree, but there are some good suggestions in there just from the point of view that they fit, I think, fairly well with some of the things we have talked about here.

The Chair: Any more discussion on this section, or do we leave this pending consideration of these requests from the mayor of Toronto? Should we go on to another section?

Mr Christopherson: We are prepared to go on to other sections. Maybe now is a good time. I have a concern that I think needs to be expressed. We have been receiving reports all along, up to and including this morning, as Mr Elston has brought forward, and I am concerned that there may indeed still be things that came in this morning or other reports that—fine, if one of us, while we are sitting here, gets a moment to go through one of the submissions or we recognize the organization, but I am wondering if we could have some sense of at what point the researchers are able to capture some of the points made in submissions if indeed they are not raised by committee members.

The Chair: The advertisement indicated that this committee would accept submissions until 6 February, which means we should have them all by now. As far as being able to read through these and put information into the report is concerned, I will let Anne handle that.

Ms Anderson: The initial draft of the report only included recommendations which had come in basically till the end of the hearings, who we have heard from, so what is in the text does not at this point include a lot of information that is in the others. On a quick look through it, a lot of the additional submissions that have come in do not incorporate points which have not been raised to date, but I will check that and make sure there are not any additional points that need to be looked at.

Mr Christopherson: In fairness, we are on the last day of the hearings and I can appreciate that you have been kept very busy with the changes we have made to the existing drafts, let alone additions. I am wondering, Mr Chair, if it would not be appropriate to send an additional letter or include in the body of a letter to those submitters when we are thanking them to acknowledge that indeed it came after the submission date but that we made an effort to try and incorporate—just to express somehow in the letter that it did not come in at the same time as the other submissions so that it could not be given the time it deserved, but we did make an effort or it was at least reviewed, something to that effect; just so that if there are very important recommendations or positions that do not get addressed, there is a legitimate answer why they did not get the same consideration as others.

The Chair: Okay. Moving along.

Mr Christopherson: Next paragraph: "The committee is fully supportive of the arts community in its efforts to enhance cultural activities. In order for any community to thrive, it must have a strong artistic base.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The government should act with the conviction that the arts are an important element in the quality of life that Ontarians enjoy.

"The government should strengthen and expand the mandate of the Ontario Arts Council."

Mrs Sullivan: I hate to go back to the theme I kept raising yesterday, but I am going to have to. This document we are preparing are recommendations relating to choices for spending and for revenue generation for the next budget. The Treasurer responds either by accepting or rejecting those recommendations and by responding to them. The Ontario Arts Council came before this committee with a very specific plan, a significant change from its previous five-year plan, moving into a three-year plan, which it justified before the committee. The question before us is: Is the committee going to accept, reject or want to adjust that kind of recommendation and put that before the Treasurer?

Another area which has not been addressed and was not particularly well addressed relates to the continuation of the Ontario film investment program, which has been a significant contributor and is apparently under review. Perhaps there ought to be recommendations relating to those particular issues. The government has already spoken in a major way in relationship to the arts with the discontinuance of the opera ballet theatre. The government must clearly, then, have a point of view relating to a continuing arts policy.

If this committee is going to contribute to the decisions relating to the funding or the program strength, the recommendation should be so that the Treasurer is able to look at those recommendations and make the choice of agreeing with them or disagreeing with them and putting that choice into the budget.

"Strengthen and expand the mandate of the Ontario Arts Council." We were not asked at all to even look at the mandate of the Ontario Arts Council. We were asked to recommend funding for operations so that their programs can continue and continue to be strong. We were not asked to review the mandate, nor is that a budgetary decision.

Mr Elston: I apologize for being out. I just wanted to bring, again, to the attention of people—I thank my colleague for mentioning the Ontario film investment program. It is a specific program. I have received phone calls about it in my office. I know there has not been anything put forward here, but when you talk about a firm commitment to the arts, I have been told by several people and some through correspondence that that particular program is probably up for slashing by this government, that policy and priorities is undertaking a review of it with an eye to ending it, that there were huge amounts of investment brought in by this relatively small program, that it employed a whole series of people who were attached to organizations that provide labour to the film industry and, in fact, made it possible for the Ontario film world to exist.

While I do not think we can make a recommendation here because we have not received a presentation directly enough on the point, I think it would be a shame if I did not at least bring it to Mr Christopherson's attention that this is a component to the cultural community's wellbeing in the province. Perhaps if we cannot make a recommendation in the body or the text of this, I would hope would take back—certainly I am concerned that the government is considering taking apart the support structure of the cultural community of Ontario and that the Ontario film investment program be looked at as a component, as you have already looked at the Ontario Arts Council obviously, of a healthy cultural community.

I know I am treading on rather thin ice because I have not had a presentation, but I felt I could not just let it pass by without bringing to your attention the concern has been elicited—maybe it is just rumour, but certainly major concerns in the filming community.

Mr Hansen: In the draft summary of recommendations, there is nothing on the Ontario Arts Council at all. Did you notice that? I am looking through. I wanted to refresh my memory on that. Is there anything in there?

Mr Elston: In the draft, on the Ontario Arts Council.

Mr Hansen: In the draft of the summary of recommendations.

Mr Elston: I was not looking at the summary of recommendations.

Mr Hansen: I was trying to go back, in case there were not up here.

The Chair: Page 5, the second version. I do not know if you have that.

Mr Hansen: I have an old version.

Mrs Sullivan: Whether or not they are included in the summary, they appeared before the committee a week ago today, as I recall. I think I probably have somewhere in this pile their one-page sheet, which is a very specific monetary financial summary of the requirements of the Ontario Arts Council to move into the implementation of its new three-year program. It was a significant presentation. During the course of it, they talked about not only the necessity for the arts in terms of support for quality of life but about the economic impact of the arts, which may be words you want to include. I have it right here. The final page of their document: basically they are looking for an increase to base of $11 million.

1040

The Chair: In year one.

Mrs Sullivan: In year one, which is the budget year we are talking about.

The Chair: That plan calls for a three-year incremental increase. If I remember, the final numbers were somewhere in the neighbourhood of $20 million over the three years.

Mrs Sullivan: It is $26 million. If the government caucus is looking for a reference for framing, perhaps they could suggest that the Treasurer acknowledge and commit to the three-year program with the Ontario Arts Council and budget in the current fiscal year an $11-million increase to the base.

Mr Christopherson: The information for that is where? Is it in their submission?

Mrs Sullivan: It is in the Ontario Arts Council presentation.

The Chair: It is on the last page.

Mr Christopherson: There was a chart on the submission you showed? Okay. We will take a look at it.

The Chair: Further discussion? Should we move on to the next section?

Mr Christopherson: The next paragraph leads in:

"The committee recognizes the construction sector's leading role in the economic recovery. Any efforts to stimulate economic activity must begin in this area.

"The committee, therefore, recommends that:

"The government should continue its antirecession spending on public works for maximum impact.

"The Ontario government should urge the federal government to relax its adherence to high interest rates and tight monetary policy in order to reverse the downturn in the construction sector.

"The government of Ontario should negotiate with the federal government to begin addressing the transportation needs of the north.

"The province should seek a creative financing arrangement by all levels of government to finance new infrastructure, maintenance and renewal.

"The committee would like to note that other recommendations were made under 'Social Issues—Housing.'"

Mr Phillips: I think the challenge here is going to be in the preamble it says, "Any efforts to stimulate economic activity must begin in this area" and that three of the four recommendations are long-term and therefore, I think, will look a little unusual if this is going to be a lead to work out of the recession. It talks a lot about longer-term solutions. I would think you would want to be a little firmer on accelerating this antirecession spending. Indeed we are only six to eight months from coming out of the recession, whatever we want to do to bring it out has to occur instantly.

I do not know whether you want to mention the sewer and water commission in here. I think it is planned to proceed, but that seemed to me to be another thing that can move things along quickly.

The last point is that I know it will be convenient to blame the federal government—for both parties that are in here it might be easy—but the fact is that we cannot ignore the fact that the federal government still only provides about 10% of the revenues to the province; 90% come from elsewhere. So there will be a limit to how much we can blame them—it would be good—for all the economic woes. I think it is a nice tactic. I think we have to be careful of hiding behind the federal government, because in at least two and maybe three of the four recommendations, we are looking for the federal government to help us.

My point is this: If we are looking for things to bring us out of the recession in the next few months, I do not think three of the four recommendations are timely. They may be things we ought to look at for the longer term. I would think you want to be talking about accelerating the antirecession spending, and maybe we want to look at other things. In the Agenda for People, there was $200 million a year committed to the northern fund, for which you may not have to wait for the federal government, and $100 million a year for the four-laning; that one says it will be after negotiations with the feds, but when things are as desperate as they are now, I am not sure you want to tie all your fortunes to the federal government.

Mr Elston: Bringing my past experience to bear on the item dealing with northern Ontario travel. I remember quite well that Floyd used to advocate, as did his colleagues in the last Parliament, that we should proceed and move ahead rapidly with our own initiatives and not wait for the feds, because they were not very reliable anyway. I would think that Floyd, taking this type of recommendation, would sit in his office with his feet up on his desk and laugh and say, "That's no recommendation at all," because he knows the practical nature of a recommendation. I said that yesterday about agricultural stuff and a whole series of things. It just lets the whole problem escape having to be addressed. Anyway, that is in that particular issue.

I have a bit of a concern at this moment putting a checkmark beside these recommendations as well, when you say, "The committee would like to note that other recommendations were made under 'Social Issues—Housing,'" because there were some specific things that we had asked you to consider, and if you did not accede to implementing some of the recommendations that were listed as stimuli for increased housing construction, under that section, I would make the same arguments here. If you recognize the construction industry as the prime mover of the Ontario economy out of recession, then we ought to have some very specific recommendations for the Treasurer saying that the material presented by some people with respect to housing or with respect to these particular projects was such that they would develop both employment opportunities and tax revenues for the province to help us move forward.

While I can understand you wanting to put that in, I am not sure whether you put anything else in that is going to be precise enough to be seen as a recommendation that really goes along with your preamble.

Mr Christopherson: I can respect what you are saying. It is consistent with your position yesterday that most of the ticks were tentative. I think this is one where if you are not seeing the wording that you prefer in that section, you may then have to pull back your support for that and this. I understand that. We will be aware of that when we make our final deliberations.

Mr Elston: David, you are in this a little deeper than any of the rest of us, because you are doing some consultations as well with the Treasurer in the pre-budget sense, and you are in the flow of information. Is it your intention, the NDP caucus's intention, that we have specific items for the Treasurer to consider? Yesterday we did consider funding the SARC group's corporate strategies. I know I reacted rather negatively to that one, but as an example, you chose to recommend a funding area there for discussion purposes, but in the housing and construction sectors you have chosen no particular programs as items you felt should be favoured with a particular move. I see, for instance, in the housing one, again, for yesterday, the recommendation that the 20,000 non-profit units be built.

I do not want to go through each of those items and discuss their relative merits if it is not the intention of the committee to consider recommendations along the lines of specific programs that have a fiscal outlook and that also, because they are a little more defined, would have a real effect on employment and other things. If you do not want to consider those things for inclusion, if you want to be more general in nature in this document, I will accede to that and not waste too much time. But if you want to do some specific checkmarking of programs that appear to be good ideas, I would not mind giving a couple of my ideas on the list that is in front of us.

Mr Christopherson: We have been very frank, other than some of the usual sparring that happens between different parties. By and large, we have been having good, direct discussions and we understand where we are coming from.

We do not envision a document that gets into specific programs in great detail in every area. That is not to say there are not programs, for instance, that we would highlight if we really felt they were that significant or that there was special merit to them. At this point our feeling is that a lot of those programming decisions, especially where they were not addressed specifically in submissions and specific recommendations made, are best left to the people who are in that area, both the bureaucrats and the politicians of all political stripes.

If there is a fault in this system or this approach—I am not pretending to be a newcomer who sees everything and neither do any of my colleagues—the downside seems to be that it kind of jumps all over the place. We do some macro discussions when the banks come in, the economists come in, the labour movement, the agriculture people. Although we do the macro, then there are also the interest groups who come in within not only a ministry, but within a branch and within a program, as you pointed out yesterday with the assistive devices. You were much more aware than any of us, of course, on that and even within that division, within that branch of the ministry, if you will, there are still a number of programs, and people would come in pushing that one particular program.

It is not that we were hesitant about putting our own government on the hook because we are identifying programs; it was rather that without the expertise and without the broad discussion to give us the background, were we indeed making the right recommendation or were we merely responding to an interest group that had the opportunity and the means to come in and make a presentation? That is where we are at right now.

Mr Elston: I guess in many ways, if you look at some of the collection of recommendations, it would seem to me to be fairly easy for you to go along and say, for instance, in the housing section again because I have that on my mind, that a recommendation by a group that you have received to develop 20,000 non-profit housing units ought not to need too much debate since in fact you suggest. An Agenda for people that you not only do that, but you do more, in many ways. I could not anticipate that need a whole lot of discussion because it is part of your raison d'être perhaps. Can we recommend something specific, because it really goes right along with the flow of your sort of battle document, if I can describe the Agenda for People as that.

Mr Christopherson: It is certainly becoming that. Let me say that I was responding to your general overview. I leave that to stand on its own. As we go through things you feel as a caucus that we are not being specific enough and if we have reviewed everything you have had to say then of course we have the means available that you can dissent and disagree. You asked me generally how we were approaching it so you did not waste the valuable time we have left today, and I think I have tried to be as honest and open and specific as I can.

Mr Elston: Okay.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to look at this section, reflation. In fact the section relates more to reflation policy than it does particularly to the construction industry, I just want to make some observations about some of the things that are written here.

First of all, we know that the government has committed $700 million in spending as an anti-recession package. All the way through the hearings we questioned economists and people from various sectors to confirm that this type of a recession, that would be a valuable contribution and we heard that in fact spending in capital areas was a worthwhile thing for the province to do, and there was recognition that the federal government was not in a comparable position.

As we look at what has been spent, first of all, what was promised for this current fiscal year was $41 million. I think. Now we are down to about $34 million in projects that could be sprung. That leaves about $665 million that the Treasurer has committed and he, again in his interview before us, said "should be committed." So we look at what the province spends its capital dollars, and when it spends it, and traditionally about one third of government spending is in direct spending: the province puts in 100-cent dollars and spends 100-cent dollars. The other two thirds are transfers that go out and the capital is spent in hospitals or wherever.

One of the things that I see here as being problematic in terms of making a recommendation is that there is no differentiation between where the government ought to be spending its own direct dollars, what portion of that $665 million that is there for everybody to see should be devoted to provincial spending, and what portion ought to rely on municipal or other transfer sector involvement. Given that the transfer announcements are so late, how can we expect the municipalities to budget for the increased capital during the period of time when it is going to be necessary if the whole thing is going to work as a reflationary device?

I put those things to you for your consideration. In my view the province, simply because of the lateness of the transfers, is going to have to consider a far greater proportion these expenses as direct expenditures than might otherwise have been the case, because there is just a lack of planning time at the municipal level.

The other thing is that we asked for and finally got day from Treasury—we asked on the very first day of the hearings, I want to suggest to you, and finally got day, on the last day of discussion, a discussion paper on infrastructure spending. In fact, I had particularly asked out projections relating to the greater Toronto area. It is there. A lot of the projects that are identified in this document, or at least the parameters that are included, are ready to go. Whether you want to suggest that specific areas ought to be looked at—we did not have the greater Toronto area office in to testify before us, but clearly the water and wage problems of that area have been voiced as a significant need over a period of time. I am not certain how specific you are getting. I have been pressuring for more specific discussion, but I am just making those observations.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, and they are noted.

The Chair: Whoops.

Mr Elston: Mr Chairman, the opposition is pretty helpless.

The Chair: I would like to say that the opposition has been very helpful this morning. Thank you.

Mr Christopherson: Which ones?

The Chair: They picked up my piece of paper that I had on the floor.

Mr Christopherson: Credit where credit is due. The question is who are here?

The Chair: I do not think that should go unnoticed, that the participation of the Liberal Party here is in full evidence.

Mr Phillips: Fairly good quality, too.

The Chair: And they think it is fairly good quality, too.

Mr Christopherson: Certainly attentive.

Mr Phillips: The division did not carry.

The Chair: That is for this week. The last one was for contribution last week.

Where are we at this point? Are we revisiting these in light of the comments that have been made and should we try to get through this entire document this morning, so that we can—we should move along.

Mr Christopherson: I am waiting for your direction, Mr Chairman. I am ready to go. Just give me the word.

The Chair: I just wanted to make sure that we have heard everything on this section that we want to consider and then can move along.

Mr Christopherson: We have made notes, as we have all along. We will respond to them.

00

The Chair: "Committee's Observations and Recommendations—page 12." We will let him read it into the record.

Mr Christopherson: "The committee is fully supportive of a renewed partnership between local school boards and the province. The relationship that currently exists cannot be allowed to continue.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The province attempt to forge a new era of co-operation with local school boards.

"The Fair Tax Commission should be directed to examine the issue of 60% provincial funding for education, and that the Fair Tax Commission give this issue immediate priority.

"The government should support the Ministry of Education's review of the capital grant program and should urge consultation on such key policies as:

"the funding criteria;

"the allocation process;

"flexibility/innovation;

"child care capital;

"rated capacity and true capacity."

Mr Phillips: I will try not to be too partisan here, but this is perhaps the most pathetic one in the whole document. I tell you that I am very sensitive on this because during the whole campaign, if there was one promise that was so clear-cut, at least in Metropolitan Toronto, it was the 60%.

I go back to the Ontario Teachers' Federation press release:

"The president of the 124,000-member Ontario Teachers' Federation applauded today the campaign platform of the NDP party to restore 60% provincial funding for public education. 'NDP Leader Bob Rae confirmed his party's support for education during last night's television debate....It was pathetically apparent that the other two parties do not perceive the education of Ontario's young people as a major concern.'

"The OTF board of governors has demanded that the PC and Liberal parties respond by declaring their commitment....'We challenge them to recognize their responsibility....They can best do this by promising a return to 60% funding....Provincial funding has actually dropped to 41% and local taxes have had to cope with the differential.'"

Then, in An Agenda for People:

"New Democrats propose raising the provincial share of education costs to 60% over five years, providing a solid base for better education funding and lifting some of the load of property taxes.

"The cost of the initiative over the next two years would be $1.5 billion. That's also $1.5 billion in property tax relief for Ontarians. We want to reverse the punishing increases in property taxes which hit seniors and low-income people especially hard."

There is no question in anyone's mind about what was intended: 41%—the ministry outlined what 41% is, promised 60%. It will be seen as quite a major betrayal, I think, by the property taxpayers, by the teachers and by the school boards to try to shelve this for two or three years in the Fair Tax Commission. It just will not fly; it honestly will not.

As the OSSTF said, "We call on the Treasurer to define publicly once and for all the components of the provincial share as discussed above, and to agree not to change it unilaterally. Were he to do so, he would impose a much-needed measure of integrity on our discussions."

There is no question that the teachers' group knew exactly what it was, that the trustees' groups knew, that the property tax people knew. I think we are going to have to make some commitment on moving to reduce the property tax burden in this budget and the next budget. I think is a cornerstone of the Agenda for People of the Agenda for Power, whatever it was called. I really think that of all the recommendations in here, this is the one that—there are others in here that I think you are going to have trouble with, because it will look like delaying tactics, but this one is just too transparent.

The Chair: Comments?

Mr Elston: I just had one brief one. You are going to get yourself into a little bit of trouble as a caucus here because of the problems that are occurring right now in Kingsville. You are getting some very interesting editorials when you talk about forging a new partnership with school boards. Marion has just returned from Kingsville, and the editorials down there are "jackboot tactics," "undemocratic." This is from the Windsor Star after Marion went in and said: "You four school boards sit down. You've got one hour to consider my ultimatum, and by the way, Kingsville school is now gone." Kimble, you are shaking your head. This is partisan—there is no question about it—but it is a very difficult thing for a group of people to say, "We've got to have a new partnership," when Marion is going around saying things like, "You've got an hour to decide, you trustees, what we do with that school down there."

She goes in and she says, "Oh, councils, if we give any more money, you don't have the right to use your taxing power as a council to do what you will with your democratically given opportunities for doing programs locally." I just want to bring it to the attention of the committee. I am not reading some of these things because they are highly inflammatory and will get us nowhere, but I just want to give you the context of the way some people are feeling in light of what you are talking about in terms of a new co-operative atmosphere. These people as well—

The Chair: Could I see the article?

Mr Elston: Yes, I can give this to you. This article as well, by the way, is indicating that there was a real intention by Boyd not to be around when the decision ultimately was announced in Essex; she left. Neither David Cooke nor any of your members down there, I guess, except for Pat, who is a newly elected member this term, but Dave Cooke is the veteran and none of those people were there when this occurred.

I just want you to be prepared for the idea of having a partnership when you know that style is out, and perhaps if you could deliver a wee bit of a message that if you are really setting out a new partnership type of activity in this document, then other people had better be able to live with this style of partnership that some of your ministers are delivering.

Mr Christopherson: Let me respond this way: As a new group of members in government, specifically we have been attempting to find the line among ourselves acting both in the capacity as non-partisan members of committee, but also recognizing the reality that we are members of caucuses and that that has an impact on what happens here. I think the best thing about our discussions is we do tend to acknowledge when we are trying to be non-partisan and when we are wearing the party hat, everybody has been, I think, really up front about that.

We have been trying to walk that line and we take it very seriously. This recommendation is one which all members of our caucus on this committee feel very strongly about in terms of the area of co-operation with school boards and with municipalities, and if there are incidents that you believe or the other opposition parties believe are at variance with that recommendation, I not only expect but almost know for a fact, you will point out and that you will be using this document and holding it up and saying, "This is what your committee has said, etc. I do not need to make the speech for you. You will make it many times.

On that issue, I would just say that we are comfortable enough in our capacity as members of this committee as new MPPs to make that statement and to stand behind it, and if you will, deal with anything that comes afterwards. Now I do not want to leave the impression that this is an absolute purity high road that we have taken. The report shows that we have got some realities to face, on that issue I would just say to you on that we feel very strongly about it and we are very comfortable with the clause being in there and we will deal with other things they happen.

On the 60%, we spent a fair bit of time on that issue. We knew how Mr Phillips and the entire opposition caucuses felt about this issue, and we felt that this recommendation was not a delay tactic. We felt that it was consistent with Agenda for People in the context of what the Premier has said, that we will implement what we can in the term of this government and if—the opposition tries to delay, I can quote Agenda for People from memory better than I can, but the acknowledgement was that over the next years the 60% would be reached and there was a reference to some action within two years.

I would bring to the attention of the Liberal caucus that the Treasurer went to great length to say, and repeated many times, that when he announces the Fair Tax Commission and when its mandate is approved or appointed, however that process happens, he not only hopes but expects there to be recommendations that will come in the short and medium terms and that everything will not be waiting for the end of the commission's work.

It was asked, I think by the Conservatives: Was the Fair Tax Commission merely the groundwork for the platform in our re-election platform? The Treasurer said clearly it is not, and I do not believe it is. I believe it is a significant effort on our part to make significant changes to the system and our relationship with cost-sharing bodies responsibly and as thoroughly as possible. That is why the government has gone this route and our caucus feels comfortable with that.

We have taken the step of giving this issue immediate priority. Again, we can always attach immediate priority to everything. In a political sense, that is what the opposition would like; that is certainly what our opposition did. But we feel strongly enough about this issue, in the context of the Fair Tax Commission and its work and the recognition that there are going to be short- and medium-term recommendations, that this be given the immediate priority we seek.

So we are still, as we are on everything else, listening, taking notes, and are going to consider everything that is said and get back to you about any changes we might feel uncomfortable with, but I thought that needed to be said, because we did spend a great deal of time on this and I think we feel good about what is here and are comfortable with it. But I am, on behalf of my colleagues, willing to ask that if you still have further comments we would be pleased to receive them and consider them.

Mrs Sullivan: I just had one observation about the way you have written this. Of course, we are very sensitive about this issue, as you will understand. We are looking at the Fair Tax Commission and the examination of the issue of 60% provincial funding. In fact, what we have been led to understand by the Treasurer is that the Fair Tax Commission, this tax review process, will be looking at the curbing of funds, the raising of funds and where the proportional balance should be in terms of education, not at what comes back out from the province. You may want to change the wording, because in terms of the funding of education there have been studies done relating to the cost of the definition of terms and so on; last year there was a select committee on education that talked about it at great length. You are not talking about reinventing the wheel, it seems to me; what you are talking about is looking at what is coming in rather than what is necessarily going out. So you may just want to look at what in fact you want the Fair Tax Commission to do.

Mr Christopherson: Specifically, what might you be suggesting?

Mrs Sullivan: Do you really want the Fair Tax Commission to look at the 60% question—that has been referred to death—or do you want it to look at the issue of taxation on property tax being directed to education? What do you want them to do?

Mr Christopherson: I see. You are concerned that the wording may suggest that we want them to look at whether it is fair that we should pay 60% or 70% or 30%, and more the question of just how that should be done. Is that a fair assessment of what you are suggesting?

Mr Elston: You are not going accept from the Fair Tax Commission a review to your decision to move to 60% funding, are you? You do not expect them to do that, but that is the question you have really given in this: look at the 60% issue. I do not think that is really what you really want; you want to look at the sources of funding. I think you are already committed to the 60%.

Mr Christopherson: Let us take a look at what you have pointed out.

Mr Phillips: Members may appreciate the dilemma we are in. I go back to the Agenda for People. It says there is a recession. Floyd had to have been involved in the preparation of the Agenda for People. Your senior financial person could not have avoided that. That is the big consultation. We are less than six months away. There are 13 cost recommendations in the Agenda for People. So far, you have shelved 11 of them, other than the Fair Tax Commission, or just delay. The third thing you are trying to do is to blame the feds.

From our side, we were defeated on the basis of your saying you would do these things and the dastardly Liberals would not. So I think you can expect us to say: "All right. You knew there was a recession. Floyd helped prepare the document. The recession is going to be over at the end of this year. How do you do it?" As we go through each of these, you put one thing into Floyd's filing cabinet on the Fair Tax Commission, with another one you say, "We can't do that unless the federal government co-operates," and on others you are just backing off. And then you want us to sign the document. You cannot have it all ways. That is what I am saying. That one will not go down my throat; it will not even go in my mouth, because it is such a, frankly, pathetic backing off from a major commitment.

Mr B. Ward: In your opinion.

Mr Phillips: No, any person who looked at it. There is absolutely no question of what the commitment was. You can say, "We want to back off it now, we're sorry," do a mea culpa and say, "We lied," but that is a clear, unequivocal commitment. The Premier himself wrote a letter a week before the election promising $400 million to the property taxpayers of Metropolitan Toronto, 21% of the cost of public education. As the group that was in here the other day said, "We have a letter from the Premier saying that's what he would do"—the now Premier, the then Leader of the Opposition.

I know you are squirming a bit on it because it is going to be tough. But for us it was not particularly pleasant to be picketed, with people saying: "Well, another party can do this. Why can't you?" So now, you are going to have to do it.

Mr Elston: It got rather intense at some of those events.

Mr Christopherson: Just a couple of points. I understand your sensitivity. It is apparent. I am sure that if we found ourselves in the same situation we would be as sensitive to any agenda that a party that defeated us was putting forward. There is no trivializing our recognition of your feelings.

Let me make two quick comments on that issue. First, it is acknowledged in An Agenda for People that there is a recession. I am now answering for myself; this is not a government position. I think it has been pretty evident in the submissions we have had here today and from everything we have seen and heard and read about in economic circles that this recession has not performed like any other, it has not been anything like what happened in the early 1980s. There have been major changes. In fact, our own report reflects the fact that there is economic restructuring and other changes happening that did not happen.

I would also point out that there are clear points of reference from economists who have said that the recession declined, and the acceleration in the decline of the economy and the deepening of the recession happened quicker than anyone expected and quicker than anyone was anticipating and signalling. I think that is also fair.

I accept the fact that you point to the word "recession" in the Agenda for People, but I do think when we are looking at things and weighing them out fairly, it must be acknowledged that it has not performed in exactly the way economists had expected—any economist, regardless of philosophy—at the time that document was written.

The other thing I would point to, again, is that our Premier has made the position on behalf of our government, and your caucus and your leader and the leader of the third party have attacked this position. That is fair ball, and it has happened in the appropriate arena. But the point is that our Premier has said we will be judged on all of our election promises as we have performed over the up to five-year term of our mandate. On behalf of our caucus in this committee, I do not believe this recommendation is inconsistent with either of those points.

The Chair: I notice we have the Treasurer here. I say good morning to you. Do you wish at this point to address the committee?

Hon Mr Laughren: I apologize for dropping in this way, Mr Chair. I had a cabinet committee on labour and economic policy but I squirmed out of there. I had heard there was a problem on the committee yesterday and, as a strong believer in the committee system, I wanted, if you had the time, for a couple of minutes—I do not want to take over the agenda of the committee or try to, by any stretch of the imagination. I talked to my parliamentary assistant, David Christopherson, last night. I ran into him on the street, as a matter of fact. He indicated to me that there was a problem yesterday, there was unhappiness that we would not provide some numbers to the committee. I was bothered by that, because that is not how I believe the system should work. If you wish, I could try and clear up some things, although I am not too sure to all your satisfaction. I would be prepared to try, if you want to take a few minutes now.

The Chair: It is very nice of you to show up, to come to this meeting. It was totally unexpected. You are welcome. Maybe we should do it by way of allowing people to ask you questions.

Hon Mr Laughren: Can I give you a couple of indications first? Would that be helpful? It might obviate the need for some questions. I am sure you have other items on your agenda. This is your last day, is it not?

The Chair: Yes, it is.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is another reason I wanted to pop in today, because I knew it would be the last chance.

We have done some very rough projections for 1991-92. They are based on data I would just be careful about because there are so many imponderables at this point. One example, we have no idea what the federal government is going to do in its budget with the transfer payments, absolutely none. We know from the cuts they made last year on the two big programs, CAP, Canada assistance plan, and the established programs financing, that we are going to be down over $1 billion, and there are a couple of other small ones that add up to about $1.3 billion we are going to be down.

Mr Wilson is already hinting at a smaller piece of money to share with the provinces. We are not trying to be pessimistic. We really do not know what is going to happen with the revenues. We do not know growth in the economy. We do not know to what extent it is going to continue through the year. There are guesses, but our guesses in the previous year, as you know, the projections during this past year have been off base. They have not been very good, frankly, as the economy has deteriorated from under us. I am nervous about those numbers.

We—the people in Treasury—went through and tried to do some high, medium and low numbers about growth. I can see Mr Elston nodding his head. I am sure when he was Chair of Management Board he was engaged in this kind of process too.

Mr Elston: I was certainly accused of relying heavily on the lower end of a lot of expenditure needs. At least that is what my caucus and cabinet colleagues accused Management Board of doing.

Hon Mr Laughren: Right. I have heard the line before.

I will start off by going through what the high and low economic projections are and then take a look at the medium ones. If you leave inflation in, in other words, not just growth but just nominal growth, at the high level we see as possibly 5.9%—that is gross domestic product; that is very high—at the medium, 5.5%, and at the low 1.7%. If you assume, which was what the grey book did last year, I believe, that our revenues will grow at 90% of GDP, then you would get revenues at the high end of around $45 billion and at the low end of about $44.8 billion. The end is assuming, by the way, that revenues only grow at 80% of GDP, in other words, lower elasticity.

But I would keep in mind that there is nothing in the budget that reads the budget changes at the federal level. There is nothing in there that has to do with any changes in provincial taxes, because we have not made those decisions yet. We have barely started that. We are running behind; there is a question about that. We are running slower than the government and Treasury was last year at this time. I do not want to be apologetic, because it has been a transition period from 1 October when we were sworn in. For example, the major transfers we are going to announce on Monday, we are behind on that as well. I do not particularly like that but that is the way it is.

If we take out the inflation and end up with real growth at the high level—this is at the high level—it comes to less than 1%, 0.9%, we think, and at the low level, minus 2.5% growth, negative growth, in the economy. We are looking at unemployment as well. At the vel, which is 0.9% real growth, we still have an unemployment rate of over 7%, 7.1%. At the low rate, in terms of real growth, but high rate in terms of unemployment, it could be over 9%, I think about 9.2%.

Those are the three scenarios. It would be very logical you asked me: What assumptions did you make in order to arrive at the high and low scenarios? For the high scenario, in terms of economic growth, that assumes it would be an earlier recovery in the US with its economy than many people are projecting and an early end to the war in the Gulf, which everybody seems to agree would cause a rebound in consumer and business confidence, which has a lot to do with investment and spending; it also makes the heroic assumption that there would be continued and substantial reduction in interest rates in Canada. I think you know why I say it would be a heroic assumption. I am sure even Mr Stockwell would agree with me. The low end, in terms of low real growth—I thought maybe some of you did not see Mr Stockwell come in—at the low end, it implies that the recession in the States goes on longer than we hope it will and that the war drags on as well, and because of those factors that consumer and business confidence declines as well.

That is a very, very rough and, I realize, lay person's way of approaching it. You could draw a line down the middle between those highs and lows as well and come up with something, but that is how we see it.

There are a couple of comments I would like to make. One is that I think you appreciate the fact that we are quite happy to share these kinds of things with you. It is always dangerous, when things are changing, that you are going to wait until later when these numbers do not come out the way—we are saying, "These are what the projections would be," and you say: "Look, you guys don't know what you're doing. You said this and here's what's really happened." I do not think the official opposition would say that to us, but others might.

Interjections.

Hon Mr Laughren: Anyway, I will not tease the others.

The other thing is that we cannot be put in the position of writing the budget in public. I think that causes all sorts of nonsense out there. I am not a big fan of secrecy, and we are going to be wrestling next year with how to make the process a little more open, and I would hope to use this committee. At the same time, there is a line you walk here, in terms of dealing with revenues, based on the tax changes you make. There is some kind of balance there and I, quite frankly, do not know where it is. I would hope you will respect that dilemma of trying to be as open as we can without writing the budget in public. We are—I am not saying this—just now starting the process of looking at potential revenue sources at a time of a recession. We know, once again, that that is a fine line to walk.

Anyway, I will stop talking. I have a few minutes. I have to go back to the labour and economics committee, but I would be glad to try to answer any questions.

Mr Phillips: We are trying to get a handle on revenues for next year, and we find this process quite difficult, because I think in the past a grey book has been prepared and it says, "If the status quo goes on, here's the revenue, here are the expenditures and here's the deficit." I do not know whether you want to give the committee advice on what kind of deficit one should be considering. I know you have mused in the press. We did get today from your officials an estimate that for every lowering of the credit rating, it costs $25 million a year per billion dollars. I assume we go to the market for $4 billion this year or something like that, so presumably if we lose one credit rating it is $100 million in incremental cost.

Hon Mr Laughren: As a matter of fact, I was talking to people on that this morning. That, once again, is a very rough figure, because I do not think there is a formula you can apply. I suspect it means what is happening to other people's credit ratings. The interest rates are dropping out there as well although, to be fair, whether they are dropping or going up or staying down, it is the difference between a triple A and a double A plus, for example, that you are talking about, I believe.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to get a hint from you of whether this committee needs to be worried about our credit rating or not.

Hon Mr Laughren: I wish I could answer that question. I do not know. There is no question that our deficit is going up. You do not have to be a rocket scientist to see that the deficit is going up substantially in 1991-92. I cannot give you a hard number, for the reasons we have already gone through: some of these predictions in the economy; we do not know what our revenues are going to be because we have not set them yet; we have no idea how the economy is going to rebound, or we do not know very precisely. The deficit will go up.

What I cannot read, and I do not think people in Treasury can, is to what extent the bond rating agencies—I think there are two in Canada and several in the States as well—will see the makeup of the deficit. For example, if it was expenditures out of control, that would be totally different than the economy going into a recession, us keeping our expenditures under control but not wanting to raise substantial revenues. It seems to me that the bond rating agencies would judge us differently depending on how we respond, and the component of that deficit, what has led to that deficit. But I am guessing on that; I do not know how they will respond.

Mr Phillips: I have quite a few questions. I just do not know how you want to handle it. Can I ask a couple more and then come back?

The Chair: I think you can continue. You may ask questions that other people have, and if not—

Mr Phillips: We were just having a debate when you came in about the Agenda for People. It is something I cannot get off my plate, because that is what everybody trots in here with. I can only assume you were involved in the drafting of it, as the senior financial person in the party.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is another heroic assumption.

Mr Phillips: As we have said here many times, recession was in the agenda—

Mr Elston: Floyd, now I know why you are not wearing your pink shirt. The blush to your complexion at the moment would clash.

Hon Mr Laughren: Never mind.

Mr Phillips: I was saying before you came in that there are 13 agenda costs, and so far in the committee's suggestions I think 11 of them have been shelved either to the Fair Tax Commission or to the—

Hon Mr Laughren: That is not shelving; it is giving it to the Fair Tax Commission. That is figuring out a way to implement it.

Mr Phillips: Relative to your promises in the Agenda for People it is. You said on education taxes, "In the next two years, we would remove the burden of $1.5 billion from the property taxpayer." Now the committee is suggesting, or government members are, shelve it or delay it for two or three years.

Mrs Sullivan: Postpone, postpone, abstain.

Mr Phillips: All I am saying is that of the 13 recommendations in here, at least 11 are going to be put on the shelf or delayed substantially.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is a better way of putting it.

Mr Phillips: Delayed substantially?

Hon Mr Laughren: Delayed.

Mr Phillips: I would like to comment on that, but I want to get the other part of my question out, too. You say that federal government transfer payments are down a billion next year. From what to what are you estimating they will go? This year they have gone up; at least in your current outlook they went up another $225 million.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, but we are talking now about the CAP. You recall that with the Canada assistance plan they served notice that they were limiting the growth in the CAP, and they did basically the same thing with the established programs financing. If they had not done that, if they had stuck to the old formula, that is how much—we are getting that much less this year than we would otherwise be getting. Am I explaining that correctly?

Mr Phillips: What is the billion? From what to what, from $5.6 billion to $4.6 billion?

Hon Mr Laughren: Tony has it. This is Tony Salerno from Treasury.

Mr Salerno: The decrease is from where it would have been, because CAP, for instance, is triggered by provincial spending on social assistance. To the extent that there is growth in that expenditure, the province would pick it up in the first instance but be reimbursed for half of those costs by the federal government. You have all heard how the social assistance payments have been increasing and are projected to continue to increase next year. Well, the federal share would have been increasing. Frankly, with the 5% cap at this time, it limits the federal transfers to the province to a 5% growth. Given that our projection of spending in that area is much higher, you will still see an increase in CAP transfers from the federal government. However, it will not be at the rate of the provincial expenditure in that area.

You were asking about the increases this year. First of all, there is a delay in the transfers of those, the effect of the reduction or cap of the federal transfers, because the flow is somewhat delayed. So the full impact of the ceiling this year is not felt to the full extent because of the lag in the transfers to the province.

There are also some adjustments that are included in the third quarter Ontario finances in respect to prior years, essentially settling accounts with respect to prior years.

Mr Phillips: Should we think that the federal transfer payments will be up 5% instead of something else? When you say it is down a billion, I think most people think it must be going from $5.6 billion to $4.6 billion.

Mr Salerno: There is another complication there, because the total entitlements will grow by 5%. However, the cash transfer could in fact be negative, depending on the value of the tax points that have been transferred to the province. Part of the transfer to the province is in the form of tax—13.5 points of personal income tax and 1.5 points in corporate taxes. So to the extent that, for instance, the personal income tax is growing, if it is projected to grow greater than 5% it will reduce the cash entitlement. When the total entitlement is calculated, you subtract the tax value and what is left is a cash transfer from the federal government. In fact, as you see, in the established programs financing, EPF, there is an inverse relationship. The PIT growth of $937 million triggered a reduction in the EPF transfers, and that reduction is reflected in a negative adjustment here in the third quarter Ontario finances. You cannot in aggregate right now what the observed growth will be in the cash transfers.

Mr Phillips: Being as gentle as I can be—as I have been before, this party and our party like to offload on the federal government. Your explanation there really just clouds it for me, because I think, "All right, I understand now." I look down at the bottom of this document here and I see those dirty federal transfers reducing the transfer payments. But you are saying that because one of the things we agreed is that when we take more of the personal income tax, we would take less in transfer payments.

We are trying to figure out the advice to the Treasury. You can appreciate, as I listen to this, I am confused, because you start off saying, "We're going to get $1 billion less from the feds."

Hon Mr Laughren: Perhaps a better way of saying it is we are going to get over $1 billion less than we should be getting, in our opinion. It is particularly offensive at this time when our welfare case loads—because this goes to help pay for social assistance—are going through the roof and we get municipalities such as Peel, was it, saying they are not going to reimburse the province, it is not going to be their cost of welfare—it was in the paper this morning and stick it to us. That is a very nice solution. Would you not all like to be able to that?

Mr Phillips: Except that your official has said that part of the "windfall"—I do not like to call it windfall personally, because I follow the federal numbers and I look again at the first nine months—was not windfall at all; it was an agreement we had with them that they would give us less money in CAP payments and more money in income tax. Did you not just say that, that we are taking more per cent on the personal income tax?

Mr Salerno: No, the total entitlement is determined. What the federal government has done a number of times since 1981, but most recently in its last budget, is limit the total entitlement. The only thing I said is that in calculating the cash balance, you have to first subtract the value of those tax points that were negotiated back in the 1970s. To the extent that those tax points are worth more, then the balance, the cash transfer, will be less. But you first have to work off the total entitlement, and this is what they have reduced, to the tune of about $1.1 billion last year. There is another $200 million in other actions, but the impact of AP and EPF in last year's federal budget will cost the province next year $1.1 billion, in that neighbourhood, based on our estimate of what we might be spending on social assistance.

Hon Mr Laughren: Our other problem is that there is no indication that that is the end of it either, for this coming year.

Mr Phillips: I am sorry. I guess somebody else had stated it. I think we get about 11% of our revenue from this source; 89% comes from elsewhere. You are saying it is only going to go up maybe 5% instead of substantially more.

Mr Salerno: No, it will grow at a rate lower than 5%, the cash transfer, because you have to distinguish between total entitlement and the cash transfers. All I am saying is at the cash transfer here, what you will observe in that segment of the budget that is the federal transfers, will likely grow at a slower pace than 5%, because I think the personal income tax may be growing at a faster rate so that it will offset some of that.

This is all assuming that there are no prior year adjustments, which there may be, and that might be positive or negative. That may cloud up exactly the observed rate of growth. It is not a simple calculation. I am sorry if I seem to be making it even more confused, but that is the way it goes.

Mr Phillips: When we got the $1 billion, I just—I am repeating myself, Mr Chair.

Mr Elston: Perhaps while we are with Mr Salerno discussing how he determines revenue from the feds, perhaps we could get the Ministry of Education in to tell us about general legislative grants too. We might as well continue on in this same fashion.

I just want to thank you for being here. When I was listening to this—Dr Christie and his panel have been through this with others before—I cannot help but reflect on several policy and priorities meetings we used to have in a previous situation we found ourselves in. This is not so much different from what we were dealing with last year. I remember the issues for us last year were: What are the feds going to do to us when the budget comes down in February? How difficult is Wilson going to be? What is he going to do? We just went through, and basically both the Treasurer and Mr Salerno have told us again that there is concern about just how far the speculation on slashing at the federal level will go. That is a given.

I remember as well having the three scenarios for income. For revenue levels you have a bright one, you have a not-so-bright one and then you have one that is absolutely dismal just to get everybody's attention, because if you do not get everybody's attention, then you can be really in bad shape.

I know what happens. People reach out and say, "Okay, this is what has been generated internally." Can you tell us of the options that have been chosen by Treasury, if you have sort of an accumulated wisdom from the private sector as to which of the options is most likely to occur? Because I know there is a comparison always made internally with external numbers, and although there are various people who do the crystal ball gazing, you would kind of like to know whether your crystal ball is as finely tuned as others or not. Did you bring your crystal ball with you?

Dr Christie: No, I do not have much room. We do, as you have noted, look at the external forecasters for the Ontario economy. When we were here last time, we left with you some material on what we had at that point in terms of what people were saying for Ontario. One of the difficulties with that approach is that, while we try to stay as current as we can, the way that business works is that there is always quite a publication lag between the time, say, that the forecaster for a chartered bank internally changes his or her forecast and gets it through his management process and through publication, etc. When those forecasts come out they are often quite dated.

While we do try and measure that and have a good sense of where people are, and by talking to them have a sense of where they are versus what they have published, it has not traditionally been a really good test of where in the range things are going to be, because, as I described, you never know where the range is at any point in time; it is only a couple of months later that you see where the range was, I think.

Mr Elston: There have been, I think, though, an establishment of a general track record of those people who come closest to the dart board, when the dart board actually appears where the dart was thrown, if I can describe it in that fashion. You would probably rely on a particular organization more for a good track record than others. Can you tell us what those are?

Dr Christie: How many reputations are going to—

Mr Elston: The Conference Board of Canada sometimes comes out with good stuff—

Dr Christie: From year to year, our experience has been that, for example, certain forecasters appear to be better at anticipating higher growth than everyone else, so if you are in a high-growth environment you will find person A to perform quite well; when it turns around, person A is probably the worst of the forecasters because he tends to be more optimistic. You will find also people in the other camp. We have not found anyone who is, good years and bad years, better than the crowd.

Mr Elston: Not to spend too much longer on it, basically this is normal exercise for the folks in Treasury, even this year, although it may be more difficult to isolate just how deep the recession is, and there is one more really big variable, which is, of course, the war in the Gulf, an external influence that none of us probably anticipated. I do not remember us talking about a war in Kuwait and Iraq a year ago when we were looking at budgetary items. That going into the mix, it is going to be still difficult, but it is normal experience for budget activity, is it not, when you try and figure what your revenues are going to be?

Dr Christie: There is a continuing exercise, week in, week out, certainly in terms of the economic indicators. There is usually something coming out every week, and you look at it and try and assess it and say, "Does this make enough of a difference to change the forecast of any particular major item?" but, as I am sure the committee has noted from the people who have come to talk to you, things are sufficiently fluid now that it is a rolling exercise. At any point in time the numbers are different, so there is not a high degree of reliance placed internally on any given set of numbers, because the staff working on them know, just wait 10 days and they will be different.

Mr Elston: Just to move to one particular question, then. Although I would love to have the Treasurer here for an extended period, I know he has to get back. When you talked about the credit worthiness of your plan, you mentioned that if expenditures were seen to be wildly out of control as opposed to expenditures made for recession fighting, you would probably think you would have problems with the bond rating. Basically, I want to know which recommendations you are more apt to be comfortable with if we make them through the committee. Would you believe that a large increase by the province towards payment of salaries, which are ongoing type of activity—for instance, we have a whole group of people in who want to have higher pay as part of their lifestyle.

Hon Mr Laughren: The public sector?

Mr Elston: Obviously in the public sector. Although we are talking about a higher minimum wage as well, that is a different issue from the one I want to isolate. For instance, the nurses have asked for a fairly large increase in negotiations with the Ontario Hospital Association. Would you say that the province making a move towards funding higher salary demands would be seen as expenditures out of control as opposed to the province making arrangements, for instance, to build more sewers or to build more of the 20,000 non-profit housing units or moving to build highways in northern Ontario, whatever? Would you see the difference between those as causing you concern about the credit worthiness of your planning?

Hon Mr Laughren: You have asked me directly. I will try and answer, although Mr Christie might be able to give you a better answer than I. My guess would be that we would be judged more critically if we allowed our public sector costs to rise through collective bargaining, although, to be fair, lots of it can be settled by arbitration as well. My guess would be that we have to bargain in a very serious way with the public sector in the next couple of years.

Mr Elston: But in terms of the weight of that type of injection of money into salaries alone or into the support of salaries through benefit payments or whatever, I would see that as probably being more critically eyed at this juncture than perhaps if we recommended a whole series of construction-type activities, such as housing or sewage treatment.

Hon Mr Laughren: For one reason, that in one case you are, I assume, trying to help people who would otherwise be unemployed and in the other case you are helping people who are already employed.

Mr Elston: Just one final question, then, because this is an important issue for us to consider. I know there is some continuing consideration, at least, of the agency for water and sewerage service provision. Mrs Grier has quoted as saying that you are still considering that agency for water and sewerage services, that it is part of the landscape, so you are looking at it.

Hon Mr Laughren: Very seriously.

Mr Elston: Very seriously? As it has the potential of removing about $500 million or so, we will say, from the bottom line of the province's books—

Hon Mr Laughren: If you set it up independently, it is a borrowing authority.

Mr Elston: Yes, if you set it up independently, it is a whole thing. Are you sympathetic to doing that in order to retain your fiscal flexibility and your rating flexibility?

Hon Mr Laughren: No, not for that reason. Do you know what it is like? It seems to me that we talked about separating the capital account from the operating account for deficit purposes to get a number at the end of the budgetary process. I think it would be counterproductive to pretend that the capital part of your budget was not just a big part of the deficit as the operating. I think it would be seen to be so transparent to try and do that, either through a separate agency or through a separate capital account, although people do not tie in Ontario Hydro with the provincial deficit.

Mr Elston: Actually, Anne Stewart wrote us a note here. I am surprised to see that.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is seen as totally separate from the debt of Ontario, which is now around $40 billion. Ontario Hydro is around $30 billion—I am using round numbers—people, in the language they use, do not say Ontario has a $70-billion debt. They do make that distinction.

Mr Elston: I think I had better stop there and give somebody else a chance.

Mrs Sullivan: Actually, a lot of the questions I asked were answered. I want to go back to specific revenue decisions. You have made revenue decisions already that have been announced. With some of the discussions we had this morning, it looks, doing some quick calculations as if you will be looking at about $1 billion to $1.5 billion less revenue, in the absence of other decisions for the next udget. I am wondering if you can give us hints on any kinds of revenue moves you would not consider at all. Is there any area that you would say: "No, that is not something we are going to contemplate. We simply won't consider any recommendations coming in that area"?

Hon Mr Laughren: You mean up or down?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. The second thing I was wondering: When you are looking at, for instance, the reflationary policies and funding you have announced, do you have a formula or a calculation by which you say, "If I throw a billion dollars into the construction sector, there will be X amount of employment"—I think the construction industry has told us it is about one and a half people for so many houses built. Is there a simple formula, a subsequent adjustment that affects your revenue side? Can you predict, for every dollar you put into construction, the multiplier that will affect your, say, PIT income?

Hon Mr Laughren: Better you than me.

Dr Christie: A simple formula?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. Is there a standard ratio? There is a standard ratio for predicting revenue that involves growth.

Dr Christie: What we do when we look at these things is to try and get a sense—if the spending is actually in construction, then the standard multipliers that are used for government spending are probably too low, so we make an adjustment in terms of the job and GDP multiplier; for construction it is somewhat higher than it is for government expenditure as a whole.

In terms of the revenue impact of that, we generally do not track that through as precisely. For any given expenditure program, normally the revenue implications are looked at in the context of the economy as a whole, as opposed to any particular measure. However, as a very rough, simplified rule of thumb, provincial revenue tends to be, let's say, 15% of GDP; so at times when we try to do back-of-the-envelope calculations, that is one kind of rule of thumb we have used if we create an extra dollar of GDP, revenue being about 15% of GDP, if I have that number right. That gives us some feeling of the feedback there.

For construction projects, and as I say, we have not done a specific piece of work to try to identify this number, I think, because the leakages out of construction are lower, we might see a somewhat higher figure, perhaps somewhat higher than the 15%. It is worth noting, of course, that there are benefits to the federal government in that as well, particularly in terms of the income tax that is collected.

00

Mrs Sullivan: Are there any Treasury revenue moves that you would not consider?

Mr Stockwell: The War Measures Act.

Hon Mr Laughren: Is that a revenue move? These decisions are perhaps more collective than they have been in previous governments, but I would have—

Mr Elston: I would not bet on it.

Mrs Sullivan: Maybe, maybe not.

Mr Phillips: Only if they go well.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, especially if they go badly, they are a collective decision. I would be hard-pressed, for example, to raise the retail sales tax, the GST having just come in this year, in the middle of a recession. We just made a decision not to—Mr Phillips does not like it when I use this; I do not think he does—we decided not to tax the GST, which in a sense was leaving $500 million in the pockets or perhaps closer to $400 million, with decreased activity out there, in the pockets of Ontario citizens that would not otherwise have been there if we had gone along and left the system on top of the GST. Anyway, that is one where I would sure have to be convinced it was a wise move at this point in time.

Mr Elston: Of course that would be the case if you did not do other extra things with that revenue bill that allowed you to be more thorough collecting and harvesting the tax money out there. There is a whole series of other initiatives that help you collect more money, so if the net effect is not going to be $400 million—

Hon Mr Laughren: It is what?

Mr Elston: The net effect of your announcement is not the $400 million you said, because what you did was you increased the harvestability of the standing taxes at the same time as you decided not to do something, collect the retail sales tax on the GST. You extended for a year, for instance, the amount of time you left your revenue people for collecting retail sales tax and other things, so you are not going to effect a net saving of $400 million for a lot of those people.

Mrs Sullivan: It is going to cost you $500 million, but the savings is not going to be $400 million.

Mr Elston: It is going to cost you more for one reason, because you are going to have to hire some people to do the work and there is a whole series of other things there. It is probably just too far away from this, but I just—

Hon Mr Laughren: I do not think it would come close to eating up a very big percentage of what we are leaving in people's pockets.

Unless there is a question that is searing someone's soul, I really should get back to the committee, which adjourns at 12:30.

Mr Elston: Does it have to be our souls?

Mr Phillips: Can I just confirm what we heard?

The Chair: Okay, quickly.

Hon Mr Laughren: I think I will leave before he confirms it.

Mr Phillips: Revenues are going to be up in the 6% to 7% range.

Hon Mr Laughren: I do not think I said that. But to be fair, we did not make any changes. They sure would not be up in the 6% to 7% range.

Mr Phillips: I thought you said $46.5 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is at the very high end.

Mr Phillips: And that the second one was down to about a quarter of a million.

Hon Mr Laughren: That was the high number and the low was $44.8 billion.

Mr Phillips: I know that, but I am going by what the Treasury estimates gave us two weeks ago just in terms of your estimate of the economy, real growth of 0.5% and a consumer price index of 6.1%. I assume you are saying that the $46.5 billion is the high but that the second one is just down, maybe a quarter of a million. Is that right? I am trying to figure out when you leave here what the message is.

Maybe they can just clarify. On the capital account, there is an extra $650 million you are planning for next year. Is that on top of this year's number of $3.6 billion, and the non-recurring expenses that you are incurring this year would be UTDC, SkyDome and the retroactive part of the doctors' settlement?

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I do not know; I am just trying to get an idea. Are we talking about $700 million that we incur this year and do not incur next year? Because you are looking to us to get some advice on the spending side. As Mr Stockwell said, we are kind of dealing with a sandwich with only one piece of bread, because we are not clear on the revenue side yet.

Hon Mr Laughren: I will ask Mr Christie to respond to your more specific question. But if you ask what message I would like to give to the committee, it would be that our revenues are going to be relatively flat, our expenditures, because of the built-in nature of many of them, are going to be up and our deficit is going to be up. We would appreciate any advice you have in all three matters: the deficit, any revenue suggestions you have for us in terms of taxes, and any particular advice you have on expenditures either that should be made in view of the recession or should be contained in view of our deficit problems.

If you ask me what message or advice I would like to see come back from the committee—I do not see the committee as an opposition enterprise; I see it as one that would give us some advice we could use. But I do understand the political nature of the committee. That is the way it should be. I am talking about what we would like to see back from the committee, but perhaps Mr Christie could address your specific question. I am not sure if there was any question.

Mr Phillips: I do not know yet. You came in and said $46.5 billion is your upper revenue estimate, the bottom is $44.8 billion, but I thought there was the middle one, which you said is probably where you are at. That sounds to me like it was around $46.3 billion. Then there are the non-recurring expenses, the $400 million for UTDC, whatever you put in for SkyDome, which is secret, I know—

Hon Mr Laughren: We do not know yet.

Mr Phillips: —the retroactive part of the doctors, and the capital one.

Hon Mr Laughren: There is also an assumption we will settle all those this fiscal year.

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: I would like to.

Mr Phillips: But if you do not, I assume you—

Hon Mr Laughren: Then it gets rolled into next year.

Mr Phillips: But the capital—

Mr Elston: Your deficit then will be reduced for next year if you do not settle it.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is correct, and higher year.

Mrs Sullivan: And added on to next year.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: You have already made some revenue decisions for next year as well.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is not magic.

Dr Christie: Do I understand your question on the capital count to refer to the $700-million antirecession program?

Mr Phillips: Correct.

Dr Christie: Of which some $40 million is expected to flow this year, and the remainder is to flow next year?

Mr Phillips: The $660 million, yes.

Dr Christie: There is a special capital allocation for job creation purposes—

Mr Phillips: On top of the $3.6 billion?

Dr Christie: The ongoing capital program has its own growth profile. It is handled through estimates and allocations, and I do not have a figure on what that would naturally become next year. The decision on how much to allocate to various ministries for their capital spending purposes is part of that broader budget process; I do not have the numbers, but I assume they will be available in the budget and in the estimates when they come forward.

Hon Mr Laughren: They are coming now.

Mrs Sullivan: Just to clarify, we asked this question earlier, I think, when the Treasurer was here before asking whether this $665 million, which is about what is left of new money. The response was it is new money and would not go through the same process that the other capital funds would. It is sort of a TSF, Treasurer's slush fund opportunity. It is another account that is specifically set aside for the antirecession policies that have been announced. It is new money on top of the normal capital.

Hon Mr Laughren: That is correct.

Mrs Sullivan: I just was not sure that that is what you was hearing from you.

Dr Christie: I apologize if I was unclear. That is what I was attempting to say. The discussion of allocations and estimates was simply to indicate that it is not clear that what would be added to a number of $3.7 billion because of the $3.7 billion in its natural growth through allocations could be $4 billion—

Mrs Sullivan: Or $2 billion or whatever.

Dr Christie: Or $2 billion, but I do not have the number.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Chair, thank you for this opportunity, because I was fretting somewhat about being asked to be trying to avoid the committee and sharing any of the numbers that we have. That was not the intent; so thank you.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for coming and allowing these questions to be asked.

Mr Phillips: I would personally find it useful, just because that revenue thing has left me totally confused still in the federal government, you know, the explanation that they gave that you get some here and you lose some there, because I suspect that this will be a centrepiece of the budget—

Hon Mr Laughren: Would it be helpful for a one-pager to go to you with that?

Mr Phillips: I would find it useful, yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: We could do that with no problem at all. Do you want us to send it to the Chair and then we could distribute it to members of the committee?

Interjection: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I would compliment the Treasury because I think a year ago you made a revenue estimate and you are within 1% of it now.

Hon Mr Laughren: What a team.

Mr Phillips: Yes. I bet you there is no business in Canada that came that close.

The Chair: I have not had a motion to adjourn.

Interjection: Shall we meet at two?

Mr Christopherson: To give us a full two hours for our discussions, can we make it at 2:15? Is that a problem? Adjournment to 2:15, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Yes, we are adjourned until 2:15.

The committee recessed at 1211.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1433 in committee room 2.

The Chair: I would like to begin the afternoon session with discussion of the proposals. We really must move along on this and make some definitive decisions concerning what this report will look like, given that this is the last day of hearings. I would like to be able to move through this document, making definitive recommendations to the writing team about which recommendations go where and what we are comfortable with. We will very quickly finish off the recommendations we were doing this morning and then move to the final draft recommendations. I will leave it to Mr Christopherson to lead off the discussion this afternoon.

Mr Christopherson: I had read into the record the points on page 3. I believe I finished reading those, and we were just recapping or finalizing our discussion on that section when the Treasurer came in and we took the opportunity to ask him some questions. So if it is agreed by all present, I will move on to the next area.

"In the opinion of the committee, the area of colleges and universities is in desperate need of attention. The economic and human costs of an inadequate system of post-secondary education are becoming apparent in our society.

"The committee would recommend that:

"A re-evaluation and a restructuring of the way funds are labelled and disbursed from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities should take place.

"While the financial needs of students are related to tuition, the bulk of costs are living expenses. OSAP increases should not be solely based on tuition increases.

"The government should play a leading role in maintaining quality and accessibility controls.

"The province should persuade the federal government to eliminate the 3% administration fee on Canada student loans.

"A new system of funding should be devised which reflects the true costs of research and does not remove resources from base operating budgets.

"There should be increased government support for research at Ontario universities.

"A faculty growth fund should be looked at for the replacement of tenure-track faculty members as they retire."

Mr Elston: Again, I am at a bit of a disadvantage. Any of my colleagues here can tell me that this short-forming is sufficient to let everybody understand what you are saying. But when you say, "A re-evaluation and a restructuring of the way funds are labelled and disbursed," for me coming off the street without hearing a presentation or anything, that does not mean one bit at all.

When I look at that sentence I think I know what you are telling me. You are telling me that when Colleges and Universities sends money off to Sheridan, it is disbursed for X, so they have to put it in X, or whatever. But this does not read like an instruction to anybody. It is not a real recommendation, if you know what I mean. If you want them to change the manner in which the basic income unit is formulated for college students as opposed to the way it is done for university students or anything like that, should actually say it rather than being so vague as to either misunderstood or not understandable at all. I think you should be more precise.

That is a general concern, because I think this paragraph should be generally read by people who are interested in the budget and what we have said about it. The other thing I am really concerned about is this: "The government should play a leading role in maintaining quality," which I have no problem with, but it is the second part, "and accessibility controls." Are we getting into the same debate? I thought we should not have been engaged in yesterday about health care accessibility? You were wanting to discuss limitation then. Accessibility controls, again, raise the same flag to me.

We wrestled, and not as successfully, I think, as perhaps we would have liked to as a government, with the whole issue of funding and allowing anyone who is qualified and able to get into university or college. We spent a long, long time trying to make sure that if there were classrooms needed—we tried. There was a cap on the fund that was made available. It was not good enough. We tried to give them a few more grant dollars, which in the end was not good enough to take up all of the demand.

I think you ought, though, to clarify those, because I suspect you do not want that debate to be raging about the government taking a lead role in maintaining accessibility controls.

Mr Sutherland: I think Mr Elston has a point on the wording. I think the intent was that one of the ways the government has influence on accessibility, not in terms of limiting it but trying to expand it, is on how you deal with tuition fees. I think it is more the intent on controlling how you expand it, but when you use the word "control," it implies limitations. I think that is a concern, and maybe we could delete the word "controls" it probably would be better.

Mr Elston: "Maintaining quality and accessibility."

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Mr Elston: Okay. Actually, there are several ways you can militate against broad accessibility. One is tuition, as you said. The other is by not having enough classroom space. The other is not providing enough money for faculty. I see that you have a faculty growth fund and all that type of stuff, but tuition is not the only area. What you are basically saying is, I think, government should be funding to allow all students to attend courses for which they are qualified.

Mr Sutherland: Delete the word "controls." I think it is quite clear.

Mr Phillips: I am not sure this is what Mr Ward had in mind for his touchdown, I think he described it as. In reality we have not commented on the major recommendations from both the universities and the colleges. I think the universities said they are facing a crisis and are looking or substantial increased help in the next year, and the colleges had the same one. These words really are kind of kirting that issue. I think when people do read it they are going to recognize it for what it is, which is avoiding the issue of whether you are in support of the universities or not. I think Mr Ward will have trouble describing this one as a touchdown. I would have thought you would want to comment on the recommendations of the need for beginning the implementation of the universities' recovery plan or something like that.

Mr Christopherson: I am sure Mr Ward will reflect that he is looking forward to a review after all four quarters, as opposed to after the first snap.

Mr Elston: He has already suffered a reversal of nine points. He was going to score a touchdown, which is even; he has just suffered a touchback, which is minus two.

Mrs Sullivan: That is right. He is not going to make the cheerleading team next time.

Mr Christopherson: What matters is where you are when the buzzer goes off. And we have learned it matters when the buzzer goes off.

Mr Phillips: We are talking quarters, not periods.

Mr Sutherland: You should not finish the game at the third quarter.

The Chair: I am glad to see there is some jocularity left in us after all these hours.

Ms M. Ward: That is a good word, given that these are all sports metaphors.

The Chair: I am trying to get into the mood.

Mr Christopherson: What about the earlier issue? Did that get clarified, the label, the concern you raised on that one? Any suggestions?

Mr Elston: I think you ought to tell us what you really want. Let's use plain language. Let's just say, "a re-evaluation and restructuring of the way funds are labelled and disbursed." I am guessing at what you are wanting here, but my understanding is that if a college runs a course it gets reimbursed on the basis of the basic income unit assigned to each student. To run a nursing course, it may be assumed by colleges that it costs $82 a student a semester, so they get reimbursed on the basis of 40 students in a course at $2 basic income unit for that course, and that is what they get. Then it may be assumed that in the music course at Oshawa, the number is $27 a student or something, so they get reimbursed at that level. I assume what you are trying to say is that the teaching of a course ought not to be precisely labelled that it may hinder a college in developing a flexibility to have more students in nursing, for instance, as compared to the music, but still being able to put good, credible courses. It looks like they are so inflexibly bound as to be unable to respond to new course requirements. I guess that might be part of it.

Mr Sutherland: I think the concern is that there seems to be a difference of opinion between some of the college and university administrative officials as to how it should be designated and how MCU interprets it should be designated. What we are looking at is some negotiation process there so they can come to an agreeable way, that they both can say, "This is a fair way of deciding."

Mr Elston: Rather than getting caught in a bunch of jargon, which does not mean a lot to us, we should be just saying that the Minister of Colleges and Universities should reassess with the colleges and universities community the manner in which funding is allocated.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine, because it really is what we are trying to say.

The Chair: Can we have the wording of that?

Mr Sutherland: I think you had it very good, Murray.

Mr Christopherson: Run the tape back.

Mr Elston: "The Ministry of Colleges and Universities should reassess with the universities and colleges community the manner in which funds are disbursed."

That might, just for everybody's edification, be an interesting recommendation, bearing in mind that the auditor has just completed the first full audit at Trent, and I think there is one ongoing at the University of Toronto and there are a couple of others happening. I know there is a bit of a difference of opinion as to just how adequately administration of funds is being carried on, but at least we can go that far.

Mrs Sullivan: Once again, I do not see precision addressing the recommendations that have come from the groups who have appeared before us. We saw, for instance, on the university financing issue, the Council of Ontario Universities, Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, the Ontario Federation of Students coming forward in virtual agreement on the need for a $410-million injection over a four-year period ultimately added to base, and on top of the usual increases in base funding there is no response at all and no recommendations relating to that.

Additionally, on the OSAP issue, there were very specific recommendations relating to OSAP, and if this budget recommendation is going to mean anything it should say the committee recommends increased funding of OSAP, to expand programs to include living expenses. One of the things we heard from everybody was the need to address the changing nature of students because of changing economic issues, and including in the consideration of expanded OSAP services the mature student and special circumstances there. Once again, no mention of colleges here. I would be embarrassed to submit this with no mention of colleges other than in a very nebulous first paragraph. Colleges are not here.

They are observations. I am not happy with it.

Mr Elston: Just a point on the item where, "The province should persuade the federal government." I am sure everybody would like the province to persuade the federal government, but bearing in mind that that is unlikely—these people are bent on doing anything they can to cut back on a lot of areas of financing—are you as a caucus committed enough to the issue of dealing with the 3% administration fee on Canada student loans that is being charged by the feds to indicate that the province should pick that up? It is a hope, I guess, but it—

The 3% administrative fee charged on Canada student loans is something that we would all like the province to persuade the feds to drop. Bearing in mind that they have become increasingly unresponsive to anybody who wants things like this removed, are the members of the government caucus committed enough to deal with this issue that they would recommend a makeup by the provincial Treasury?

I just want to be clear because I am not particularly in favour of supporting a whole lot of things that tell the province that it should persuade the feds, because even if you think they should, that does not do much for me nor does it do anything for the issue. I would prefer that you say perhaps something like, "The Ontario government should respond to the losses experienced because of increased administrative charges levied against students by the federal government," if you want. That is really flexible, but it also gives the sense that we think the province should consider maybe doing something about it without telling it what.

Mr Christopherson: What are you suggesting?

Mr Elston: Just that the provincial Treasurer should deal with the losses experienced by the 3% administrative fees levied against post-secondary students by the federal government. If all they want to do is negotiate with them, that is fine. If they want to persuade them to change it, fine. Maybe they want to go further and say, "Listen, we cannot countenance a 3% reduction in the assistance available for post-secondary education through Canada student assistance program."

Mr Christopherson: We have been through most of our document and there is still some fresh territory. I have got one more at the table that is only a page and a half. We are prepared to respond, to give our revisions to the first and second and we are also prepared to have a quick caucus this afternoon to respond to what you are raising now. That is a tight time frame, but that is what we are prepared to do, if you would like.

Next the committee is concerned with the—

Mr Elston: Sorry. The increased government support for research, are you looking as well still at a partnership with private business in the research area or are you looking solely at research being sponsored by the provincial government? There has been an attempt. In a real way the feds have done things to a larger extent with a huge private development initiative in terms of funds in the university sector. We had as well, through the tech fund, in a couple of other places married private development with university research facilities. In fact that was one of the requirements for funding, that you had to have a tie-in with a provincial university for research if you were asking for tech funding as a private organization. Are you excluding private industry participation in the research funds or are you looking for the partnership to continue? Because increased government support—

The Chair: With respect to increasing support for research funding, when the private sector is involved and a new development is made and a patent is claimed on that, who controls that?

Mr Elston: There is usually a development contract entered into which actually assigns royalty rights depending on the amount of money put in among the parties, including the university if it happens to be a participant in the process. It may be, sometimes, that the research is actually building on a patent already owned by a private organization, or a private inventor even. Usually the agreement which is arranged—I think it was always arranged through the Ontario Development Corp for the disposition of funds—also dealt with any returns made on the research development for product delivery.

The Chair: That is important because one of the criticisms of research and development in Canada and Ontario is that most of the multinational headquarters companies that any developments made by their branch plants in Ontario where belong to them, and in fact, if it is made here, funded by Ontario in this case, we could be funding a branch plant doing research here and then pay royalties to the home office, which may not be in Canada.

Mr Elston: Oh, sure, and that was always a concern when we were dealing with these contracts, that we were not sure that the research that went into the end product which was marketed showed some return, and we tried to bring that into some of the contracts. I think probably at some stage, if you wanted to as a committee, you could probably go in and take a look at some of the contracts that were signed and see some of the provisions where we were afraid of a couple of things: One was the end point of royalty delivery, but also the sale, sometimes, by Canadian developers of technology in co-operation with the university sector—sometimes those would be sold to a foreign owner or could be sold to a foreign owner. We were really worried about good technology being purchased with—

The Chair: Not developed here.

Mr Elston: Yes, and then ending up being sold through another area.

Mr Sutherland: If I may comment on Mr Elston's specific concerns, I do not think he should look at that recommendation being mutually exclusive. I think we recognize that it is everyone's responsibility to participate in research and that this should not be seen as discouraging the private sector. I think everyone has to increase his or her support and there seems to be some concern that the government increase its support and hopefully that provides leadership for the private sector.

The Chair: Have we finished discussion on this question?

Mr Christopherson: "The committee is concerned with the structural dimension of the present recession. Unlike previous recessions, the committee feels the present economic downturn must be addressed in a way that deals with the structural component."

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The government should provide financial assistance for retraining of the workforce. Such training programs should be implemented in partnership with labour, business and government."

"At least as a short-term measure, government should concentrate on training and skills development programs."

to facilitate labour mobility, particularly into areas of protected economic growth.

"The government should ensure more active investment activities of pension funds in Canada, and move to discourage pension investment outside the country.

"Access to benefits and entitlements for workers that are conferred by statute should be certain and assured.

"The government should take steps to ensure that R and D incentives provided to industry are used for the purposes for which they were allocated.

"Incentives should be created for high technology to locate in Ontario.

"The government should reappraise the policy of deregulation in the financial services sector.

"The government should use the budget speech to signal its intention to reform the employer-based pension system."

Mrs Sullivan: On each one of these things there are just sort of bizarre approaches. "The government should provide financial assistance for retraining of the workforce." There already are substantial retraining programs that are offered with delivery through various places, frequently through the secondary schools, sometimes through community colleges, sometimes in the workplace, and in some cases with labour partnerships and so on. Do you mean additional financial assistance? If you do mean additional financial assistance, to what level?

I look down further, and I see a recommendation that, "The government should ensure more active investment activities of pension funds in Canada." I am not sure that is a budget decision, but on that side there ought to be at least a description of where you see that and how you see that funding being used. If you see this is a venture capital fund, what about fiduciary responsibilities? The move to discourage pension investment outside the country has not even been discussed in committee and is not a provincial responsibility as far as I recall.

Mr Elston: What is this?

Mrs Sullivan: Limiting investments outside the country.

Mr Elston: I have more to say about that, but the regulation is basically done by the feds, and they have actually opened it up over the last couple of years by their move to allow pension funds in Canada to increase their percentage investment all the way up to 20% of their holdings.

Mrs Sullivan: Then as we go on, I wonder what evidence we heard or that you have that would lead you to make recommendation 5 relating to R and D incentives. Which R and D incentives are you talking about that are not being used for the purposes for which they were allocated? Once again, we had no discussion of deregulation in the financial services sector. Which particular policies are you referring to? We have had no discussions at all relating to the pension system. What kinds of reforms are you talking about? That is it for now.

Mr Elston: The pension item captured my imagination because of the difficulty in our telling the feds not to allow the money to go out of the country. They make the regulations about whether or not you are registerable for the purposes of deductions under your income tax returns, and it is they who sort of set some guidelines for the registerability, in the federal sense, for your pension plan. So we had some difficulties practically in telling our Treasurer to do something about that.

It is also a very difficult practical problem for somebody to say, "Invest all of your money in Ontario from pension funds," because the pension funds have become very large market consumers now in Ontario. We only have so many places in which to invest our funds. In fact the pension managers—if not to a person, at least in large numbers—had agitated to get permission to go outside of Ontario so that they could increase the possibility of better returns for a more varied portfolio.

They have a trustee relationship and they have a fiduciary duty to expand to the best degree they can the return on their pension funds. So be careful of that one.

It is practically probably an impossibility, a catch-22 for you, because you can say: "Invest in Ontario. Do not go outside and get a possibility of bigger returns." Then you have to deal with the issue of lower return on the capital that the trustees hold in the pension fund.

I have a problem with deregulation in the financial services sector. There is no indication that I have had that Ontario has moved to deregulate the financial services sector. There may be a blurring of traditional areas in which people participate in the financial services sector, ie, banks straying into insurance business, insurance into trust companies, and trust companies into other areas of service provision. But I will tell you that they have to file a whole bunch of forms about their solvency from a financial point of view. They have to do a whole series of things to get permission to do or transact certain types of business. They have to comply with the percentage of their asset holdings to keep registered to carry on business in Ontario.

So I am concerned that you are thinking something has happened, ie, that there is a laissez-faire type of format with respect to financial services in Ontario that does not exist. Blurring of roles has occurred, but deregulation has not, at least from my sense of deregulation, but I may misunderstand what you are getting at.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you know what you were thinking about, David?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, I know the discussion we had, and in order to give you a proper answer I would like a chance to consult with our caucus and actually check on some of the material that we used in arriving at that, before I respond so that I can give you a full answer.

Ms M. Ward: I just want to make some comments about some of the things you have mentioned. About the financial services, some of that, the deregulation, of course is federal. That does not mean you could not necessarily have provincial legislation replacing some of that. But I think there is a concern there among a lot of people about self-dealing between different arms of the same family of companies.

On the R and D there have been a lot of scams, both in provincial and federal research and development projects to encourage it, plans that may have started out with a very good intention but without sufficient controls. I cannot remember now. There was some fellow in Willowdale that was in the newspaper for years. I think that was a provincial one. There was also the supercomputer which was a federal one in Nova Scotia. So the good ideas sometimes get taken advantage of in a way that was not intended. That is our intent there.

The Chair: We had a private individual, Carlos Leite, make that recommendation because of what he saw within his own firm. I do not know how far you want to extrapolate that.

Mrs Sullivan: I would just be very cautious. I could certainly not support, on the basis of what we have heard before this committee in terms of our work, any indication that there is an abuse that is widespread enough to require this kind of a recommendation.

As I recall, most of the R and D incentives that have been introduced recently have been incentives for joint work between industry and universities through the centres of excellence and through the technology fund. I cannot tell you how offensive it is to see this kind of recommendation when there has been no testimony before us. We have not been investigating that kind of thing. This amounts to responding to a charge when the charge has not been made.

Ms M. Ward: I see that as a caution in setting up any new programs, that the caution be there that it not be subject to abuse.

Mr Elston: I have a point on the first paragraph, or the first bullet point rather, which says, "financial assistance for retraining of the workforce."

I want to just indicate for general interest that I know the former government had allocated a certain, I think it was a fairly large amount of money to the Ontario Federation of Labour to undertake particular studies to look at what could be done for workforce retraining and a whole bunch of other things. I know it was talked about and I am almost certain it occurred. I am not positive; I could stand corrected. But it is not like there has not been a fair bit of money put out there to study retraining. In fact, through the aegis of the Premier's Council on technology, whose membership, at least some—I think Gordon Wilson was one of the members on that committee—there was a lot of work done towards the issue of retraining of labour and actually some allocation of money there.

I do not want people to get the sense that nothing has been done and that there was not a lot of thought put into this whole issue of retraining and development of skilled labour before. In fact we still seem to think that government kicking in money at this stage to take a look at it is going to be of any substantial help in moving the issue forward. I think we are past that. It is time for us to determine just what the partnership arrangement ought to be. I understood from talking to Barbara and Gerry that there were at least a couple of people who were here earlier suggesting that business had a big role to play in helping to co-ordinate the retraining of labour, or training if not retraining labour, to address the needs of skilled workers in our current situation.

I am not sure what this says about that partnership that some had urged us to consider in the course of our hearing and I see a lack of—although you talk about a partnership with labour, business and government, it does not tell anything new. It does not recommend anything particularly new, nor does it suggest we should build on where we are.

Mr Phillips: I am on a slightly different one, but the number that struck me in the report was 120,000 jobs gone in 12 months.

Mr B. Ward: On a point of clarification, Mr Chairman, to perhaps address some of Mr Elston's concerns here—

Mr Phillips: I will wait for mine then.

The Chair: Go ahead.

Mr B. Ward: The concerns that you had with the first item—we are not saying that the previous government did not implement skills training programs or provide financial assistance for those types of programs. But to be quite honest, I am parliamentary assistant to the Ministry of Skills Development, and in the short time that I have been in that capacity and have had opportunities to go out in the province and talk to the various organizations, I have not found there to be the great degree of co-operation between labour, business and government that there should be. We are saying that the government should provide assistance retraining at work, but such training programs should be implemented in partnership with labour, business and government. That is what we are trying to build from that.

Mr Elston: I am just telling you, though, the effort has been to try to attract a partnership. In our apprenticeship programs and other things, we were trying to push the realization that they should get together.

Mr B. Ward: Which is what the Premier's Council is all about.

Mr Elston: Yes, or you are just not going to end up with a real product. Unless we can key in on something that would help move the issue forward to address the problem in developing a partnership, we are not serving anything more than maybe ourselves; but we are not serving the interest of resolution of the problem. That is really what was getting at.

Mr Phillips: Surely one of the major issues that is in the report—I think 120,000 jobs have disappeared in the last 12 months and 110,000 were manufacturing jobs, and these proposals probably will do little over the short term to help that, training and all those sorts of things. I would have thought that we would want to have a recommendation in here about the fact that we are in a free trade agreement now with our major trading partner, 110,000 manufacturing jobs have disappeared and there is a need for some fairly urgent activity over the next—

Mr Elston: At least two committee jobs have disappeared as well.

Mr Phillips: That is right. What per cent is that? That is like 20% gone.

The Chair: A free deal. It is called free trade.

Mr Phillips: I would have thought we might want to have a fairly strong recommendation on the need for activity, particularly in the manufacturing sector, to ensure that our manufacturing sector remains strong.

I do not what that is, because I guess you will use Algoma and de Havilland, I suspect, as kind of the lead horses, but there is no sense in us trying to say what the proposals will be but to say that we are quite concerned about the job losses and the need for urgent action over the next 12 months to stem that tide.

The Chair: The question really is I think, just as an observation from here, the short-term job losses are being addressed in construction and those sections, and maybe it is the intention here to try to get at setting a foundation for long-term growth as opposed to trying to make an immediate impact. I do not know. Am I reading—

Mr Christopherson: You were at the same caucus meeting I was.

The Chair: I had to leave before we got to that point, member.

Mr Christopherson: We will take a look at it.

Mr Elston: I can speak more clearly. I was not at that meeting.

Mr Phillips: Like eyewitnesses to an accident.

Mr Christopherson: Everything is perspective.

Mr Elston: I do not mind just addressing these series of recommendations by saying, while we note the need for immediate action and in fact have recommended immediate steps for helping with the recession, we also note that there is a structural dimension to this recession, and then go on with this section. I just highlight the fact you have other immediate recession-fighting items in the construction section or wherever you are going to put them, but that is fine, just as long as we make it clear for whoever is reading it, that is all.

Mr Christopherson: That is great.

The Chair: We should take out that next page.

Mr Christopherson: That is a good segue in to a question. I am going over old turf but things may have changed somewhat. We had originally talked about the possibility of having some recommendations, as many as possible but some where we all agree, so there is unanimity to add some weight to it. That is why we are taking the time to try to talk things through as opposed to us saying, here is ours. You don't like them. You write your dissent, and we are done in 24 hours.

However, there was this concern that since not all members were even willing to participate, based on what they saw as overriding concerns, that seemed to be out the window. But learning my parliamentary procedure, if things maintain for the balance of the day, there is still that opportunity. It is those who are present and vote who decide what carries and what does not and how.

In light of that, is it correct for me to assume there are a number of areas and there is still the possibility that we will be finding unanimity, or are there other factors that will prevent that from happening and I should be aware of that? I ask that in the same light, Murray, that you asked the question earlier about how much time you should spend. Could I get some guidance from you on that as to where you are?

Mr Elston: At least from my own point of view—Gerry and Barbara can speak on their own behalf—there are some good parts to this thing.

Mr Christopherson: That was hard to say, was it not?

Mr Elston: I was going to say there was good work that went into it. There has been a lot of work that has gone into it and there are things in here with which I agree, in fact which I would be a proponent of. When we get just to talk about the phase 2 support for the Social Assistance Review Committee and things that we will revisit, I am a proponent of that type of thing. I think I quite clearly have asked, as a member of the committee, even when this report comes out in its entirety, if there are things in there I do not agree with I will acknowledge it, but I will say there are some good things that have happened here.

I think I can be fairly precise for you right now, David, and say that I am concerned that it is not as specific as I would have preferred it to be, that I think there are too many of the recommendations and observations sections which have been proposed that are soft policy statements as opposed to recommendations from a financial point of view.

I think we are charged with a much tighter job than merely indicating a preference that government consider a particular policy line. That is I think what you would do if you were in the social policy discussions or in the resources development committee discussions or things like this. We are I think being asked by the Treasurer to advise him what a Legislative Assembly team of members from all parties think he should think about in terms of specifics to deal with the construction of his budget.

This is not a soft policy piece of work that we are doing, and I find this one too soft. There are lots of things in here that I agree with, mind you. That is why it is hard for me to respond. But I just do not think it is a tight enough piece of work.

Mr Christopherson: Let me ask a pointed question.

The Chair: Let Mr Phillips respond first.

Mr Phillips: One of our challenges, and we have talked about it a lot here, is the old Agenda for People. Frankly, the problem we are put in here is a lot of this, on or off the record, is kind of waffling and massaging, is the best term I can put. It puts us in a very difficult position because, on the one hand, you ran on this basis and defeated us, and then—as I say, I think I can take at least 11 of the 13 recommendations and indicate here where there is either some or significant backing off.

So we are put in the position of endorsing the government backing off on its promises. We are in almost a no-win situation. I do not know how normally one handles it because, as Murray said, there is a bunch of stuff in here that we are very much in agreement with. I am very much in agreement with. The problem is it is going to be challenging once we see the whole thing to say, that paragraph, yes, that paragraph, no, that word, yes, that word, no. We are put in a very challenging position, particularly when a lot of the recommendations—and I know what maybe your objective is—are not the home runs or the touch-downs.

The Chair: I see my role here as trying to bring together the best possible report for the Treasurer. I know the deep angst that you have about An Agenda for People. I wonder at this point, though, if we were to turn around and recommend everything in An Agenda for People to Floyd and say, "Here, this is what we want you to do," whether in fact we would be really doing our job in the sense that we have to take into account what is going on and I think we have to be real about it, be realistic. I will leave it at that. I hear what Gerry is saying. I am just throwing that out.

Mr Elston: I can understand where you are coming from. People who construct budgets have to be realistic, and although Mr Nixon, when he was doing this business, thought he was being realistic, he took an awful beating from people, and our former Premier took an awful lot of beatings from individuals who said, "You said you would fund this and you have not funded this to this extent."

Just understand that realistic assessment of options will lead some people to say that you—in our case, they said that our Premier lied and that remains with us. While you want to be realistic, some people also want you to address the issues in An Agenda for People, for instance, around the 60% funding. That is a big issue because it hits about three or four different sectors of our public:

1. The property taxpayers who believe that they are totally under siege and almost under water, as far as it goes, with respect to their ability to pay property taxes.
2. The elementary and secondary teaching professionals who believe that there has not been enough emphasis on funding appropriately the levels of education.
3. The trustees who believe that they have been put in a no-win situation of introducing provincial programs while having to tax or at least levy against the assessment rolls taxes for the payment of that.
4. The general sort of administrators, if I can describe them as that, at both the county board level and the county council or regional areas who have to levy the taxes and get the kicks on those.

You can see how that item in An Agenda for People is crucial in some ways to the way those people think the world will turn for them. In fact, it speaks to the issue of whether or not there is going to be a new partnership arrangement between government, school boards and municipalities.

That is why if you back away from that, it would appear that you are not going to be entering the new partnerships you want to be in and you are not going to be entering a new era of property tax assessment or property tax study which would say the property taxes should not pay as much for education. That is why we are in the dilemma of not having a very clear recommendation on that 60%, or why we are having a problem with respect to the clear recommendation coming from us on funding for phase 2 of SARC.

The Chair: Can we move to the final recommendations, having said that, and try to revisit some of the things and have some completion one way or the other?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Again, I do not want belabour this, Mr Chair, but I need to be comfortable. I fully respect and appreciate your role. It was not that long ago that our caucus was doing exactly that and became very good at it obviously. I was not—

Mr Elston: We are prepared to allow you some training time, if you wish it.

The Chair: At least five years.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that. In recognizing that reality, I am in no way suggesting it is wrong or inappropriate. By the same token, we do not want to spend the whole lot of time this afternoon on things that are spinning wheels, if you will. We have looked at other reports, so we also have a sense that we want to be different, we have made that commitment. But you still research what has been done and how and the essence of it, and I think needs to be said.

I am not going to get into a long defence, but we are not that far off, and I think we have made some improvements in terms of what the majority of this committee is prepared to say to a Treasurer when you are in a majority government. We are comfortable with that. Both of us understand the roles and what is happening.

We did note that in at least one of the reports, and I think it is something that impressed us when we did our research, there were some recommendations where there were assessments and it said "denotes unanimous support." In the context of SARC I think that it was one more piece in the moving lobby. Where that can happen, that is what we are looking at. But if that is not in your agenda, then I think we need to be apprised of that. Again, it could all change with the entrance of one member who is not prepared to accept unanimity on anything.

Mr Elston: We are never, as you rightly identified, everybody's attention yesterday, going to have unanimous consent because two of the members—the Conservative caucus is not attending these meetings, so we cannot put a unanimous consent to it.

Mr Christopherson: Could I question on that? I am asking this of anybody that can help me, including Mr Decker, the clerk.

When you vote on it, if we moved a motion that all of our recommendations be adopted as last presented, the words to that effect, and it carried, that would then become the committee report, right? Then there would be the presenting report and it would be very clear.

If, however, we had agreement on a number of amendments between us that we were prepared to identify, we could move a motion that accommodated that. Is it not what the vote is and how it carries that dictates what the report would look like, or—and I am being very sincere—is it the tradition and custom of this place that you would not go that to a third party when it is a three-party system? I do not know. I am asking.

Mr Elston: No, I think that you could say that members attending agreed that this section should be included.

that they will make the point quite rightly that they decided not to be here because they objected, for whatever reason they objected, and that no part of this majority report could be construed to have been a unanimous deliberation. If they are not attending and they do not intend to attend, then that is their problem. The difficulty is that you cannot go ahead, though, and still—

Mr Christopherson: I think that probably helps us in terms of understanding what the rest of the afternoon may or may not look like. That does not change our sincerity or our willingness, but it does recognize an end result that perhaps is less than our ideal.

Good. That is it then, Mr Chair. That entire report in terms of the areas that we have just talked about now, we are prepared to caucus on and give a response to. What I would like to do now is perhaps take us right back to the beginning for part I and walk through areas where we have made some changes and accommodated some of the concerns raised by our friends on the other side.

Mr Phillips: Maybe before we do that, I had some questions yesterday on some things, and I would not mind clarification on them if I could.

On page 23—I am looking at revision number 2, I suppose it might be the same in revision number 1. I do not know—at the top of the page: “55% of Ontario’s health care budget is spent on hospitals.”

Ms Anderson: The question about 55% of Ontario’s health care budget, the numbers that come from the Ministry of Health are actually not—it is 55% on institutional care, not just hospitals. It is hospitals and psychiatric hospitals and nursing homes rather than just hospitals on their own.

Mr Phillips: When people think of that, they think of hospitals, and I think it is more like 43% or 44%, something like that.

Ms Anderson: We could just put that 55% is spent on institutional, or we can get the figure.

Mr Elston: Why do you not just mention that 55% is spent on hospitals, psychiatric hospitals and nursing homes? Everybody knows what that means.

Ms Anderson: Yes, it can just be expanded to what it is.

Mr Elston: Sure.

Mr Phillips: The next one is the general agreement among presenters. I went back over all that and I honestly could not find any presenter who said that the health care system did not require a greater portion of the provincial budget.

Ms Anderson: The Ontario Nurses’ Association, I think, said that, but you are not likely to find any of the others.

Mr Phillips: I do not think so. I think the ONA said that hospitals did not need any more. Honestly, I could not find any and I know the ministry never said that. I am not sure we have yet got the estimates they promised to send. Have the Ministry of Health estimates arrived yet?

The Chair: No.

Mr Phillips: I went back through all the presentations.

The Chair: I could see if they are coming in today.

Mr Phillips: They may be, yes. There is half an hour to go.

The Chair: Do we want to discuss that point now?
1530

Mr Phillips: My problem is that I listened carefully to the Ontario Hospital Association, the Ontario Nurses’ Association, the minister, the public health people and the Social Assistance Review Committee people, and I do not remember any of them saying that.

Ms Anderson: What the ONA said was that this union is on record for the last five years that it does not believe its industry is underfunded.

Mr Phillips: The hospitals.

Ms Anderson: And if one third of the public purse in any given industry is not adequate, there is something wrong. In effect, they were saying this industry should not be funded to a larger dollar degree. I guess that is the whole health care industry.

Mr Phillips: I do not think the evidence supports that. That is all.

The Chair: Is there some consensus here that maybe we should change that and say that “the ONA presentation said the health care system does not require a greater proportion of money” and just leave it at that, or do you want to take it out?

Mr Phillips: I would suggest it come out, because later on, on page 24, it says, “The ONA are seeking a greater share of the hospital budget and presented evidence”—I think they expressed the view that there is sufficient money in the budget. I am just cautious. I do not remember the evidence being presented that there was.

Mr Elston: Actually, quite honestly, I think they were using this forum as a pre-negotiating forum as much as anything else, to try to prevent the hospital association from coming to the table and saying, “Well, you know, we don’t have the funding from the province so we can’t honour a big request for settlement.” I think we have to allow ourselves the fact that that presenter had more on her mind than just trying to help us out with pre-budget deliberations for the Treasury.

Mr Phillips: They may very well be right, but I would hate for somebody to come to me and say, “What was that evidence?” I think she expressed a strong view. As I say, they may very well be right.

The Chair: Let me go back. What is the will of the committee on page 23 about, “There was a general agreement among presenters that the health care system did not require a greater proportion of the provincial budget”? Do we change it to the ONA, do we leave it in, or do we take it out?

Ms Anderson: The whole paragraph?

The Chair: No, just that line, because the next one says “The ministry”—there is no discussion on that.

Mr Christopherson: We have not had a chance to respond to these. I think you will find that we were going to suggest that that be attributed, if that is what someone said, as opposed to the committee saying it, that sentence. To say there was general agreement that there is no more money at all needed in the health care system, I do not know that that is the position of this committee. If it was said, as we have been through that argument, it should be attributed, if it is an important opinion. But I certainly do not think this committee is making that blanket statement that there should be no more money in the health care system.

The Chair: The way it stands now, we are.

Mr Christopherson: I know. That is why I am raising the concern that we have with letting that stand.

Mr Elston: Or else you can just say "there was opinion expressed that," if you want to do it that way, or you could just say "the ONA presenters suggested that."

Mr Christopherson: If we attribute it, we are fine, but it is not a committee position, as far as we are concerned.

Mr Hansen: And it was not a general agreement.

Mr Elston: It was one view. If you attribute it, if you just say the ONA position was that no new money was needed in the hospital sector, you are free to go.

The Chair: Okay. Are we happy with that line now? Mr Phillips, you were making comment on page 24. With the change on page 23 and the wording change on page 24—

Mr Phillips: My point was that I listened carefully to the brief, and they may very well be right but I did not see any evidence. I would think it should be, "The ONA are seeking a greater share of the hospital budget and expressed the view that there would be sufficient moneys in the budget to meet their demands."

The Chair: Do we have any problems with changing "presented evidence" to "expressed the view"?

Mr Christopherson: They did not bring evidence, so we do not want to want to—

The Chair: Should we go to that last page of recommendations, the ones that were just handed out now that I have lost?

Mr Christopherson: I have jumped us ahead. We did not do part III, did we? There was a page and a half to do. My apologies, Mr Chair. That document still needs to be circulated.

The Chair: Why do we not just read that page and a quarter and come back to it in two minutes. Just read through it, all of it, and then we will come back.

Mr Christopherson: "The committee is very concerned with the severity of the current economic recession and its impact on workers, families, and businesses in the province. High unemployment rates, household debt burdens and personal bankruptcies are hurting many Ontarians. At the same time, extremely high interest rates and exchange rates, along with sagging consumer confidence, are affecting business investment and corporate profits. Finally, the committee would like to highlight the current budget deficit, which stands at $2.5 billion.

"Therefore, the committee recommends that:

"The provincial budget should reflect the current state of the economy, and, in particular, the present recession."

Mr Elston: Does that mean the budget should be anaemic or what? What does that mean? Can you tell me?

Mr Christopherson: If you take a look at where it is flowing from, "Current State of Affairs," I believe, is subheading of the report text that this is flowing from. We wanted to reflect on it. We wanted to make a comment. We did not want to ignore it. We thought this was consistent with positions that have been taken in other economic times in terms of setting the stage, setting a tone. In referring, I think, to the 1989 or 1990, when there were better times but concern about expenditures. We have a different time now and different concerns. We did not want to be motherhood about it, but we said that not to do anything here may be inappropriate. We think this sets the stage appropriately early in the draft, and that is what we meant to do. I am not suggesting to you that it is meant to do anything more than that, but we felt that should be done.

Mr Elston: If you are going to make a recommendation, what you probably mean here, I suspect, is that the provincial budget should set forth an aggressive plan for recovering the Ontario economy from recession, or something more specific. Maybe "aggressive" is the wrong word, but do you not want a recession-fighting budget basically? This does not tell me anything. It "should reflect the current state of the economy." What the devil does that mean? If I happen to be a businessman in downtown Kincardine, reflecting the current state of the economy means that I am probably cutting back my inventory, have probably laid off some of my staff, I have probably taken a personal cut in pay. Does that mean we want the budget to be cut back in spending size so that we can reduce taxes? What does it portray for other people?

Mr Christopherson: Okay, fair comment.

Mr Elston: I think you really do mean you want the budget to be a recession-fighting document or recession-addressing document.

Mr Christopherson: Basically, what we are saying here is that we are in a recession, we have budget deficits that we are all trying to grapple with, and that that has to be considered. We are not in a time of boom. It is not a time of trying to do everything in one shot. I realize it could be partisan, but we happen to believe that no matter how you look at it, you are going to come to that conclusion. As opposed to a year in the past when the previous government had felt that deficit-cutting and a balanced budget was the priority and said that, if you looked at the time, I am sure it looked rather motherhood and did not really say anything when you were in the time. If you go back to the document even now, with changed times, that phrase makes a great deal of sense. It sets the tone. It is the environment in which the budget was considered. This is problematic or if there is a way you can improve it, we are very flexible. We just felt that to say nothing was inappropriate.

Mr Elston: If I might respond just for a second, it is a different exercise, though, to tell the Treasurer that we ought not to have a deficit, which was really the p ade by the previous committee's report, I think. It meant could still spend if he wanted, but every time he spent should also be sure he had the revenue to deal with it the way or another; either he cut other programs or he raised taxes. The committee knew full well, when it wanted to achieve certain things in its budget recommendations, it was to be seen in all efforts to encompass a balanced budget. That is a pretty definite index.

Here, though, it is not precise enough to tell me what it says. Does it say you do not want the deficit too high? Does it say you want the deficit higher because it is a recession? Do you say you want the budget to do some economy priming? I think you are being too cute, David, in the sense that you are being too nice with the words or too fine with the words. You should just say what you mean. I think it is that you want this budget to reflect the need for the government to become involved in easing the effects of the recession on the economy. That may be even a little more precise. Maybe that is even not bad wording, you want to use it.

The Chair: How do we like that wording?

Mr Christopherson: Can I hear it again?

Mr Elston: "The provincial budget should be formulated to ease the effects of the recession on the economy." I am not even telling you to eliminate the recession, just easing the effects of the recession on the economy, if you want. It is still pretty general, but I think that gives you the framework.

Mr Christopherson: Let us take a look at it. It should not be a point of contention. I think it is just a question of selecting what needs to be said.

Mr Elston: Remember, as much as it is being printed in the Treasurer, we are also printing this for other members of this document, interested observers.

Mr Christopherson: We took to heart what you said the other day about a couple of clauses, where it was being looked at south of the border and other investment areas. That is part of the responsible aspect of what we are trying to inject into this.

Mr Elston: All I want to advise you is that for us, having been involved in the discussion, this may say quite a lot. For somebody who has never heard one piece of evidence or heard any of the back-and-forth, to-and-froing, it does not mean a lot. Do you see what I mean?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, your point is well made. I will gladly take a look at it.

Next: "The committee is of the opinion that, while a number of factors have led to the current economic downturn, the policies of the federal government are a significant cause of the homegrown recession. The committee wishes to draw attention to the tight monetary policies of the government of Canada, not for the purpose of pointing fingers, but to foster an understanding that continuing this course will lead to further economic difficulties.

"The committee, therefore, recommends that:

"The provincial government should call on the federal government to ease its tight monetary policies, which will, in turn, assist the economic recovery."

Next: "The committee is encouraged by the number of presenters that have indicated the likely improvement in economic performance during the second half of 1991. However, lower interest rates and an easing of monetary policy is a significant assumption in all forecasts. In addition, the Gulf war remains an uncertainty in its effect on the economy."

I do not believe we had a recommendation; there was just that statement, that observation.

Last, on that page: "The committee applauds the initiative taken by the previous as well as the current provincial government to consult with native peoples on a variety of issues. The process of consultation has been timely and, more importantly, productive.

"Thus, the committee recommends that:

"The provincial government should continue to consult and negotiate with native peoples with the belief that native peoples have legitimate grievances that must be addressed, such as land claims, education, economic development and social issues."

Mr Elston: I agree with all that, but what does that do for us as a budgetary document? If we were dealing with a social policy committee report, that is a good conclusion, and I thank you for mentioning us as well. It would even be good if we were doing a resources development study of the management of forests or commercial fisheries or things like that, but what does this tell the Treasurer? He does not directly consult. He may in the end, when they get close to coming up with settlements, provide some financial assistance, but I am not sure this tells him anything as a pre-budget document.

Mrs Sullivan: I remember looking at the Union of Ontario Indians document. I think their requests added up to about $79 million, none of which is addressed here. One of the major portions of those requests related to housing initiatives that were costed. There were several other issues; all of them were costed, relating to social programs and so on. I just do not think this is advice to the Treasurer relating to the document that was presented here.

Mr Christopherson: We take what you say very seriously. I think we were crafting this on the document, as well as in light of some of the announcements that were made before the House recessed, where there was a fair bit of movement and, I believe, some financial recognitions. The reason we put in the acknowledgement to the previous government was that the minister did that, and rightly so. What we wanted to say was that the important starts had been taken, the steps in the right direction. We think we have continued on that and we want to build on it, and that is what we are trying to reflect.

Mr Elston: Just to change it very slightly, perhaps we should say, "The committee recommends that the Treasurer make financial provision in the budget to allow the continuation of consultation and negotiation with Ontario's native community." If you want to do it in that sense, I am happy. That leaves him the whole menu from which to choose in terms of the requests of the Union of Ontario Indians paper. He can choose, and we can just stimulate his interest in their proposals. Of course, he may also have proposals from other organizations of the native community. I would be prepared to support something like that.

Mr Christopherson: I do not think we would have a problem. Anne, could you read back how you understood that?

Ms Anderson: "The Treasurer should make financial provision in the budget to allow continuation of consultation and negotiation with native peoples, with the belief that native peoples have legitimate grievances that must be addressed, such as land claims, education, economic development and social issues."

Mr Christopherson: We are fine with that.

That, as they say, is that. That is once through. Good thing we have another week and a half.

Mr B. Ward: Shall we give them parts IV to X?

Mr Christopherson: At this stage, before we begin now going back to the first paper with any revisions that we are prepared to support ourselves, does that constitute—we had talked earlier about your recommendations and you had said that your comments throughout would constitute those positions. Do I gather then that we have basically your menu, if you will, and that on those things that we do not agree on, you are going to more than likely outline a position in a dissenting report, as of course will the Tories?

1550

Mr Elston: I think that is partly it, David. Some of our comments, as I have indicated earlier, would have been around particular programs, had they been recommended, for instance, in the construction sector, or we may have particular comments to make about the 60% educational funding issue; types of things like that. So I think you can anticipate what we might say in some of those areas.

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mr Elston: But for a specific program, because we never really have revisited those construction items yet, we have not got your—at least I have not read your revised set of recommendations. You have most of our comments. We may as well end up having to speak more specifically to what is not included in the report, as much as there are comments to be made about what is in the report.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine. Quite frankly, with all of us new, I do not mind acknowledging once again that we are walking every step—every day is brand new and I am sure next year will be different. We still do not see fully what the end product is until it actually happens and that is just life.

Mr Phillips: Kimble has a draft of our report there.

Interjection: The Agenda for People?

Mr Phillips: No.

Mr Christopherson: Typical negative opposition document.

Mr Elston: Could I just raise an item?

The Chair: Could we focus again? Mr Elston has a question.

Mr Elston: Actually, I have revision 1, but I am it must be close to page 17 in revision 2 as well. There is a section right at the end of the agricultural section, the one that has been left unslashed, "Some sectors of the industry under the supply management system particularly dairy and egg sectors are experiencing difficulty as consumers become more health conscious." For me, coming from rural Ontario, that "as consumers become more health conscious," although there may be issues about the consumption of cholesterol and fatty foods and things like that, I feel that says something I do not want the committee to lend credence to, because I think there is a lot of misinformation about how healthy it is to consume red meats or egg products or milk. It depends how active a person is, how his body deals with certain consumption. I would like that to be changed in the sense—

Interjection.

Mr Elston: I do not know what the best way to think there is a sense that consumers—

Mr Hansen: I would say no problem; take it out.

Mr Elston: Take it out?

Mr Hansen: Because it has been a problem, I can tell you.

Mr Elston: You could even leave something in there, "consumers change food consumption habits," if you want.

Mr Hansen: So it would say what?

Mr Elston: It would read, "Some sectors of the industry...experiencing difficulties as consumers change consumption habits," because there has been a real increase in the consumption of red meats and an increase in fish and poultry consumption.

The Chair: Milk with lower butterfat.

Mr Elston: Yes, I am prepared to do that.

Mr Christopherson: We are fine with that.

Mr Hansen: I was thinking more of pesticides and that.

Mr Elston: No, that is another part of the issue.

Mrs Sullivan: That is also another issue, with the organic stuff.

Mr Elston: But when they talk about dairy and that it really means cholesterol and butterfat and things like that, saturated fats.

The Chair: In the last three weeks we have had the most mobile of lifestyles here, have we?

Mr Christopherson: We also have to make sure that we are comfortable—we have not had a chance to go through all of this yet, even just to quickly say we have done revision 2 page by page, so again it adds more time to our limited time.

Mr B. Ward: Does anybody have any concerns with that?

Mr Christopherson: We have not actually given it final approval with everybody.

The Chair: We may have a problem with the steering committee taking a final look at this because it says that all members of the steering committee must be present.

ven that we are not sure where the Conservatives will and on that—

Mr Elston: It is okay.

Mr Christopherson: Sorry; I want to be aware of is. Should that be happening today?

The Chair: No. What was being suggested is that even the limitations of time and other commitments for her people, we are essentially at a point where we may not make it and that we will not look at the final document in its final form, drafted, written and so on, as a committee. The suggestion was being made that the steering committee should look at it, and then the suggestion was made so that it would have to be unanimous that the steering committee looked at it, and we are not sure we can get—

Mr Elston: May I just offer this advice then. I know that you have only been authorized to sit these particular days, but I think by consent of the House leaders you can sit another day or so to sit. I am quite prepared to go both Shelley Martel and Ernie Eves to get another day just to look at the final product, if that would be within everybody's—

Mr B. Ward: To put a final package together.

Mr Elston: If we are not going to get the final draft here and if we can just put everything together and then sit a day on the final product, that would seem to me to help out.

Interjection.

Mr Elston: No.

Mr Hansen: It is just scheduling.

Mr Christopherson: Let me just say that we are not opposed to the concept obviously, but—

Mr Elston: You are not going to get a final product today, now.

Mr Christopherson: Okay, but let's kick it around a bit and see where we are. There is a scheduling problem, and I could see where in order to maintain numbers there could be some real problems finding agreement. We still have a third party to consider which does not appear to be helping too for the process at this stage. That could be very problematic, and I would not want to walk from here thinking that will be the resolve and have it stopped.

The other thing I would say is that what we have to do right now are areas where we can find agreement. We are still complete the work. We know what our position is. It was merely a question of—not merely, but it was in terms of process merely a matter of our trying to find areas of common agreement and that is through give and take and discussion. That would take the time, but the process itself for us to be finished with our position and you to be finished with yours and the Tories theirs can still be accommodated in this time frame. Having said that, I am not sure where that leaves us.

Mr Phillips: I think, realistically, that we have raised issues as we have gone through here, and it will not be as much what we agree with that is in the report; it is what is in the report. I think in many sections we have said: "This is backing off on your commitments. This is backing off on your commitments." So, realistically, I think there are enough things not in here already that we are going to have to comment on, so we are going to have to write up some kind of a report on this thing.

Second, I think we are going to need some time to go over what things we can agree on because it is, as I repeat myself, going to be challenging for us not necessarily to agree with some things in here, but to enumerate each case where you are not.

I think we are probably best to somehow or other figure out a way to get the thing all finalized as much as we can and give ourselves a little bit of time to look at it. Mr Decker may be helpful to us as to how these things normally finalize when they are left at this stage.

Mr Elston: The committee has to make a request if it is needed.

Mr Christopherson: Let me raise a point to see what this does to the discussion. We have had an opportunity now, other than the revision 2 to the draft, but in terms of this one—other than this, okay, everything else in terms of our recommendations, we have all been through once completely right now and we have had a chance to consider everything you have had to say, save the responses we have heard the last hour and a half. We have not had a chance to caucus on that.

Mr Elston: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: But for the rest of it, while we are still flexible, let's be realistic. We have heard what you had to say. We have made some changes where we are comfortable with that, and I would suspect that we are not too far away from what our final position is, recognizing that in many areas, maybe most, you still are not going to be comfortable and you will still want to dissent. That is fine. We respect that. With that in mind, I do not know how crucial that makes it. I am just worried that if we walk away from here and say, "Okay, there will be another meeting and that will solve things," and then we do not get another meeting, where are we? We have walked away not completing the work we could do.

1600

Mr Elston: So are you suggesting then, David, that we just consider basically the reworking of the part I recommended as your final position on those items we discussed, and that the final report really just catalogue those plus whatever you decide with respect to just the last hour's discussion.

The Chair: Here is what we could do. I do not know how much time people have. What is the constraint with time? How many people have to leave now?

Mr Elston: I have a briefing but I am prepared to—

The Chair: If we stayed half an hour, could we go through the recommendations that are in revision 2 so we nail down the recommendations, and could we then send the document—

Mr Elston: Off to be printed.

The Chair: —off with Anne to be written, circulated and with comments to be brought back and then—no.

Mr Elston: No, you cannot, because Anne quite frankly cannot go away and redraft it and have it done any earlier, I presume, than 6:30 or 7 or whatever for us it takes tonight, unless we are all going to stay here and sit tonight because we are not authorized to sit longer than today.

The Chair: That is right.

Interjection: We cannot sit tomorrow?

Mr Elston: We could sit tomorrow?

Mr Hansen: No, we cannot. We cannot sit tomorrow.

The Chair: Everybody is in his constituency office. We have three Fridays that were allocated in the budget allocations that we did not use, plus half a Monday morning which we did not use that was in the budget allocation for us, and so if the House leaders were to meet and agree that one day late next week the whole committee could come back and have the final positions solidified—

Mr B. Ward: Let me make a suggestion. I can stay till five, then I really have to go. Is it possible that we could break for 15 minutes until a quarter after four? Our caucus can meet and finalize our recommendations as much as possible, present them back and see where we are and hopefully wrap it up if we can.

Mr Elston: This is what I heard David saying, that this has been a refinement of their suggestions and that while there may be—in fact I hope there are a couple of word changes here just in terms of expressing; for instance, it talks about, “The government of Ontario should re-examine its funding on settlement and language training services with an attempt at enhancing service,” which is not quite, I think, what you want to do. With minor word crafting you can clean this up and basically this is the final position of government caucus members, and it really represents to them the final report position. We have done the revision 2 and really what is being suggested is that today we finish off by saying that the part I revision 9 am 7 February edition is the final position of the caucus in those sections.

Mr Christopherson: The part I is just that; it is Part I. There are two other documents, okay. The second one is completed. Again, it was done quickly. We have been meeting around the clock trying to get this stuff back to you and meet the commitments we made in terms of process. I would ask the Chair to consult with the clerk and the researcher how we accommodate some of those minor word changes that need to be done and how we get that authorization.

Aside from that, the two things we would have to do today to give full effect to the process is to finalize revision 2, and also, in fairness, I really would like a chance to caucus with my colleagues on the suggestions you have made over the last hour and a half. There were some very good points there. That way we could come back and enter what our position is there. As my colleague, Mr Ward, has said, we can do both of those things now as a caucus, come back, raise the concerns and then the only loose end, if you will, is as you have pointed out, Murray, is how do we accommodate that? What mechanism can be in place so that we do not get something we are locked into just because we did not have time to back and give effect to change that is needed.

Mr Elston: I am correct, am I not, when you said that your part I revisions of 7 February 9 am are basically your final position in terms of—

Mr Christopherson: What we lose by not talking the fact that—you have been very, very good at coming with language that has helped us close some gaps. I mean that sincerely. We lose that opportunity where if you had made some move, then a little more language change would have us come closer, but we lose that.

Mr Elston: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: Okay. So we are still flexible to that degree, but having lost that we do not lose the whole process. Yes, the essence of what you are saying is true. Going back to the fact that there is not going to be unanimity, you may just want to address these things in your dissent.

Mr Elston: Sure.

The Chair: Let us break till about 20 after and reconvene and do what we can till 5 o'clock and send it out. Okay. There will be a temporary recess for 15 minutes.

The committee recessed at 1605.

1634

The Chair: Okay. We have about half an hour. Perhaps we could facilitate this by moving through very quickly. Are you prepared to take the lead?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, I am, Mr Chair. Back to page 3 of part II.

The Chair: Wait a minute. Could I offer a suggestion here? We have three phases. We have I, II and III, correct? If I said that we had dealt with part I—

Mr Christopherson: Let me come back to that. That makes it nice and neat and consistent; then, with your indulgence—

The Chair: I will trust you on this, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: It will be well placed, I assure you.

Page 3: We had already agreed, at the committee level, on the issue of the wording on “labelled” and also “accessibility controls” question in the middle of page 3. My records show that we had actually crafted language that we had all accepted. There was a further concern raised on the item of the fourth point down, “The province should persuade the federal government to eliminate the 3% administration fee on Canada student loans.” We stand behind that. We are quite comfortable with that.

Mrs Sullivan: Just a second. Are you saying you are staying with all your wording on that section?

Mr Christopherson: The first one we had already agreed.

Mrs Sullivan: That was Murray Elston's suggestion.

Mr Christopherson: Right. That had been done. Further, there were suggestions and discussion. I believe Mr Sutherland was speaking on our behalf, and we had agreed to the language there. I think actually what we did was to eliminate the last word, but there was agreement there.

Mrs Sullivan: Are we changing OSAP at all?

Mr Christopherson: No. In fact, everything else is the same.

Mrs Sullivan: You are not changing the research?

Mr Christopherson: No. The balance is the same. Next page.

Mr Phillips: I think I asked whether you people were going to consider the recommendations of both the colleges and universities on funding.

Mr Christopherson: The caucus felt it was implied, clearly, that anything that did not specifically say "universities" only, that the request on funding and other initiatives applied to both. In that light we are comfortable with it as is here.

Mr Phillips: Which of these recommendations talks about the funding, where the universities requested that they have their university rejuvenation plan. Which of these recommendations refers to that? We are all on the next page, are we not? Page 3, "Committee Observations and Recommendations—Page 14."

Mr Sutherland: To be quite honest, there are no specific recommendations there on actual amounts of funding, we certainly believe that the preamble of observations and the other comments that have been made throughout the report that would come back and deal with college-university issues should be taken into consideration by the Treasurer in dealing with specific funding.

Mr Phillips: What did you just say there? That you are recommending that the Treasurer should take into consideration the specific funding proposals?

Mr Sutherland: No. We are saying there are no recommendations on specific amounts of funding as put forward in the proposals, but if you look at the observations, they stress the need to have this issue addressed and are saying that the Treasurer will address it satisfactorily from the recommendations.

Mr Phillips: From your observations or recommendations?

Mr Sutherland: From both.

Mr Elston: Can I just say something I said before? This is our work and we understand all the short forms and all the key words and signals and all that. This is not everybody's work, and it will not be read as everybody's work. If you want them to consider the funding requests of the universities, say it, just clear language, "Please consider this" or "Please consider that." I am not playing games. I am just saying that people will read this and say: "What in the world are these people doing? They could have done this without talking to anybody." Why do you just say, "Consider the request of?"—

Mr Sutherland: If you look at the second sentence, though, "The economic and human costs of an inadequate system of post-secondary education are becoming apparent in our society," that is a pretty blunt statement.

Mr Elston: It does not say anything.

Mr Sutherland: It does. It says there is a problem.

Mrs Sullivan: You do not say, "Put the money into the budget," and how much money you want.

1640

Mr Elston: We take that second step. Just say you want him to consider it. I think he can say that if we do not have a good system of post-secondary education its human costs are evident, or something. Why do we not just be blunt and say, "Consider the request for funding," or not say it. But let's not be cute and subtle with the words, because it does not do the job.

Mr Christopherson: We are at the point where there is a significant difference of opinion as to what is accomplished and what is not accomplished, and I think we just need to respect each other's rights. I think we know what we will see. You have every right to raise your concerns, but I think there is a point where we need to recognize that we are not going to go any further. Everybody has had a chance to raise their concerns. I am getting the signals clearly from my caucus that nothing has changed and that we are still very comfortable with the language we have here. You have, of course, your vehicle for saying something different.

The next page: The change we would like to see is in the first point. Between the words "provide" and "financial" we have put in "enhanced."

Mr B. Ward: "The government should provide enhanced financial assistance for retraining."

Mr Christopherson: We heard everything you had to say and that is the change the caucus is comfortable with.

The fourth-to-last point on the same page: The points were well taken and we would like to just remove it.

The next one is the second-to-last point. We would like to propose: "The government should undertake a comprehensive review of the regulations of the financial services sector." In saying that, I realize that that still does not meet all the points Mr Elston raised, but we thought you did make some good points and this is the change we would like to make in light of that, again, with all due respect to your right to disagree if that is not clearly what you would like to see.

Mr Phillips: Just let me state again that I think one of the issues over the next 12 months is going to be the job losses, particularly in the manufacturing sector. The government has two of them right there, de Havilland and Algoma, and then right in behind a whole bunch of others. I think this will be a major deficiency in the report. That is the point I raised earlier and you said your group would consider it. I guess you have considered it. "We reserve the right," and all that sort of stuff, but—

Mr Christopherson: These are our recommendations. Of course, what ultimately matters is the budget and that is what the government will stand behind, but this is what we are comfortable recommending and feel strongly about. If you disagree, which I am sure you do—

The Chair: That is not to say that a lot of these other issues are not going to be dealt with. Algoma is sitting on the Premier's table as his priority issue. By the time this hits the Treasurer's desk, that issue—

Mr Phillips: I understand, Mr Chairman. It is just, as I said, these recommendations, by most accounts, will take some considerable period of time to have an impact in the marketplace, and kind of a full-court press on jobs may have been appreciated.

Mr Christopherson: Again, it is important to say that if it is not here it does not mean we do not think it is important. It is a question of whether we think it is appropriate here in the report and whether it has been addressed in another way. That is where it is.

To the revision, the draft report, we do not have many problems. The researchers have consistently done an excellent job. A minor point—it is actually my fault; I should have raised it in an earlier draft but I neglected to. On page—

The Chair: Excuse me. Just one point: The researcher is suggesting that we move a paragraph on housing. Maybe you had better deal with this, because it is your suggestion.

Ms Anderson: There seems to be some duplication in the text about housing in the construction sector and that section on the housing. I was going to suggest that the paragraph which is on page 11 could start off saying, "There are a variety of steps that could be taken to improve the supply of affordable housing, such as," and then there is the list of the various things we have just heard. It could be moved to the housing section rather than being in the construction section. That leaves the construction one talking more about the construction end of things.

Mr Christopherson: I do not think that is a problem.

Ms Anderson: It would be the paragraph at the top of page 11, with a little introductory bit saying something like, "There a variety of steps that could be taken to improve the supply of affordable housing," and then continue with that paragraph, "such as," and put that in the housing section.

Ms M. Ward: Starting from where?

Ms Anderson: If you go to the bottom of page 10—

Ms M. Ward: "Given the positive economic—

Ms Anderson: Cross out "This partnership," and then take the rest of that paragraph with a revised, restructured phrase and put it in the housing section, because it refers very specifically to things that have to do with affordable housing.

Ms M. Ward: The early part of the paragraph and the paragraph before are also talking about housing, and part of the paragraph before that is talking about non-profit and co-op housing. So what is the rationale for—

Ms Anderson: The third paragraph talks about non-profit and co-op housing and also talks about developers collaborating and job creation going through infrastructure funding. It seems to be more general. The third one could almost be taken out. Leave the fifth one in there, up to the point where it starts, "This partnership," and then just move the remaining part of that paragraph, which is more detailed, into the housing section where you talk about the need for affordable housing as opposed to the need for construction in general.

Ms M. Ward: Okay. I had a problem from the very beginning with this being split, construction and housing.

The Chair: So are you happy now?

Ms M. Ward: Yes, okay.

Mr Christopherson: Page 16: It is a minor matter but one we felt worth raising. The two paragraphs regarding the Ontario Federation of Labour: to ensure that have some balance—I am sure the committee would want to leave the impression that labour's opinion did matter as much as anybody else's and therefore anything referring to a labour presentation can be left to the rest of the chapter—we had suggested earlier that at least the paragraphs on the OFL be inserted between the first and second paragraph that appear in the section "Business and Labour" on page 14.

Mr Elston: This is some politicking, is it?

Mrs Sullivan: A little sensitive about the relationship with the last paragraph in the part, too, I guess, eh?

Mr Elston: We used to work away with Gord Wilson and try and include him in a whole bunch of our programs including the tech fund. It did not help us a hell of a lot. I am not sure what it is going to do for you. If he is not in the first or the second or third paragraph, it will not change his partisan point of view, I am sure, but if it makes you feel better.

Mr Christopherson: I think it is important that I have said that we do feel there is a need for a shift in attitude and in thinking—

Mr Elston: Listen, so did we.

Mr Christopherson: Well, I know, and the first 16 years that you followed us, you did just fine.

1650

Mr Elston: He was included as a full participant in that whole tech fund thing. It is a partisan sort of a shot. You do not see it in that fashion, but those of us who worked very hard to ensure that there was a heightened credibility given to the position of labour, and that included our Premier, because he went and actively sought out people from labour organizations to come join and speak freely about their points of view. I happened to chair a round table on the economy and the environment, and included there was Bob White who could not attend but Carol Phillips was there and attended a lot. You are thinking that there was not some sense among the rest of us here in this room that there should be some heightened role for labour. You do not see this as a shot, but that is what it is.

Mr Christopherson: I would disagree with that. I think that—

Mr Elston: It is just a little twist.

Mr Christopherson: I think it was indicative of what you attempted to trivialize the fact that we at least want that chapter to be balanced.

Mr Elston: I did not.

Mr Christopherson: You did. You said: "You're going to play little games. You're going to try and satisfy"—

The Chair: All right.

Mr Christopherson: Just a minute, Mr Chair.

Mr Elston: You see, that is another little partisan st.

Mr Christopherson: No, it was not that. I originally had that all I would like to do is move it over—

Mr Elston: It is your contention that you are the only one that ever took note of any labour role in any of this stuff, and it is not true.

Mr Christopherson: We will check Hansard and we will talk again, Murray.

The Chair: This is not a productive conversation. I think this is going to be an ongoing debate over the next few years. We have about 10 or 15 minutes left. I would like to finish the report, and then we still have a couple of resolutions that we have to do.

Mr Elston: You do not have to be a New Democrat to be sensitive to labour. That is all I wanted to say.

Mr Phillips: Just to be helpful, why do we not just—because I do think maybe you would feel better—move all the end of the paragraphs up?

Mr Christopherson: All we want is a balance, and the only reason we raised anything—there was a retort to that should have just been, “Fine, that’s a good idea,” and so on and so not. That is what ticked the whole thing going.

The Chair: We are a little touchy here.

Mr Christopherson: We did not ask for it to be changed to “Labour and Business.” We were comfortable with “Business and Labour.”

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, can we move along, please?

Mr Christopherson: That is it. We are done. I am sorry. Forgive me. Just a clarification from research. I remember it was just a process of noting and keeping track. Where it said “NDP observations” and in some places it said “Liberal,” that was for working purposes?

Ms Anderson: That is right. What I did last night was in the recommendations that seem to have come forward by both parties, because there were places where they had not been decided. At that point it did not seem to be committee recommendations. That will be taken out in the next reworking of it, as it has been decided—

Mr Christopherson: I would just make a note of it, that if all of us are the same crew who do this again a year from now that is just a point we might want to revisit, and how that is done.

Mr Elston: Some of you might be ministers by then.

Mr Christopherson: And miss being here with you this, Murray? Never.

Mrs Sullivan: I have to take this away and caucus it. Some of the areas where there are double recommendations listed, I do not think they came back addressed to the committee in discussion. I am looking at, by example, page 23. Let’s see what that one is. I have that one marked. I am looking for “Interval Housing.”

Ms Anderson: Opposite page 22. Are you in revision 2?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes. Our recommendation was very specific. You indicated that you would take that away, and

I assume that what you are saying today is that none of the recommendations that—

Mr Christopherson: You received part I, correct? We circulated that and that was our response to your concerns raised. We have now verbally responded in our part III, and I have here to circulate our part II. I cannot recall from memory whether there are changes there or not, but this is to be circulated with the clerk.

Mrs Sullivan: I know what you have here, but other than that I wondered if you had made any other changes.

Mr Christopherson: Whatever is circulated in that last document is our response.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, by adding a year. It says to study, not to implement, basically.

Mr Christopherson: I do believe, although I will check with my caucus colleagues, that that wraps up where we are. At the appropriate time I will be prepared to move a motion that the final recommendations as circulated on documents noted as part I, part II, and the verbal responses to part III as given this afternoon, constitute the “Observations and Recommendations” part of the report. Perhaps the opposition would like to move the body of the report or I will include it in my motion, whatever they prefer. It is up to you.

Mr Chair, one moment please. A correction, because it is the motion. The verbal changes were to part II, not part III, for clarity and consistency’s sake.

To my colleagues across, through you, Mr Chair, would you prefer that I incorporate the body of the report as we have now agreed, or are you comfortable moving that separate from, of course, the observations and recommendations? I have moved the recommendations and observations. I am asking about the body of the report, the part that we have collectively agreed on.

Mr Phillips: Well, speaking as one, the challenge we face is the one I have articulated all along, that it is very difficult to separate the disagreements and the agreements and that it gets lost a bit in the shuffle. I think our challenge is the one I have tried to be as forthcoming as I can on, that I for one have difficulty in supporting the report because of a variety of reasons. One is that many of the recommendations, I think, are a backoff on the commitments that were made, and we do not incorporate in this, I think, some of the recession-fighting moves that are going to be needed. While I may agree with an awful lot of what is in here in verbiage and things like that, I think it is, like any report, very difficult to say: “There’s the 80% I agree with and there’s”—

Mr Christopherson: Just to make sure we are clear. Quite frankly, I did it in the reverse order. I am referring now just to the policy document, just to the part that the researchers drafted. It is a simple matter.

Mr Elston: Why do you not just move that you add your observations included in parts I and III written form and part II as amended by oral presentations to become part of the revision 2—with corrections, if you want to do that. I will have to vote against that, but that then develops your unit so you can go ahead and have—

Mr Christopherson: That is fine. There did not seem to be any disagreement on the body of the revision in terms of what people had said and what was brought forward. At least, I did not hear it. I was looking to see if you wanted to reflect that in a motion, and we would then move our recommendations and observations and you would attach your dissension.

Mrs Sullivan: Move your recommendations be appended or be integrated as part of the report.

Mr Christopherson: But as to the body of the report itself, do you support the part that has been done by the researchers and that we have worked on collectively, to reflect what has happened here, what people came in and said?

Mrs Sullivan: It does not matter. Your recommendations will not stand alone anyhow, so get them into the thing and then we will vote.

Mr Christopherson: That is fine. I move the report, as revision 2, with a couple of changes made verbally this afternoon and our recommendations and observations, as amended.

The Chair: Is there any discussion? Seeing none, all in favour? Those opposed? Should we record this?

Mr Elston: No, you only do that if it is asked for and I do not see any reason.

Mr Phillips: I will remember.

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: We need direction with respect to the translation of this document into French and I am going to allow the clerk to explain. I do not think it is a big issue. It is a question of allowing the clerk to explain the different options available. First, we have to decide whether we want it translated or not, and I am not sure that is really a question. The second is how fast and soon we want it done, because there are some cost ramifications to that, so I will let Mr Decker explain that.

Clerk of the Committee: Basically what I am looking for now that we know what the report is going to look like is some direction, as the Chairman said, on whether or not to have it translated into French, and if we are going to translate it into French, whether to have it as a bilingual document, back to back, or whether to have a separate English and French version of the report; also, how quickly the committee is interested in having either or both of those versions available for public consumption.

The Chair: Maybe you could discuss the cost ramifications of the options.

Clerk of the Committee: A rough guideline as to what it would cost to translate the report is about $100 a page. With the appendices and the dissenting opinions, we are looking at probably somewhere around 50 to 60 pages, so $5,000 to $6,000 would be the cost of having it translated into French.

Mr Christopherson: Is there a difference in cost between a bilingual report versus two different reports?

Clerk of the Committee: The cost difference would be that if you are going to print the same number of reports in English as in French, it is less expensive to do it if you do it in one document. If you are going to print fewer in French than in English, it would be cheaper to print many as you want in English and then a fewer number in French to meet the demand as it arises.

Mr B. Ward: What have they done in the past?

Clerk of the Committee: Last year the report was translated into French and presented as a bilingual document. Previously I do not believe it was translated into French.

The Chair: You explained to me the other day that if we rush the translation, it is something like 63 cents a word and if we allow the translation to take place over a period of time, it is 43 cents or 46 cents a word.

Mr Sutherland: What is the normal procedure? Is the report presented on the first day the House is back?

Clerk of the Committee: This committee has, as do the other committees have, by virtue of the motion that was passed just before the House rose, the authority to release its report at any time by way of the Chair filing a copy with the Clerk of the House. That makes it a public document and the Chair is then obliged to bring the report forward to the House when the House begins sitting, but it can be released during the interval between sessions if the Chair releasing a copy through the Clerk of the House.

Mr Sutherland: What would be the normal time and procedure for translation?

Clerk of the Committee: As the Chair said, depending on how quickly the committee requires it, anywhere from one to five weeks would be the time line. The speed with which you want it translated will affect the cost.

The Chair: I need some direction. (1) Do we translate it? (2) Do we include the translation in both copies together? (3) How fast do we have the translation done based on cost?

Mrs Sullivan: I think there is another issue, and that is, as soon as the document is tabled it is therefore considered to be a public document. Therefore it becomes available to the Treasurer who is developing the budget. The speed with which it gets into his hands may mean that the information is incorporated into his budget planning. I spoke yesterday, I think, for the first time about the possibility of an April budget. In the past he has spoken of May and we are at February now. We are of talking several weeks of translation, plus printing.

The Chair: In the past the committee has agreed to pass a resolution saying that as soon as a copy is available, it is made available to the Treasurer and that for public documents, the public release can come at a different time, but as soon as this is ready to go it goes straight to the Treasurer. Is that the consensus in this case? Or now then, having said that, we still have the objection to translation now and so on. Do we want the document translated into French?

Interjection: Yes.

The Chair: Okay, that is passed. It will be translated into French. Do we want the French version to appear in the English version in all copies or do we want to have English version and a French version published with fewer members?

Mr Christopherson: What are the other committees doing? Is there any precedent that has been set?

Mr Elston: I do not think you need to worry about it. The fact is it ought to be a bilingual document, in my view, and it was last year, and for us to change would be, I think, a very bad mistake.

The Chair: Do I have a consensus that it will be a bilingual document? Okay, it is a bilingual document. The other question is, how many copies do we print? We need 1,000 copies for internal use alone. Last year they printed 1,000 copies.

Mr B. Ward: Was that enough?

The Chair: There were about 130 left.

Mr B. Ward: yes, the same number.

The Chair: So 1,200 copies; all right.

Mr Phillips: How many did we actually use last year?

The Chair: You had 130 left.

Mr Phillips: We could use the 130 this year and just charge NDP to Liberal.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, please.

Mr B. Ward: Is it the staff's opinion that will be enough?

The Chair: Okay, now we need to have a date for the pending opinion to be filed.

Mr Christopherson: Apparently last year, as I understood it, there were a couple of days, and we have said this year, the figure, the date thrown out earlier was five days. From what I am hearing I think that will probably be enough, but I am open to hearing differently.

The Chair: Noon Tuesday?

Mrs Sullivan: Five working days.

The Chair: Noon Thursday?

Mr Phillips: Yes, I think that is fine. We just decided a few minutes ago to have the damned thing.

The Chair: Okay, noon Thursday.

Mr Christopherson: Somebody throw a Bible under the hand when he says that.

The Chair: Noon Thursday. Release date to the Treasurer? As soon as the document is ready?

Mr Christopherson: Yes, as soon as possible.

The Chair: General release: As soon as the document is prepared and ready to go in its bilingual version it should be released. It should be given to the clerk and then released to the public?

Mr Christopherson: How is it released, Mr Chair? Is it tabled in the House?

The Chair: I call all the press and all the media and everybody comes in here and we make a big celebration.

Mr Christopherson: The Chairman does a news conference.

Mr Phillips: It should be after the stock markets close.

The Chair: We are aiming for the first day the House comes back.

Mr B. Ward: Is that normal?

The Chair: Mr Decker just indicated that if all goes well he can have it ready in its bilingual version, and everything ready to go, for the public and everything, on 18 March.

Mr Elston: Beware the ides of March.

The Chair: Shall the report be adopted in the report of the committee, subject to the final authority of the Chair to verify that the final draft reflects the changes directed to be made?

Mr B. Ward: Those are all his.

The Chair: No, they are not; they are his.

Mr B. Ward: Is that normal?

The Chair: That is normal. That means I have to read it before it goes off, okay?

Mr B. Ward: Before you sign your name.

The Chair: Is there any other business?

Mr Christopherson: What about the question of the odd word here and there?

Mrs Sullivan: You just passed a motion.

The Chair: You just gave me authority to make sure that the grammar and the spelling are correct, but not to change the intent.

Mr Elston: If you lost the argument in your caucuses, you guys better be careful.

Mr Sutherland: Wait a minute. Did we not have a problem with the words the other day?

Mr Christopherson: That is right. What have we done?

Mr B. Ward: I thought we learned our lesson.

The Chair: Who said the Chair does not have any power?

Mr B. Ward: We are wrapping up, I think.

For myself, this is my first experience in a standing committee. I would like to thank everyone. I enjoyed it. It was a very good learning experience. I enjoyed the give and take and the co-operation that was shown from most people during our discussions and debate. I would just like to thank everyone on the committee.

Mr Christopherson: I would like to echo that, and also particular thanks to the staff, the researchers, the clerk and the Hansard people—very impressive support of the work here. I want to thank our colleagues for their assistance where they felt comfortable doing so in light of our newness and I look forward to the next time around. Thanks to you, Mr Chair, for doing the best you could with a rather unwieldy group from time to time, and with the time constraints we had.

The Chair: I would like to add my thanks to all of you. You made my job here a little bit easier and a wonderful learning experience.

There was one further question. Does the committee want to meet when the House sits and do we want to have something ready to go for the first Thursday, about 21 March? Do we want to have some hearings set up so that the committee can continue its work?

Mrs Sullivan: On pre-budget?

The Chair: No, the pre-budget is done; to move into another phase of the committee's work.

Mr Phillips: I would have thought that the subcommittee might want to meet and talk about it. It seems to me we already had agreed to the cross-border stuff.

The Chair: There is transborder shopping and—

Mr Christopherson: I think what I heard, and I stand to be corrected, was that the subcommittee had looked at a number of things, but those recommendations are yet to come to us. I do not think anything has been finalized. I do not recall voting on anything.

The Chair: The subcommittee had agreed that we, as a group, would recommend to this committee to bring cross-border shopping to you for the committee's—

Mr B. Ward: Is it the call of the Chair then?

The Chair: No, I think I need direction from you to say that, "Yes, we should go ahead with that."

Mr Christopherson: How does that work in terms of how much time you spend on it? How are those decisions made? I have no idea. I am asking.

The Chair: This committee is scheduled to sit from 10 o'clock in the morning on Thursday until noon and from 3:30 until 6 on Thursday. Therefore, we can schedule meetings to discuss these issues. We can ask people to come and give us depositions during that time and do some recommendations.

Mr Christopherson: But when do we decide how long we stay with cross-border shopping and what we are going to attempt to do, or do we do that at the first meeting?

The Chair: I get a sense that maybe the first meeting should be an organizational meeting.

Mr Christopherson: So there is no set.

The Chair: On the first Thursday do we want to have the organizational meeting at 10 in the morning or in the afternoon, Or both times?

Mr Sutherland: Let's go in the morning and if we need it we can go in the afternoon.

The Chair: Okay, so we will have the first meeting sitting in the House as an organizational meeting at 10 o'clock in the morning. Mr Phillips, you have one final comment.

Mr Phillips: Have we decided on this cross-border subject or we will make that decision when we meet?

The Chair: We will make that decision when we meet.

Mr Phillips: I am not sure of the other subjects that had been proposed.

I just comment while I still have the floor that I think we have found this a useful process as well, particularly in the last couple of days. I think the third party made quite a contribution as well.

Mr Elston: Probably more productive.

Interjections.

Mr Phillips: I disagree with very little they said in the last couple of days.

The Chair: We are now adjourned. Thank you very much for your efforts.

The committee adjourned at 1715.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 21 March 1991

The committee met at 1024 in committee room 1.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION PROCESS REVIEW

The Chair: All right. I now see a quorum and I would like to begin this meeting. I think we should perhaps move to the general discussion that we were having about the pre-budget process, ideas about it, how we felt it worked and whether or not there were any recommendations of how this process could be changed, improved or should we leave it alone. And I throw that open to the members present.

Mr B. Ward: There is one way we perhaps should explore in improving the consultative approach. I know there are a number of major organizations that are very representative of a sector in our province, and although the presidents or the chairmen of these organizations may change, the organizations are still there. Perhaps we should develop or recommend a list of organizations that are, on a continual basis, invited to prepare briefs.

I know there was some discussion when we first formed as a committee as to what process did we want to use. We agreed we should be first of all inviting the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Federation of Labour, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce and that type of organization. I think we could establish a list so the clerk knows on a yearly basis and the organizations get used to being invited on a continual basis. I think that may be one avenue we could discuss. I do not know if I am off base here or not, but I think that is one area where we could improve the consultative approach.

Mr Sutherland: I would agree with Brad on that, and I think I would want to add a list. We made special note of the areas we did not hear from at this committee that we thought were still important areas; I think of transportation, environment and mining. I would suggest that maybe, looking at the list we saw from last year's report, a lot of those groups did not show up at that year either. I think that maybe there should be some focus in terms of identifying some of those organizations that are representative of those areas we have not heard from for a few years and maybe some selective recruiting of those organizations to appear before the committee, just to ensure that it gets a broader representation, and if the composition of some of the groups coming before this committee is changing from year to year, I think that is a good thing too. But particularly when you talk about issues of public transportation and environment, which have certainly grown in importance in the last couple of years, we should be hearing from them at this committee as well.

Mr Christopherson: The first thing I would like to say is that in my conversations with the Treasurer, he is still emphasizing the importance he places on this committee and on the pre-budget consultations and the fact that he sincerely would like to see us move to reform the process so that it could have more meaning and allow all members of the Legislature an opportunity for real input into the development of the budget.

I sincerely do not sense that there is any rhetoric there or that it is a throw-away line to appease someone. I think he truly would like to change the system. Recognizing there are still some things that are going to remain the personal domain of the Treasurer and certainly of cabinet, there is obviously a role for all members to play; and I think as we move into the 1990s and the next century, it is time that we started to recognize that.

Having said that, I preface my suggestions by saying we have not caucused on them and we do not have a hard and firm decision; this is a give and take, for us anyway. I would just say that my thoughts now are based on my limited experience here and perhaps in a perfect world might work but the realities of this place may not allow them. My concern with the whole process was that in many ways, I saw us doing line ministry business. For instance, we would have people from the health profession, health care, come in who would be making the case to us that their particular health concerns or areas of expertise or financial need should be placed in a position of high priority. Then under transportation, we had different submissions made by individuals who again felt that their particular issue needed to be high. I just had a bit of a problem with that because that has to be sort of all or nothing to be effective. We either sit down and listen to virtually every single interest group that is out there, so that we can adequately weigh them all equally, which I would suggest is probably impossible, or we try to limit ourselves to dealing with the macroeconomics of the province. That is what I would throw out for discussion, that it would be nice if we had many of the same groups—the agricultural group, the labour groups, business, banks, investments, financial institutions and so on—all the players come in but give us their perspective on the macro and where they think we ought to be targeting in terms of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government.

In conjunction with that—again I do not know how practical this is—I thought it was helpful when the ministers came in. The ministers who did come in here at least were able to share with us the difficult choices that they saw and what were their global dollar needs.

Again, I find it hard to believe that any Treasurer is sitting down and looking at budget line item in a particular ministry in real detail. I just do not think that is practical or possible. That is what the minister is there for. What the Treasurer is looking at is, "Out of the global budget, how much can we or should we allocate for health or transportation?" I have understood from my colleague—the minister of that particular area—these are the priorities that they have and these are the needs they have and I would agree that this is the way we ought to prioritize our dollars.

There are 26 or 27 line ministries. We listen to an awful lot of submissions anyway; if we were to have all of those ministers come in, at the end of that we would have a pretty fair sense of the major fiscal pressures that each of the ministers was facing. My colleague across the way has been in cabinet and would know better than I, but that is probably not unlike what happens in cabinet, at P and P and during the budget process.

In order for that to be effective in practical politics—and this is where it may not work—you would have to have in place a process where virtually every line ministry went through a public consultation opportunity so that those people who do want to come in and make a specific proposal for their area of concern or expertise still have an opportunity to do so. What is not going to happen in this place is that we change this process by simply cutting people out from coming to the end of the table. Even if it is not having the impact that many would like to think it does, I still do not see how, in real political terms, we are ever going to be able to say to someone: "You are not coming in any more. You will no longer be able to come in and make your annual pitch, even though you realize you are not changing the world every time you come in and do that."

To summarize, Mr Chair, and I appreciate your indulgence, from where I sit, I think it would be best for us if we were dealing with the macro monetary and fiscal issues and we were receiving briefings from the ministers so that we understood the fiscal constraints they were under. From that perspective, we could then offer up to the Treasurer those key areas in the macro sense that we think he ought to be looking at, knowing that the only way that will work is if each of the ministries—either through committees or some other process—is allowing those same groups that are coming in to see us an opportunity to come in. Quite frankly, that ought to be happening. The Ministry of Health should be allowing those interest groups to come in, through some process, and make a case for their share of that slice of the pie.

Mr Phillips: I probably have a bit of a fundamental difference of opinion on that. I think the process that we went through actually is not all bad; it is not perfect, but democracy is not very perfect. I really think it would be a mistake for the public to think that their only input is through the ministries and for us to change our focus to be dealing with the ministries. I think it serves quite a worthwhile function that people feel they have some access to this place. That surely is the message all of us get, that this place, even symbolically, is surrounded by a moat. Interestingly enough, there is only one cross-bridge if you look at it over there; there is one traffic light where you can get across this thing, and as the traffic builds up, symbolically this place runs the risk of being even more remote from people.

One thing that is effective about city councils and school boards is that they are very close to the people, and anybody who has got a complaint, whether it be about the dandelions on their neighbour's lawn or their taxes, has access. Here, I do not want to do anything that moves in other direction. Every ministry has a lineup of advocacy groups that the minister sees—just look at their schedule—but many groups feel they do not really have access; they may get their half hour, but when they leave the bureaucrats tell the minister why it cannot be done. Therefore, I think we have to keep this process open.

As for the changes I would consider making—I think it will be a lot better at it next year anyway; I mean, we know the process, we will know the budget and all that sort of stuff—they would be perhaps to have a more detailed briefing from the Treasurer with an outlook for the next five years, maybe even sending that to the groups that are going to present here in advance so they at least have some understanding of the financial realities that the Treasurer is facing him.

I would not advocate fundamental change at this stage. I think the three weeks probably were about adequate. I think people at least who want to have their say knew that they could have their say. You will find it will ebb and flow. Next year there will be a different group of people here. Everybody knows this takes place anyway, and if they are strongly they will show up. But the fundamental point is that we have got to be careful not to do anything that makes this place more remote from people.

Mrs Sullivan: I apologize for having come in late, but I think I caught the gist of some of Mr Christopher's remarks. I think one of the things he was conveying on behalf of the Treasurer in his views to us was that the Treasurer would like to see a committee that operates in a way that is more comparable to that of the British House of Commons where each member serves as an individual rather than as a representative of a party. We have seen some move to that kind of committee operation in Ottawa with the final committee there chaired by Don Blenkarn. That has been the tradition here. In fact, this committee has existed for an awfully long time.

The question that I suppose we will all have to ask is where we see the positioning of this committee. Do we see ourselves as being an advocate of a position that may or may not be accepted by government, having reached that conclusion as a committee? I think of Don Blenkarn and his committee and some of the stands they took in Ottawa relating to the GST, to insurance and to the banking industry. They did have a strong and important communications effort and probably had an influence on some of the decisions that were made by that government.

I am not certain at this point if our own caucuses have looked at those questions to see the kind of committee structure and the independence of the committee that is comparable to that in Ottawa. Certainly that was the hope of the previous Treasurer when he asked the House and House leaders to put forward and introduce this committee. His hope was that, in fact, the committee would take on issues that were of importance in the economy, but it was very clear that this was not a ministerial vetting committee. The decisions would have been made by the committee after having dealt with people and organizations who represented a point of view, who had problems and wanted to bring them forward to some place that was open and so be willing to listen. The committee also, certainly at the federal level, and it was the intention that this committee would be able to engage outside consultants, were that necessary.

At some point we may want to have that kind of discussion. I am not sure that of the issues we are likely to deal with over the next period of time, the issue is a pervasive one: Are we going to be an independent committee, or how are we going to operate?

I think it would be dead wrong to move away from involving people from the community in appearances before the committee. One of the things that all the standing committees of the House have been able to do over a period of time is to bring people in from outside this place and from outside areas that each of us represent. We all need to be more familiar with those issues and concerns in our own constituencies. The broader-based view that can be brought to the committee through an umbrella group or through individuals who are facing issues in their daily life is a matter of extreme importance, and I would not want to go into the ministry consultative process in terms of any budget determination program.

I was kind of taken aback by some of Mr Christopherson's remarks. I think it might be useful, just as an exercise, perhaps after the budget is finished or in an informal session, to have perhaps the Secretary of the Management Board and the Deputy Treasurer come and explain, to the new members particularly, what is in the budget process internally. The pressures are identified by the cabinet and are put forward through the estimates process and through other processes. I think it might have been useful even to have that kind of understanding before we went through this process, but I thought the sessions this year worked pretty well.

I was impressed with the breadth and the differing sophistication and the different financings behind the groups and organizations and individuals who came before us. There was a good cross-section, it seems to me, of interests. There were a couple of areas that we probably could have added a little bit more to by extending invitations, and maybe that is an area where we should put some attention on. I thought the three weeks was a reasonable period of time, and we could have extended that into night sittings if we had had more demand. But it was a pretty good cross-section. I thought it worked quite well this year: lots of opportunity for discussion with the groups and to ask questions, too. I would just leave it like that. I think this is the wrong place for the cabinet ministers to be in, basically, making their public fight before individual members for a particular or different share of the budget.

Mr B. Ward: I agree with Mr Christopherson in the sense that, from a macro standpoint, and as Mr Sutherland mentioned, there were some sectors that were not represented at this committee. I think Mrs Sullivan and Mr Phillips agree that we should not be constraining groups; we should be encouraging all sectors that are represented by umbrella groups to present their views on a provincial standpoint.

I personally felt the time allocated was a little bit constraining, and we could look at expanding that to possibly four weeks. I just felt personally it was a little bit constraining in our attempts to get the report completed. That is where it seemed to be really constraining: to get the report completed on time.

The Chair: So you want more time for the actual discussion of the resolutions and the writing of the report?

Mr B. Ward: Yes. I think there was a little bit of constraint there as far as completion of the report went.

The other concern I have, and I do not think it has been discussed yet, is that since we held the meetings here, the groups that were present were primarily from the greater Toronto area. Perhaps we should be looking at some avenues to allow the groups that cannot be here; perhaps we should be going to them to allow a representation, particularly in the north. I know there are some umbrella organizations from the north that for whatever reason felt they could not be present, but we should be looking at perhaps having some meetings outside of Toronto in the future.

Mr Sutherland: Has this committee ever gone on tour of the province for the pre-budget consultation process?

The Chair: No. I am approaching this—from where I sit here—as a sort of post-pre-budget consultation review so we can look at how to make the process better and recommend any changes to the whips.

Mr Stockwell: I do not think we should get bent out of shape too much with the thoughts of our own self-importance. We are pretty insignificant in the whole scheme of things. I accept that, being from probably the most insignificant party at Queen's Park because we are in third place. Maybe it is easier for me to say it rather than others because we lost. In my opinion, the fact is that our input is negligible, and I think we should remember that. Touring would give the impression that we feel our input into the budget process is a lot more significant than it truly is. I do not necessarily think the system that was in place was all that bad, frankly. I think it was pretty good.

I am in agreement too with respect to access and people coming forward. It seems politics at Queen's Park, which is different from politics in City Hall, is way more geared to special interest groups. It seems your life is spent hearing from special interest groups. I suppose that is the way politics is everywhere at the provincial and federal levels; they get their 10 or 15 minutes, make their pitch and go on their way. I do not think they take this pitch very significantly either because—let's be frank—you are not talking to the minister. You are talking to a parliamentary assistant, maybe, who sits on the committee, and a group of members from the government side, who I am sure talk to the minister but not on a regular basis about the issues and policies of the day, and from the other parties in the House, who probably never talk to the minister on policy issues, etc.

We should dismiss this touring idea right away. It will be a colossal waste of money, in my opinion, and it will just raise people's hopes in other sections of the province, who will think, "Gee, a committee is coming up there; let's make a pitch and we'll get our way," or something along those lines. Why not let the Treasurer tour? It would be far more appropriate if the Treasurer toured Ontario and got input from people around the province. I think it would be extremely helpful if he did that.

The only thing I would ask is that there be some method to see if there are more private citizens out there who want to make a pitch. It is difficult, I know, and I suppose we could be here for the rest of our lives hearing from them, but I would like to hear from a few more than we did. I agree special interest groups are good to hear from as well, but they always have an axe to grind. There is a reason for their being here and you pretty much know what they are going to say before they even make their pitch. It is like the parties: You pretty much knew what your report was going to say before it came out, and our report, and so on and so on.

With respect to ministers, I do not see that as a very worthwhile exercise for them to be appearing before us. We are committed to hearing from the public, and any way we can make it easier for the public to come before us and give their pitch I think is appropriate. As Mr Phillips said a few minutes ago, next year we will probably be better at it and will offer different viewpoints; potentially we will have a better committee next year, a little smoother running, and maybe reach out and get some different groups in here. It seems to me from what I have read on previous groups that it tends to be the same ones year after year. Maybe that is the way it is always going to be, but it would be nice if we could get some fresh ideas, maybe a few radical ideas. What the heck; you are in government only once, maybe twice.

Mr Christopherson: That is what you guys thought; you thought it was just for ever.

I want to deal with Mr Stockwell's comments first. I apologize for having to had slip out for a moment; I cut the conversation short to take the call because I did want to hear what he had to say. When I came back, I started out agreeing with him 100% and slowly he started losing me as the rest of his argument unfolded.

Mr Stockwell: You will find that happens a lot.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, that is what your former colleagues tell me; it was their experience with you.

I knew that by even broaching the issues I did that I would be open to, let's just say being run at and leave it at that—interpretations that others would like to place on it. Mr Stockwell in his opening comments succinctly established that just because people are coming in and we are allowing them to have a say and raising their hopes that things are going to happen, there is a real concern about whether, because we are allowing that to happen, there is any real input and real effective change.

I would not find too much disagreement with what Mr Stockwell said, that basically you could have each of us write down, in a sealed envelope ahead of time, where we thought generally each of the reports was going to go, and you probably would not have been too far off the mark. Granted, on specifics—because we learned about the issues—some priorities were changed as a result of what came in, what people told us. But by and large I think that if you looked at the previous reports you could pretty guess where the thrust of the three parties was going to be in this report. That is what concerns me.

Mr Phillips mentioned that people should feel like they have access. That is my concern, that there is an impression that people are having a real access to the decision making by virtue of coming in to the end of the table. I will try to be non-partisan in this approach, but I really think that if there is going to be change in public input, it is not that you are just saying to people, "Yes, come in and let us hear your say," because you can easily build a system where everybody has their say but that say does not have a lot of impact on the ultimate decision. That is what concerns me, that I would like to see a greater impact.

I am concerned, as a member of this Legislature, about the influence this report will have. It will have a greater impact on this Treasurer as it has had on the prior Treasurer—I would hope more, but you would expect more. I say that—but I do not know that this report, because of the system we have, is having the kind of effect that we want. I think we would really like to see people have access to the process, and that is why I emphasize that nobody should be denied his say, but maybe the say should be better placed. Or maybe we ought to change what happens to that say in terms of how we deal with it.

My concern is that we may be making people feel good or feel like they have access, to quote Mr Phillips, but that are not effectively empowering anybody, which is really one of the key aspects of government in the 1990s—to empower groups, to empower people. I am not impugning the motives of the arguments that Mr Phillips gave back across the way, nor those of Mrs Sullivan; I am just suggesting that maybe we need the kind of radical changes that Stockwell has talked about.

I am not married to the idea of ministers coming here or any particular aspect of what I suggested, but I am trying to generate the idea—at the risk of leaving my mind open to the kind of runs I had and that you could make those concerns—that we maybe need to be looking at making this whole thing more effective and not just tinkering with a process that we have been handed down from the previous Legislature. I will not point any fingers because I do not think that is appropriate, and that is not what I think was said.

I liked what Mrs Sullivan said about the idea of looking at what they are doing federally, where that seems to be having some impact. I am not as familiar with the British system for their committees as Mrs Sullivan seems to be, but I like that kind of thinking. I like the idea of saying, "Okay, let's set aside what we do here, just for the sake of argument, and have a clean slate in front of us and say, 'What kind of things could we do?'" rather than saying, "This is the best system and all we need to do is tinker with it to make it work." That is what worries me. I really would feel bad if at the end of four or five years we were still turning out reports and had a process that still did not have any greater impact on the Treasurer and on the cabinet than it now has. I would not feel good about that.

Mr Sutherland: I want to come back to the issue of whether this committee tours. Mr Stockwell made ab-point that he would like to have more individual input, but he does not think touring is a very valuable process. As someone who had the opportunity to sit on the select committee on Ontario in Confederation—and Mr Stockwell sat on that committee for a couple of days as well—I know that from the day I sat in, that is when you get the individual representations. I think if you look overall at the select committees or at those committees that do go out and tour around the province, you find more input from individual citizens there than in the committees that just hold hearings here. I think that, if you really want input from the average citizens or individual citizens out there, touring is one of the better options of doing that.

We heard from a couple of school boards from this area, ones that had appeared before this committee before, and they certainly had valuable input, but not all their concerns are similar to those of other individual school boards and community health groups in those areas. It is obviously far more expensive; there is no doubt about it. I do not think we should cast aside the idea of touring, particularly since we now know that this committee has not toured at all for that pre-budget process.

Mr Hansen: A lot of my questions have been answered already, but one thing is that the ad we had put in the newspaper stated that we would travel if it was necessary, it just happened that most of the groups' headquarters are based here in Toronto; so that is why I figured we did not get any requests to travel outside of Toronto to hold hearings.

The other thing is that in one of our subcommittees where we discussed which groups we would be asking to come; so we decided on the groups we would be requesting to make a presentation to the committee. I had a strong feeling about a group known as Shop Ontario, which in my particular area has got quite a concern. Not knowing the process of Shop Ontario, and knowing the chamber of commerce was making a presentation, I approached Tony Commisso and said it would be a great opportunity for their group to approach the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

Sometimes we have to do a little bit of teaching—it may be in our particular ridings or whatever the case may be—to inform people that this committee is here and to make presentations so we wind up getting them in here. This is something that is coming up in the future that we will be discussing on cross-border shopping; so it actually gives us an insight into our upcoming discussions in this particular area.

As Mr Christopherson asked some of the questions and made some of the statements, that is what I have to say on the matter.

100

Mr Phillips: My blood is boiling a bit over Mr Christopherson's comments. When I ask people to come here, I listen to them and I care about what they say. It is not that I feel and then ignore them. I will tell you, there is intellectual arrogance beginning to creep in and you guys had better watch it. I am as sincere as I can be on this, because if you think the people of this province do not want to come here and be heard, you are dead wrong. I will continue to fight and make certain that anyone who wants to let his views be known has that opportunity.

I guess I wanted to make absolutely sure that when I say people feel, they feel and in reality have it. I listened to every one of those presentations. They all sink in, they all have an impact on the background, and I do not think we can be selective. I still recall one of the members across there saying, "I don't know why that group or that individual had a chance to speak, because they are represented by another group." I am prepared to listen to individuals who may disagree with the organizations they may belong to. I do not think we can be selective in who we want to hear from in this province.

Mr Christopherson: We seem to be going down exactly the road that I expected. It does not surprise me that you might feel a little defensive, if indeed it was the last government that implemented this process. I am not suggesting that any of us did not listen. What I am suggesting is that the ultimate product may not have the kind of impact on the decision-making that people like to think it has or that we hope it has. I have said very clearly that I think this report will have the same impact and effect on the current Treasurer as it had on the previous Treasurer. I am not faulting either one of them. I am suggesting that there must be a better way of having what we hear reach the actual decision-making point, other than just this report.

I am now running the risk of running afoul of my own government but, as a member who has come from a grassroots level of government, as you have, to Mr Phillips, I have a concern that this is not having the kind of effect that it should have. I say that as a member from Hamilton Centre. I think there ought to be greater impact on the decision-making based on what people are telling us at the end of the table.

What I did not say in my previous remarks was that, based on the process we just went through, you could probably rename this committee the funding advocacy committee more than the finance and economic affairs committee because we spent as much time dealing with individual advocacy groups as we did on the macro question. I am not saying that is wrong from a Legislator's point of view. What I am questioning is where those discussions are taking place. Might it not be more effective, I am suggesting, for us to have a better process for people who want to talk about specific advocacies rather than having their concerns lumped in—because I cannot think of a better phrase—with those of the people who are coming forward and talking to us about the macro question, which is what we did. My concern is that we are dealing with apples and oranges.

In terms of personal commitment, I would love to be on all the committees that heard from everybody, as I am sure Mr Phillips would, because he cares and I have seen that and I believe it sincerely. I do not think either one of us wants to impugn the other's motives in this discussion, but what I am suggesting is that I think there could be a better process. Maybe a committee like this would do better by getting into a lot of the projections about the unemployment figures that are expected—I am not phrasing it right—a lot of the projections we heard from people who spent a good 45 minutes with charts doing very in-depth, comprehensive reviews about where this province is going vis-à-vis other provinces, the Americans, the global market.

What are the key areas we ought to be focusing on? Through the whole thing there is a great emphasis on the manufacturing sector. I just see so much business coming through here, so many key things that are important, from the dandelion funding programs right through to Michael McCracken talking to us about his view of where we are going in an economic forecast for the next year, that I think we could probably better serve those people who are coming forward, and allow more people to come forward, if we changed the process. I was throwing it out, off the top of my head, not having given it a great deal of thought or research, saying, "Here's a suggestion for the sake of discussion about how we might do it."

I am prepared to listen to the ideas that Mrs Sullivan put forward. If Mr Stockwell has any of his radical ideas in his vest pocket, I am prepared to listen to those too. But what I do not want to do, and this is my position, is to see us just tinker with this, because I do not think it is good enough. I do not think we are giving the people what they think we are giving them through this process, and that is the bottom line of my concern.

Mr Phillips: I do not think you read either our minority report or the Conservative minority report, in that they both dealt with macro issues. It was the majority report that itemized 60 recommendations. The process has the full scope to allow us to make macro recommendations. You chose to go with—I do not know—52 recommendations, but an important part of the backdrop of all of that is, what are people thinking out there? I am rejecting strongly limiting people's access to this committee to give us the necessary background to form our opinions. I will fight for a long while to avoid the élitism of saying: "We know best, and we will deal with the numbers here."

Mr Sutherland: No one is trying to limit the public's access. The suggestion put forward by Mr Christopherson is, you still have public input; it is a question of where is the most effective place of putting it. Is it the committee having everyone come in, as they have here? The alternative would certainly require a change in the way ministries deal with it, because they would have to go through a far more formalized process than they have now. I do not think any of the ministries has a system in place to do the type of things that Mr Christopherson has suggested, that those groups go specifically there and then the individual ministries come here. That may be a better way; it may not be. There are also other options. No one here is trying to deny the public's access to making input and giving suggestions and recommendations. It is a question of whether this committee is the best process. There is a question whether some of Mr Christopherson's suggestions are the best process, or maybe there is another method out there that is even better than that. I think we all want to try to improve the process, and I do not think we should get caught up in the discussion of whether one way is trying to hinder the public's access. We know we all want public input. I think that is a given for any elected official, or should be a given, anyway. I think we should try to refo the discussion away from limiting public access to whet the current method is more effective or Christopherson's suggestions would be more effective other alternatives would be more effective.

The Chair: There have been a number of comme made, one by Mr Ward about the time of the process: much time was available for hearing submissions and th being able to think about those submissions and make reco mendations. If I read him correctly, there is some quest about the amount of time available for actually digest the material and then making recommendations. Does the committee have a recommendation about the specific co ment that Mr Ward has made? Is there a recommendat or some kind of change we can make in the process t would address that specific question, or are we happy w exactly what we had?

Mr Sutherland: My only suggestion would be tha you had your two weeks or three weeks of hearings, then the committee could have a week off, which would allow ti for the research staff to write the background for the rep and based on the comment, that would also give us time digest it, then come back and write the report that way.

The Chair: Okay, that is one recommendation: a w between hearings and writing.

Mr Phillips: I think it may be more worthwhile have this discussion in two or three months. We have j been through the one process, but I think time will unf a little bit, and I would rather make a decision on how want to do the pre-budget consultations a little bit la than right now. I just think the economy is going change, and all sorts of things; so we may have quite different view of how we want to run this thing. I am r sure today you are going to be able to nail down th versus four weeks, this or that. You may want to let a li bit of time go by, to see how things unfold, and then v need to do it six months before the budget or give o selves enough time. But as I say, I for one am not sure t today we are going to be able to put in place a process th would be useful here.

The Chair: I guess my concern as Chairman is to t to put something on paper in case there are changes in the makeup of the committee so we could then have so continuity if there are changes. I do not know that there a going to be, but I am thinking down the road; a year is awfully long time in this game.

Mrs Sullivan: As we discuss the kind of process th the committee wants to go through for the next pre-budg sitting, we have to recall that any recommendations th will be made would be going ultimately to the Board Internal Economy in terms of determining the agenda a the funding for the committee. Those are the peramete around which we will be making any kinds of recomme dations. These are not decisions that are going to be made

The other point I wanted to make is that only to certain extent does this committee set its own agenda, that there will be items referred to the committee, perhaps pending on what legislation comes forward directly from the Legislature. Depending on what legislation, if any, comes forward of a nature that this committee can deal with, the items that the committee would be looking at studying and perhaps involving other people from the public would be set out for us. They could be set out while the House is in session, because this is a committee that does meet while the House is in session, or they could be set out for the intersession period, including the summer.

Some things, such as the lengthening of the time for pre-budget hearings, may be out of the hands of this committee. The scheduling of time and dates may be out of the hands of this committee. Once again, I think the majority party has to take into account, as our party did when it was in government, the enormous pressures on the smaller membership of the opposition parties and the conflicts in committee scheduling that may occur from time to time. This committee cannot operate in isolation, and those kinds of things have to be taken into account.

I was going to make another point, not related to process. I think I suggested before that it might be useful at some point, perhaps even in an informal session, to have the Secretary of Management Board and the Deputy Treasurer in to discuss the process. I really feel there is a lack of understanding and appreciation of the kinds of processes that do take place in budget preparation, and I think that would be useful for everyone. I happen to be very familiar with it because I worked intimately in that in another life, but most members do not know what happens and do not understand, for instance, some of the comments about the advocacy groups proceeding to the ministry. If you do not think they are doing and have done that, no matter what government is in power, you are crazy. If you ask your ministers, they will tell you that day after day their time is spent dealing with and talking to the advocacy groups and learning about their financial needs particularly. In doing that, they are also developing their own argumentation and their own views over what will go forward following and included in the estimates process and in the identification of particular pressures that are coming before the government for funding.

So much of the budget is a given in terms of transfers and things like credit costs and so on, that there is a limited amount of freedom in terms of changing the priority of government in budget setting. The ministers are all involved very much in their own lobbying effort to get what they feel is their fair share of the budget; and to find out about that, they are indeed meeting with people. For us to understand the kind of pressures that are going on, it seems to me, going back to who comes and how and the nature of these committee hearings, we should have as open and as broad a group of individuals and organizations coming before us, because only through that process will we as legislators ever be able to see more than a limited scope of lobbying effort.

Those are just observations in response to what I have heard from other statements today.

Mr Stockwell: Not to prolong this debate, I agree with Mr Phillips from the Liberals. I think if you went away for a couple months and thought about it, maybe you could clarify exactly what it is you see as a process that you would be more happy with. I think we should be prepared to do that.

I am not opposed to relooking at this. I do not think anyone is opposed. I just think there are probably some fundamental flaws in some of the arguments put forward. When you build an argument like the one that has been made by the government side, you add building blocks to an argument, and the flaw I see is the foundation to this argument about access and process and so on. The building block has cracked. It reminds me of worrying about mice in the basement when you have got an elephant on your roof. The problem you have here is you are trying to empower people. That is a nice word, and it is a good little phrase, but to empower people you must have power. You guys do not have power. We do not have power. Ministers have power. Premiers have power. That means, then, if someone is going to have some power to influence, he must be speaking to the decision-maker.

Maybe as a parliamentary assistant you have a lot of input into the decision-making process, but none in the cabinet, and that is where the decisions get made. So in a lot of respects we can pretend and, I guess, pretend to give power. I do not have any power in this government; I know that. What I think we should remember is that we are here to hear from the people. We produce these reports and ask the ministers to read them. If they choose to read them, they do; if they choose not to, they do not. That is all we can do. I guess you paint with as broad a brush as you can and try to invite as many people in, and you have your opinion; I have mine. Usually there are two of us, so we have ours and the Liberals have theirs, and we go on our merry way. And for ever and a day, that is government in this country. To change it, I think you are looking at a major revamping of the process. A major revamping means that you people get a lot more free votes than you do right now, and I do not think you are going to get a free vote in the budget. I understand what you are trying to say, and I think it is an noble effort, but I just do not think there is much opportunity to do that.

The only other thing I would point out, Mr Chairman, is that I am not opposed to any concepts or changes that you want to bring forward. I just want to be clear. I do not really think we are that powerful a committee, so I do not want to spend any more money. If we are going to talk about travelling, that is the biggest expense you could have, and I am not prepared to blow thousands and thousands of dollars on this committee, with negligible, if any, power, to go around receiving input from people that will not be listened to—I should not say “listened to,” that is not the right word—that will not be put to the decision-makers. The point again is about the power. To empower people you have to have it and, frankly, folks, we do not have any.

The Chair: I am in the chair, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you. I would suggest the only greater concern than elephants on the roof is maybe bats in the belfry, but we will just leave that sit.

This may scare Mr Stockwell a little—it certainly does me—but I do not think he and I are that far apart in terms of the foundations of the argument. I am not sure where that leaves the Liberals, and probably at that level it is maybe personal and should be dealt with one on one. But anyway, I do not think I disagree that much with a lot of what Mr Stockwell says in terms of the realities. What I would probably disagree with is whether it is at least worth the effort to make the change. I would not disagree that it is a mammoth undertaking, but it truly is a priority for us. We honestly believe that. Now whether we are actually going to be able to change this huge ship of state and make it work differently remains to be seen, but we really want to make that change with a great deal of enthusiasm and I think that sincerely is the message from the Treasurer.

Mr Stockwell: That may be worth your while.

Mr Christopherson: I hear Mr Stockwell saying that it may be worth our while. I hope so, because we are going to make that undertaking. At the risk of people suggesting that we are trying to do other things, I think it is worth the effort and the political risk to try to make that change, and in the final analysis, if we were to be somewhat successful, I suspect there would be a fair bit of support for that change, if and when it was finally concluded.

Two more thoughts. One of Mrs Sullivan's concerns was about making sure that even more people are heard. Again, I do not have a fundamental difference with that. I think it is important that we have maximized people's input. That is what I am talking about. To me, it would make more sense perhaps if we had a subcommittee of this group that said, for instance, "We're here to deal with Health, and we want to cast the net farther than the committees have done in the past," and we had another group that was looking into Transportation. Whether those were made up of other members or part of this group, I do not know, but that kind of work and time and undertaking is worth it because we ought to be listening to as many people as possible. I am just suggesting this current structure may not lend itself to that. I reject—and it is the last time I will comment on it—I reject out of hand any suggestion that there is an attempt to limit people's access. That is a misinterpretation of my comments. My intent is to try to find a system that allows more input, more access and makes that input even more effective.

The last point, on Mr Ward's suggestion, is that I would suggest there is merit in at least making some interim recommendations while the matter is fresh in our mind. I think it is valid to say that, as we get closer to the process, we may feel that we need to make some changes, based on experience, but I think there is also validity in saying: "Hey, we just came through the process; it's very fresh. Let's at least make some recommendations now based on that experience while it's still a live thought."

The Chair: My reading of this debate as the Chair is that we are dancing around the question of how much independent thought or recommendations this committee can have, which to an extent depends on how far the committee members are prepared to go in making recommendations independent of the party, all parties.

I have heard from Mrs Sullivan that the British system has a great deal more independence. I have also heard that the federal finance and economics committee has a great deal more independence. I throw out, as a process of action, the suggestion that we ask the researchers to come back with some information that would contain the rules that have been set out for those committees by their various legislatures or parliaments so that we can have something to compare. There is a free British Airways flight on April 1 and we could all get over there for nothing. Then we would have something to compare it to.

What I think I am hearing—if I am wrong, I am open for debate—is that it really hinges on how much independence this committee is going to have. It is unfortunate that Mr Stockwell left, because I think it is also part of the discussion about power; if this committee is allowed a great deal of latitude and independence to be moving down the road that some other pre-budgetary committees have, the main fact that we make recommendations in the same kind of way that they make recommendations is an achievement of power. There are lots of different ways of achieving power.

Just to sum up, perhaps it would be fruitful at this point to terminate the conversation with a request for the researchers to bring back information about how the other committees have achieved their independence so that we can look at it. Is that acceptable to the committee?

Mr Sutherland: Sure. I just might add, Mr Chairman, that we have had some suggestions put forward; they should be noted and they should be on file somewhere so that when the committee comes back to the discussion they can be referred to and dealt with.

The Chair: Yes, I think those have been noted. I have made note of them, and I know the researchers have too.

The second point of business is, before I ask if we should adjourn or not, is there any reason to have a meeting this afternoon?

Mr Christopherson: Do we not have the issue of deciding what we are going to deal with in front of us? I understood we had tentatively to discuss whether we were going to undertake a review of the cross-border shopping issue.

The Chair: We could do that right now. If we do that right now, then I can instruct the clerk—we as a committee can instruct the clerk; there goes that "I" again—to set the hearings for next Thursday morning with various groups that are interested in the cross-border shopping issue, and he can do that this afternoon as opposed to our meeting and talking about it.

Mr B. Ward: I suggest we meet this afternoon.

Mr Christopherson: I am wondering if we should have a little better game plan than just to say immediately "Fine, let's just have some people in." We should have a sense of what we are going to do and what the process is going to be, again so we do not have people coming with expectations that never get met. I do not want to meet needlessly any more than anyone else, but I think we ought to have a sense of where we are going to go. There are other suggestions my colleagues are mentioning to me that may should be thrown out on the floor that we can consider at the same time and not just take one thing and run with it.

Mrs Sullivan: I think that rather than just going around in circles again on process, it might be useful to have something to talk about that is specific. Perhaps the clerk might prepare a recommendation relating to process and the conduct of hearings that would give us at least something to accept, reject or add to.

Mr Jamison: There are a number of things that are critical out there that I think this committee should consider having a look at. Just off the top of my head, for example, there are the potential effects of a trilateral trade agreement on this province and the potential impact on Ontario of the constitutional crisis. I know the Conservatives in their dissenting report made reference to the lack of discussion about that potential and the economics that are automatically related to that in terms of deficit. I think it is important that we discuss the potential of a trilateral deal on which the federal government is going to proceed on a fast-track kind of basis. We as a province have to fully prepare ourselves to deal with that happening and to be aware of the impacts that are going to evolve from those things. There is very important work out there to be done by this committee if we choose to do so.

The Chair: My understanding is that with the budget not coming until mid-April, it is not really likely that we are going to get a lot to do from the Legislature between now and then; so we have a fair amount of time between now and then that I think we can fairly confidently take as a committee as time that we can structure. We are committed to the cross-border shopping first, but I am at the will of the committee to do trilateral trade and Confederation as well. We discussed that a little bit prior to sitting.

Mr Phillips: Just in terms of process, I seem to recall—unsaid might correct me on this—that we did say to the cross-border group that we as a committee were going to deal with it; so I kind of thought in our informal discussion that we tacitly agreed that would be our first item. I have a difficulty with the subcommittee meeting and saying: "Here's the game plan. Here are the terms of reference. Here's blah, blah, blah," because I think it is tough for us to do it. I do not mind that group of yourself and the three ships being together.

I think we have to lay out our agenda for the year. We talked informally, and personally I am quite interested in the economic impact of the constitutional debate, but I think we need to make certain that we have some direction from the House on that. It will be helpful to the debate whether than harmful and therefore I would like to kind of wait the legislative debate around the committee's report, which comes forward today, I think. If they direct us, I think this committee could be quite useful in it, but I think it has to be very carefully crafted or we could be harmful. I would be quite interested in the debate on trilateral agreement, although I think there too we need some direction on whether that is something that will be helpful to the debate.

There is no shortage. I am just saying I think the first item on our agenda can be the cross-border shopping. It impacts a whole bunch of other stuff that will be informative. Then I think the subcommittee can look at what are the second, third and fourth issues that we could deal with, and we have got a little bit of time on that, including the constitutional debate, which I could see as being the second item we might deal with.

Mr Sutherland: I know we said we were going to do cross-border shopping as the next item, and I would certainly like us to focus in on that and have various concerns about that. I guess my only question is, if we are going to be able to do that effectively, are we going to be able to do that solely from Queen's Park? And then what are the difficulties in terms of taking a standing committee, while the House is sitting, to communities like Niagara Falls, Windsor, Sault Ste Marie and Cornwall? I really think if we are going to have any credibility in terms of doing it, we are going to have to go and visit those communities. I was wondering if either the clerk or maybe some of the more experienced members here could assist me on whether that could be done. If not, maybe we should delay that and go into something we could do more of, possibly the trilateral trade agreement. We could do more of that based out of Queen's Park on our regular days than we could the other one.

The Chair: I have been given two notes now on this one. The general government committee has been requested to do a 12-hour hearing on cross-border shopping. I have one note asking if Mrs O'Neill could come here and discuss that with us. The other note is that, given that committee may or may not be able to get to it, given that Bill 4 is still in that committee—

Mr Sutherland: I would like to have more than 12 hours. I know that is being put forward, and I am glad to see other members of other committees are interested in it, but I am not quite sure whether the use of the 12 hours will give it the degree of attention that it really needs.

The Chair: Okay. Where do I go with this? Come on, folks.

Mr Christopherson: I think Mr Phillips's points are well taken with regard to the priorities, and I know that, in talking to our own members in caucus, the cross-border shopping is, as I am sure in other caucuses, a big issue. I do not particularly care which committee deals with it. I do not feel ownership of the issue. What is important is that it be dealt with effectively. I, as one member of the committee, am prepared to accept the fact that this is our top priority and then ask you, through your office as Chair, to determine whether or not that is an overlap of responsibilities. Is the other committee prepared to have us look at it? In other words, do that groundwork for us and, if it is with them, God bless them, we will move on to another issue. If they want us to tackle it, then we will ask our subcommittee to put together a game plan to bring to us for approval.

Mr Jamison: I am just a little confused, and I might ask Gerry if he would help me here a little bit. Personally, I believe we are really on a fast track to that trilateral deal. It is going to have economic ramifications here in this province. It is my belief that will happen. I think it is crucial that we really try to assess where the federal government, on negotiating that deal, is going to take us and the effects to this province, especially the manufacturing base of this province, and the economy as a whole, what effects we can measure. I know we may not be able to measure them all, but at least we will be able to confirm or otherwise prove ourselves incorrect in assessing what a lot of us have in terms of preconceived notions. Possibly you can help me out on your statement about receiving a directive of sorts on that.

Mr Phillips: There is no shortage of really interesting topics for us to deal with and things that I would find intellectually stimulating. As I said before, I think the whole issue of what is the economic impact of the constitutional debate has not been properly debated. The trilateral agreement with Mexico is another one, and our job thing is another one. Those are three overwhelming issues. Each of them, though, I think, is going to unfold a little bit over the next little while, and in the meantime we have the cross-border shopping, which seems to me a bite-sized issue that I felt we made a commitment to a group of people who came in here that we were going to deal with. Do you remember that group? I thought, here is at least one issue we can get rolling on. I happen to think a constitutional debate is going to be obviously huge, but it has to be handled extremely sensitively.

I am saying I personally would like to deal with the cross-border shopping and buy ourselves a little time in case the Legislature would like this committee to deal with the economic impact of a constitutional debate. If that is the case, then that, to me, would be our next priority. We will know that, I think, maybe in the next little while. The Premier and those who are dealing with it may say, "Yes, it is important for Ontario to begin looking at economic impact," and the committee would be appropriate. If it proves that is not in the cards for this committee to deal with, then we move to our third and fourth priorities, which in my opinion could be a trilateral debate around Mexico or it could be around jobs.

I am repeating myself. We have an issue that could occupy our time for the next three to four weeks—an important issue—giving ourselves the time to look at what might become the number one issue. If that is not the case, then that is what I meant. I think the Treasurer and the Premier may want us to look at it.

Mrs Sullivan: I also want to express caution about moving into the economic impact analysis of changes in the structure of the country. There have been no decisions yet made. An indication by a committee of this Legislature that it was conducting studies based on one, two, three or four scenarios and was hearing briefs from the public on any of those scenarios, whether they include re-Confederation, a restructuring of Confederation, or independence for Quebec, it seems to me, is in terms of the national dialogue a very dicey proposition at this point. I think it is something that clearly has to be done. Looking at those questions must be done.

I think now is the wrong time for this committee to be undertaking that. We will be having the initial debate on the first interim report of the select committee on Ontario in Confederation, which has been out through the province, starting this afternoon in the House, and presumably there will be a second phase of that Constitution committee activity, which will be very important.

The Premier has yet to speak in a formal way on matter of the Constitution, and any dialogue that will place will have to follow clearly whatever stand the premier ultimately takes. Signals of a downturn in Ontario economy or an upturn in Ontario's economy, or whatever could seriously distort the nature of the debate, which heretofore been fairly non-partisan in terms of constitutional issues, and could have very serious repercussions relating to the future of the country itself.

I think now is the wrong time for that debate. On trilateral negotiations, we have a lot to learn certainly, that may be something that would be useful to look at the Constitution thing—although I personally think premature for this committee to be looking at—if the Legislature wanted us to proceed in that direction perhaps the summer, with extremely substantial contracts given people who have expertise in the economic area to do analysis that would be needed, then I think that would perhaps a more reasonable time as things unfold a some of the debate.

On cross-border shopping, we did certainly give commitment, to the people who were here, and it is certainly an issue that affects the north, southwestern Ontario and eastern Ontario. It is a province-wide issue in many ways, and it is something that is concise enough, I think that the committee can deal with and make some reasonable recommendations about. I think that is the way to proceed.

Mr Hansen: I have to agree with Mrs Sullivan that. In our first subcommittee meeting, or the second one when we had discussed groups that we were going to interview—Mr Sterling, Mr Kwinter and I—all agreed that the next item that would be on the agenda—and I do not think it has changed any; it is more of a serious problem now since the introduction of the GST—is that people are making a tax revolt by shopping in the United States. We have to take a look at this very closely, especially when we have 90% of the population within two hours of the border, the other 10% in the north. I know Mr Sterling, in the discussions we had with the group that came in, did not feel that was all that important. I argued with him on the point that tourists cannot make it into Ontario to spend US dollars if they cannot get across the border and will never make it to Ottawa or Carleton.

It is a very important issue, and I do not think we should backtrack and get sidetracked to get into another issue, because we have businesses now in the Niagara area that are going out of business. We have farmers in Chatham and Bruce who are finding the effect of people in the border towns and bordering towns of actually buying their milk in the US. Even though you do not live within two hours of the border, the people who are over the two hours and live in the north are being affected by what is being purchased by the 90% who live around the borders.

I recommend that we get on with the cross-border shopping and not necessarily, as Mr Phillips said, I believe, that we have to go to all these centres. Money is given out by the Ontario government to do studies in the particular areas, and I think the one thing we should have fore this committee is the report by the chamber of commerce in Sault Ste Marie, which is a very detailed study that I think was partially paid for by the Ontario government. There is one in the Niagara area; I know $12,000 is given in that area for Shop Ontario, and I believe Ontario and Windsor and Kingston and The Islands.

Before we make any decision about travelling to hear people, I can tell you that I hear people every day about the tax revolt, saying: "I am shopping in the United States. I am not paying the GST." When the GST came in on 1 January, it actually doubled the traffic to the United States, I would say. On this side, I feel this is one of the most important things we can take on as the next exercise for this committee.

Mr Christopherson: On behalf of my colleagues in the government caucus, I would say the commitment would be honoured to do the cross-border shopping. I think that goes without saying. The trilateral trade agreement should be our second priority and leave ourselves flexible. I think the points were well taken from the members of the Liberal caucus regarding the constitutional discussions, the sensitivities, and I think what we are saying is we should remain flexible as a committee to receive any direction from the Legislature at the appropriate time, would they feel that work would be beneficial. We would do the cross-border shopping, and then the trilateral trade agreement as being the two priorities, in that order, for this committee.

The Chair: Is that a consensus?

Mr Phillips: My only comment would be that I do not want the trilateral one, if in fact the Legislature wanted us to deal with economic impact, which I have a feeling they will not, that would certainly be the number one priority for me, if they wanted us to. I doubt if they will.

Mr Christopherson: I do not think we have any choice, do we? The Legislature can literally dictate what the agenda is, if they so choose. So I think—

The Chair: That also comes back to this whole notion of independence and what kind of changes in the committee structure there are. If we can go down an independent road, how far do we go down that road and in what direction? Anyway, that is for another debate.

Mr Sutherland: If there seems to be a consensus on this, then you as Chair can approach the House leaders, I guess it would be, or whomever, to see whether we could deal with that issue. Mr Hansen is far more knowledgeable in this area than I am. I just think in terms of perception that we are not going to have a lot of credibility if we only deal with the issue of cross-border shopping, from sitting here in Queen's Park.

I do not know if it is going to be possible, but I would really hope in these hearings that we could get some of the regular people who are doing cross-border shopping to really find out what some of their thinking is in doing it. I mean, we can speculate on some of the reasons, and we know cost is part of it, but I think part of the issue is going to be educational issues, and I just do not think we are going to be able to handle it credibly solely from Queen's Park.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Chair, to summarize, does this mean then that the subcommittee will meet to put together a game plan based on the information you find out and that they will report to us with their recommendations at the earliest possible date?

The Chair: To take a little leeway here, I would like us to come out of this meeting right now with instructions to the clerk to start setting up hearings for next Thursday morning.

Mrs Sullivan: I so move.

Mr B. Ward: But we do not know what the game plan is.

The Chair: We do know that we are looking at Sunday shopping and—

Mr Sutherland: Cross-border shopping.

The Chair: Sorry; cross-border shopping.

Mr Phillips: I do not mind that. You may want to start us off with a brief of some sort.

The Chair: I am getting it in this ear and I am getting it in this ear. The clerk has just suggested briefings from Revenue; Tourism and Recreation, and Industry, Trade and Technology.

Mr Phillips: Yes, that is all internal stuff. Then we can go to the public ones.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Christopherson: I do not want to be overtechnical in terms of process, but I have had enough experience in government at the local level to know that it is fraught with disaster to begin down a road when you do not have a clue ultimately where you are going. Even if the subcommittee met after the House, gets into its regular business, at 3:30 for half an hour, itself, or 45 minutes, and then we met to deal with the recommendations they make, even if it is a very obvious plan, I would still like to have it on paper so we know where we are going and we can tell people whom we are contacting that this is what we are doing.

The Chair: All right. What I am hearing is the subcommittee meeting at 3:30 and full committee hearing at 4 o'clock.

Mr Christopherson: Can you do it in half an hour?

The Chair: I think we should do it in half an hour. Okay. The subcommittee meeting is at 3:30; the committee reconvenes at 4 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1152.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1610.

The Chair: I see a quorum. The subcommittee, for the approval of the entire committee, has set out a tentative agenda that is extremely flexible. Prior to next Thursday morning, the researcher, Anne Anderson, will distribute some studies that have already been done in preparation for next Thursday morning when we will be able to ask her questions about her study and about what she has found out and so on.

In the afternoon, the subcommittee has considered that we should have the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology come and give us information that it has discovered from its own studies that it did last summer, while we were all out knocking on doors. So far so good? After that, the clerk and the researchers will get together and invite people to come in and fill out a hearings list, with the hope of having two groups in the morning and two groups in the afternoon, to try to finish Thursday afternoon earlier than 6 o'clock.

Mr Sutherland: Can I just ask on that point, are we sitting right until 6 o'clock next Thursday?

The Chair: No, that is not the intention.

Mr Sutherland: Is the House sitting right until 6 o'clock?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Christopherson: What happens after that, and ultimately what are we looking at doing?

The Chair: Ultimately we are looking at producing a report with recommendations in it for the government, if possible; if not, a report that will at least be available for all the members of the House to have to consider the various options and the various problems associated with Sunday shopping. It would be nice to have recommendations that the government or the House could act on.

Mr Christopherson: What happens after next Thursday?

The Chair: The hearings continue for the next couple of consecutive Thursdays.

Mr Christopherson: A raindrop in a storm. Thank you. You have added to it.

The Chair: There is no time limit that the subcommittee has recommended. Four Thursdays would give us 18 hours if we sat right from 3:30 to 6. There has been no timetable decided.

Mr Christopherson: What about the suggestion of Mr Sutherland of perhaps trying to get out to some of these communities? Did you find out whether that is even feasible while we are sitting as a Legislature?

Mrs Sullivan: No, it is not.

Mr Sterling: The House leaders will never allow you to.

The Chair: The best we could do is to leave here some time around 8:30 in the morning and be back by 1 o'clock.

Mr Sterling: I do not think they will allow you to do that. The problem is that it does not relate to what we are doing; it relates to what else is happening in this place. soon as you draw the members away from this area, the the House leaders and the whips cannot get hold of you and that is why they will never give you permission something like this. If it were something that was really urgent, then you might be able to get it. But I have proven wrong before. You can ask if you want.

The Chair: I think the committee would have to decide how much benefit there would be. Mr Stockwell has already indicated that he is not in favour at all of doing any travelling because he thinks the whole process is somewhat—

Mr Sutherland: He was referring to the pre-budget consultation process. I do not think he made any comment on the cross-border shopping issue.

The Chair: I will be generous and allow that. I have a feeling that he was not too fond of the idea of travelling at all, but that is fine. I stand to be corrected.

Mr Christopherson: To follow up on that, the last thing anybody wants to do in tight times is spend more money that is not necessary, and I do not particularly want to go on the kind of schedule really that would have us yank around for half a day and then back in here and trying to do everything else.

However, I believe that on this issue, if we really want to get to the bottom of the problem and give everybody an opportunity to speak, getting to as many of those communities as possible would be fairly important. I would request or suggest that we request you to ask whoever is appropriate whether it is just the government House leader or all of them, or the right place, whether or not a consideration would be given. If not, fine; so be it. If it would, I, as a member, think that would be good. I know that if you were to Sault Ste Marie, for instance, there are a lot of people who would like and really appreciate the chance to come forward and give a committee like this their opinions on the matter, and I have talked to other members who have similar situations in their community.

Having said that, the only other thing I wanted to mention is, I gather that since we met this morning, you have checked and we do not have an overlap of two committees doing the same thing.

The Chair: You were checking.

Mrs Sullivan: I can speak to that. Is it the standing committee on general government?

The Chair: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: General government is in fact going to be dealing with it on an opposition day resolution. They will not be getting to it on their agenda until much later. We are ready to start our work now and it is an opposition day thing, so this committee can set its own agenda.

Mr Christopherson: Nobody then, through you, Mr Chair, is perceiving that this would be an overlap of work?

Mrs Sullivan: No.

Mr Christopherson: Good.

Mrs Sullivan: It is our party's opposition day resolution and we are quite comfortable with this committee proceeding.

The Chair: When is that opposition day? Do you know that yet?

Mrs Sullivan: No, it has not been scheduled yet.

Mr Christopherson: You will appreciate that the independent-minded NDPers did not check with anybody. We are just prepared to go ahead and do this. I say that tongue-in-cheek. Could I go back then to the other issue of travelling to those communities?

Mr Sterling: I am not willing to travel when the House is sitting. I will travel in the summer to any of those communities that you mentioned, but I am just not willing to go during the House. I am the chairman of my caucus and I cannot be away from this building for more than a couple of hours at most and I have to be within phone, you know, within a reasonable distance. That is the problem I run into and—

Mr Christopherson: And I can respect that, truly.

The Chair: Did you want to say something, Kimble?

Mr Sutherland: I just have a problem with process. I mean we are going to put this report together and I just ask the people in those communities that are most affected are going to question the credibility of the report.

Mr Sterling: Let's put it together and start now.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. As long as we have some idea of that, but I am just wondering whether that is going to be the main priority or whether one of the other topics that have been—

0

Mr Sterling: We have nothing else on our agenda at the moment now.

The Chair: We can request moneys to bring people in.

Mr Sutherland: Yes, I quite realize you can do that. I am still not sure whether the—

Mr Sterling: That is not as good as going.

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Mr Sterling: In a lot of cases these will be small businesses people who can only be away a couple of hours from their businesses or whatever.

Mr Sutherland: That is right.

Mr Sterling: I agree with Kimble that it is important that we go.

Mr Sutherland: As long as we have the understanding that this is not going to be a three- or four-week process to try to wrap up and make all the recommendations.

Mr Sterling: Let's start it now and see where it leads. Well, if we seem to be getting somewhere and we want to go to those communities at that time, you are going to have my agreement. I am not anxious to finish it in three or four weeks.

The Chair: Okay. Maybe this could be done in two phases. We could do cross-border shopping and have hearings here and get as much as we can accomplish here and then perhaps do phase two in the summertime and go to Sault Ste Marie or do the travelling at the committee stage in the summer, provided the House will agree to that. Is that reasonable? Try for an interim report?

Mr Christopherson: Can I just throw out an idea? I can appreciate not wanting to be away, especially with the responsibilities that Mr Sterling has, and all of us have in fact. We are not going that far. Some of it is down the Niagara Peninsula. The select committee on Ontario in Confederation, for instance, was doing a lot of travelling out and travelling back in the same day. Is it not possible at all that we drive down the peninsula one evening and we are back here that evening, or back in time for the House the next day? Or is that just not realistic? I ask that in all innocence.

Mr Sterling: I do not think that is realistic. Once you go to one area you are meant as far as all the rest go. Then you have Sault Ste Marie calling and saying, "Why didn't you come to our place?"

Mr Christopherson: That is an hour's flight. You really could go out and come back fairly quick.

Mrs Sullivan: What about Fort Frances?

Mr Sutherland: You have to go to—

The Chair: Just a minute. I am losing control here. Mr Hansen was next.

Mr Sterling: I just think once you start you have to really do a little bit of travelling.

Mr Hansen: I think that if we went to the peninsula we would get a feeling, because the same feeling is going to be in Sault Ste Marie and in Fort Frances. It is going to be the same so we get a sample, and if it is necessary, then we can go to these other communities and do the same thing. But I think what you find in Sault Ste Marie you are going to find in the Niagara area or in Fort Frances. It is the same commodities that are being purchased in the United States. I do not think it differs with what border crossing you go across. So I think the feeling that we get from, say, the merchants and the shoppers in the Niagara area will be the same as the shoppers in the United States. I hear the same story from shoppers and merchants in Sault Ste Marie as what is in the Niagara area also.

Mr Waters: I am going to do something here that I might regret, but because I am perceived as being from the north I have to tell people that, if you go to Niagara and you do not go to Sault Ste Marie, you are going to have the north upset. They are constantly being seen as being left out of the picture and they would feel that their voice should have been heard from. My concern has been that, in the interim, when you are here, before you start moving, or if there is a problem with moving, how are you going to notify people that this committee is having hearings? I think it is important. I think, as everyone in the room agrees, the little person, the small shop owner or the granny parade that comes across the border in the spring or whatever with all their purchases, have an opportunity to come before the committee.

The Chair: That was discussed and there is some money left in our advertising budget. We could advertise in the local community papers. The other consideration was that we write to the chambers of commerce and we write to the local mayors and the councillors and have it announced through the local media. If the cable TV wants to put it up, then that would be a way of doing it as well. So there is a possibility of advertising it. We have to decide that, too.

Mr Sutherland: That would seem adequate. I guess I just want to know, from the Toronto aspect of what we would be doing here at Queen's Park, we would be trying to get a handle in terms of the different ministries, that type of stuff, possibly revenue, possibly what some of the Ontario organizations might think about that, like the Ontario chambers, those groups in here. At that stage, would we then have to probably leave it until there would be time to get into some of those communities? Is that generally what the subcommittee was thinking?

Mr Sterling: Yes. The subcommittee members were given a few of the documents that have been already produced on cross-border shopping, and it was our idea to get the experts in to talk to us a little bit about these papers that they have produced.

I think what we should do is write to the mayors, the chambers of commerce, particularly in the border areas, and say: "Look, we are planning this summer to go into some of your communities and ask for first hand experience, and we will advertise that fact when we are there. But in the meantime, we are dealing with this while the Legislature is sitting in Toronto, and if any of you want to come and talk to us now here in Toronto, please contact our clerk."

We may decide, after we hear from these various experts, that either we want to have our legislative research person or we might want to hire some consultant to do a survey or, I do not know, a study that has not been done or is in our interests to find out what other things are. That is the way I think I would proceed on this and that is the way I recommend that we proceed.

Mr Christopherson: As to the time lag, it was suggested by the Chair that we could issue an interim report based on the work we can do here and that we would then do the travelling in August. That is what? Five months? We do not want to be perceived to be dragging our heels. There are enough of those accusations going on anyway. I am just concerned about the time lag, and I do not know how that might factor in, to say to someone, "Yes, we are looking at this," and you build in something that says you are not really going to get a handle on it until at least August, and then it will probably be September before anything gets published.

Mr Sterling: What are the options? I mean, if there were a better option, I would take it, but—

The Chair: Mrs Sullivan would like to—

Mr Christopherson: I do not want to be a stickler on something, but—

Mr Sterling: Look, I mean, you are just not going to—

Mr Christopherson: I did not mean to say we were not going to go to the north. I think of it and to go from here to Niagara Falls and points in between is about an hour or so's drive from Toronto. The Sault can be flown in the same time.

Mr Sterling: But you are not dealing with the Constitution of Canada when you are dealing with cross-border shopping.

Mr Christopherson: You might as well be for people that are hurting, though.

Mr Sterling: It may be their issue, but it is not the issue of the same magnitude. You people may not like saying that, or the retailers. It is an important issue, I understand that, but I just say you are not going to get, in my humble opinion, the House leaders to agree to us travelling. You say it takes an hour to go to St Catharines, once you get there, you have to sit down and listen to people talk, and that is going to take four or five hours. Then it takes an hour to come back, and that takes a couple of hours. How do you do it?

Mrs Sullivan: I think that there has been a lot of work done on this problem in various communities already, where in fact visits, we may well find, would simply be reinventing the wheel in terms of the gathering of information. Let's go through the first phase, see what the experts, people who have done the work on it so far, have to say about the question, see where they have identified problems, see what additional data we think we need in terms of developing a second phase to our hearing process and then perhaps determining that indeed travel is something that we want to request for a latter portion. We can practically expect permission from the House leaders to go to the communities that are affected by cross-border shopping in any equitable way while the House is in session.

Let's see what is already being done. Let's see what problems have been identified, what groups and organizations that are directly affected, apart from those who have done these studies, can be brought in to meet with us on an individual basis.

We have money in the budget. All committees have money in the budget to ensure that people from various areas of the province can be represented in front of the committee and can be subsidized to do that. I think that if we go from there, we may find that with those interventions before the committee, we do not need to travel. We may find, on the other hand, that travel is a very important part of our function.

It seems to me that the question of travel at this point is moot. Let's see what there is to find out and get on with that way.

The Chair: I just want to interject here that we have been given an indication that within four or five weeks we will have the budget, and if there are any changes in tax or any budgetary papers that come out of that, they are coming here, which means that we may well have to suspend whatever we are doing at that time to take that on to a committee.

Mr Hansen: This last report here by John Winter Associates is dated March 1990. It is one year old. I know some of these surveys are a year old here, but there are some of them that have been done in Sault Ste Marie which were just current, which were presented to the ding committee on finance and economic affairs. So do have a lot of updated material, and some of the other members here do not have it in front of them. Right now, there was only one copy for each one of the steering committee.

I think we could decide this a lot better with the information that we have from our researcher and we can make a decision. We could talk all day here on whether we have proper equipment or material, but I think just by reading a lot of these—here we go: Windsor, Sault Ste Marie, Thunder Bay and Niagara Falls. We have covered all the areas, and rather than packing our suitcases, I think we could sit down and read some of these reports and discuss them and come up with a better idea after the researcher has done this work.

I think we are sort of jumping the gun and trying to talk back and forth whether we should travel or we should read.

Mr Christopherson: I think we have thoroughly attacked the issue and it is pretty clear that the route suggested by Mr Hansen seems to be the most practical one. I am certainly prepared to accept that and do it. Your points are well taken about the budget material that may come, so I am comfortable that this is really the only thing we can do. There are not a lot of alternatives.

The Chair: Just to sum up then: We will peruse the information that is available, we will invite in to have hearings people who can come, and then we will decide at a later date what more needs to be done on the issues and decide at that point what the tactics should be.

Mr Sterling: Can I just ask, for a matter of clarification for Mr Decker, when he writes to the mayor of Sault Ste Marie, is he going to indicate that it is our intention to have hearings or just be silent on that?

The Chair: The committee will decide, but what I am hearing is that that decision has not been made and therefore he could not indicate that we would be making the travel. The decision to travel has not been made at this point so any writings to any local mayors would not include any indication that we would come. It would just be a request for them to send information or send people, if possible. If needed, I guess the committee would have to pick up—

Mr Sterling: I made my position quite clear, that I am quite willing to do it in the summer.

The Chair: In the summer.

Mr Sterling: That is fine.

The Chair: Then if that is all we have as business, this committee is adjourned until next Thursday at 10 o'clock.

The committee adjourned at 1634.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 28 March 1991

The committee met at 1016 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: I see a quorum. I think we should begin morning's proceedings. This session of the finance and economics committee will be examining the question of cross-border shopping. To start us off with a general overview is Anne Anderson, who is researcher for the committee and has been looking into this topic for some time. So if I could begin.

Ms Anderson: As there has been a lot of media attention on the size of the problem, I thought I would start off with a look at the data to see whether it is just a recent anomaly or whether it is something that has been going on some time.

Statistics Canada collects information on residents coming across the border, and in 1990, 31 million Canadian residents came back into Ontario from the US. That is an increase of 21% over the year before. If you want just to put that into a little context, you can remember that Ontario has a population of about 9.7 million people, so that is roughly three trips per person if you average it out. That is also a greater increase than happened nationally. When Canadians came back from the US, it was an increase of 17.6% nationally, compared with the 21% in Ontario.

All these people are not necessarily shoppers. They could be people who go on a business trip or to visit friends and relatives as well. But the surveys that I have looked at, anyway, seem to indicate that at least half the people who go to the US go to shop, and many of the ones who go for other reasons also shop while they are there. So I think you could consider a good proportion of the 31 million people as being shoppers.

Another way to look at it is to look at the number of travellers who go across the border and return on the same day and go by car. That, perhaps, is a more accurate reflection of the more recent concern with cross-border shoppers. For example, in 1990, there were 22.4 million Canadians coming back through Ontario border points, and that is an increase of 25% over the previous year. That is roughly two thirds of the 31 million who come back from the US from trips of all durations, whether by car or by plane or by rail. Now, I thought also I would like to put those figures for 1990 in some perspective and look at it over some time, so there are a couple of charts on page 3 that show the number of Canadians coming back through Ontario, which I am assuming really applies to Ontario residents, since 1980. You can see that it was pretty flat all the way through the early part of the 1980s, and it really started to increase after 1986 and it has been going up quite significantly from that time.

The bottom chart then looks at the annual change, and you can see that the three lines represent the total, and the people who came on the same day by car, which is what I am considering the shoppers, as well as the other people. In the last year, between 1989 and 1990, it looks as if it is just beginning to flatten out. So even though it increased very rapidly between 1986 and 1990, it is possible there may be a slowing down of the same-day shoppers.

Mr Sterling: Anne, if I can just ask a question. It seems in 1982, right around there, there was a big blip there. Is there any explanation for that?

Ms Anderson: I do not know that explanation on my own. There is a slight reduction just before that. I do not have an explanation for that one.

I also thought it would be interesting just to have a look at the other provinces, too, because if they had a similar pattern then it would have some implications on whether it was specifically Ontario policies or whether it was the policies that apply to all provinces in the country. And on page 4, there are the two charts. The bottom one is on a different scale from the top one just because of the size of the numbers, but you can see that Ontario as well as New Brunswick and British Columbia in particular, and to some extent, Quebec, have all increased their number of same-day trippers since around 1986-87.

On that chart, Ontario has the largest number of trippers, but you might expect that, as Ontario is also the most populous province. So I have also looked at it on a per capita basis to try to even that out and see what the relative impact is on each of the provinces. On page 5, it appears that the relative impact is actually greater for New Brunswick and British Columbia than it is for Ontario, when you look at it on a population basis.

Nevertheless, I think the charts all seem to show that there has been rapid growth in Ontario since 1986. It possibly might be slowing, although I am not sure there is enough evidence for that yet, and some of the other provinces, particularly New Brunswick and British Columbia, have experienced similar phenomena.

The same data from Statistics Canada that the earlier ones were based on, actually counting the number of travellers—they also do a survey on the expenditure people make in the States while they are away. The latest ones I have are for 1989 and they indicate that $260 million was spent by people coming back to Ontario from same-day trips—that is not from all trips, but just same-day trips—and a national $557 million.

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Mr Chairman. Are we going to wait for our questions until the very end or can we ask them as we go along?

Mr Sterling: I think it is better to ask them as we go along, as long as we keep it short.

The Chair: Yes, whatever. Then you have a question, Mr Kwinter?

Mr Kwinter: I do have a question. One of the concerns I have: figures that you have of $260 million by Canadians, so much per day trip for Ontarians; I assume those figures represent recorded expenditures?

Ms Anderson: That is correct.

Mr Kwinter: I would think they would be minuscule in comparison to the actual expenditures.

Ms Anderson: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: And I would say that more people do not report their spending than do report their spending coming across the border. That is just a gut feeling I have. I cannot prove it, but it would seem to me that in the times that I crossed the border, there are far more people who just keep going through saying they have nothing to declare than who say they do have something to declare, and I cannot believe that that is the case. Is there any kind of anecdotal information about that?

Ms Anderson: I would agree with you that certainly it is the bare minimum that is shown here and is just what people declare and choose to declare in their surveys. I think some of the information that comes through later on, from surveys that different communities have done, will give you a bigger figure. I agree with you. I find that it is quite small as well.

Mr B. Ward: Just following on Mr Kwinter, these statistics were gathered through customs?

Ms Anderson: Yes.

Mr B. Ward: And customs would correlate these figures and this is where we are getting these statistics from?

Ms Anderson: The statistics on the number of travellers supposedly is the actual number of travellers, and it is collected at the border. A sample of those travellers is selected to fill in forms that give more information about the purpose of their trip and how much they spent and that kind of information. The expenditure information on this page is taken from that survey.

Mr Hansen: The other thing, too, is that when people do come across the border and say they bought $35 worth of groceries and declare it, there is no paperwork done on it so that has never been added in there. It is declared but not recorded.

Mr Kwinter: Following that, if you have expenditures on a trip basis of less than $100, you can just make a verbal declaration and go through.

Mr Hansen: That is not recorded, though.

Mr Kwinter: That is not recorded. Exactly.

Ms Anderson: Okay. Then I have taken those numbers on that basis and just tracked those over time as well, having deflated them just to take out the effect of inflation. Both the Canadian spending and the Ontario spending increase, as does the average spending. I think a point just to note perhaps in the average spending is that it dips down during the time of the last recession.

One aspect of the cross-border shopping is that it would not be of as much concern, perhaps, if there was as many US visitors coming to Ontario shopping as there were Ontarians going to the States, so I had a quick look at the number of American visitors to Ontario on page 8. In the first half of the 1980s, all the way through up to 1988, there were more Americans coming into Ontario than there were Ontarians returning from a trip to the US, but the rapid increase that Ontario has experienced has been accompanied by decline in the number of Americans coming through to Ontario, which aggravates the seriousness of the problem, I think.

A number of the communities that are affected have commissioned studies on the impact that cross-border shopping has had on the communities, and I cannot really speak for the studies beyond just reporting on what they have found, so I will just very briefly summarize some of these. In 1989, Thunder Bay asked Ernst & Young, a management consulting firm, to do a study of outshopping in Thunder Bay. This was done on the basis of data collected at the border, as well as interviews with various affected people, and the consultants estimated that the outshopping through Pigeon River, which is the Thunder Bay border crossing point, was $15.4 million in 1988, which is an increase of about 60% over the previous year.

The number of travellers had increased by 30% in 1989, and the number of people declaring duty to be paid had increased 98%. They found that the products that had the highest value that were being declared were cars, motor vehicles, harvesters, lawn mowers and furniture as well as some construction items like builders' joinery, also auto parts. However, the greatest number of purchases that people made were for alcohol and petroleum. The reasons people gave for shopping in Duluth included lower prices, better service, greater variety and Sunday shopping. This was in 1989.

Mr Stockwell: Is that a priority?

Ms Anderson: No, it is just a list. The factors that have been identified as contributing to the outshopping were competitive taxes, retail pricing and service performance, retail competition, a vacation mentality, aggressive marketing from Duluth, the free trade agreement, exchange rate fluctuations and general economic prosperity.

In early 1990, the Committee for Fair Shopping, which was concerned with Sunday shopping, commissioned a study by John Winter Associates on outshopping from Niagara Falls, and they did their research on the basis of a survey. They found that half of the city of Niagara Falls had shopped in the US in the previous two months. The respondents shopped there almost once a week, and those who went shopping on Sunday did it almost every other Sunday. Twenty-five per cent had shopped in the US more frequently than the previous year, and the people who went tended to spend more money, have larger families and be younger than the people who were less frequent shoppers.

The main reason given for shopping in the US was lower prices, which were also affected by the value of the dollar. Highest average expenditure was for small appliances and items for the home, and again, most frequent purchases: groceries, gasoline and clothing. They also found that the probability of shopping in the US rises come. They estimate that supermarkets lose somewhere in the region of 11% to 15% of their overall grocery trade to the US, and they extrapolate that to the region of Niagara to $55 million in sales, representing possibly over 1,000 jobs.

Mr Sutherland: On the comment about those with higher incomes shopping in the US in the Niagara Falls study, was there any information to support that in the other areas?

Ms Anderson: In one or two of the other studies I assume we will come to later—there is particularly another study on Thunder Bay, where it seems as though the people who go to Duluth are middle-upper-income and are more educated people, and they associate that with general tourist behaviour. Going from Thunder Bay to Duluth, at any rate, is a much longer trip. It is a four-hour drive, so you do not cross over to go and buy milk. People look on it more as an entertainment value than just shopping, and it tends to be correlated somewhat with income.

Mr Sutherland: That is a great anomaly, that those who have the higher incomes and who can probably most afford to shop in the province are going across the border. I would think it would be some of the lower-income people who thought maybe prices are too high or do not have as much disposable income who would be doing that.

Ms Anderson: There is a comment in the Windsor survey that, although the higher-income people were the ones who were doing it now, the people in the survey who indicated they were going to shop more frequently in the future tended to be the lower-income.

Mr B. Ward: Following up on Mr Sutherland's comments, do you think that in the past, shopping in the States, particularly Niagara Falls, was approached as an entertainment type of event that people who had greater disposable income would perhaps look on as spending a day in the United States to do shopping, go out for supper, etc., whereas the lower-income groups or individuals very rarely went out for an entertainment event anyway? In the future, do you think that is one way that the statistics could be perceived?

Ms Anderson: I think that is one factor in it, yes. People would go for a trip or a day excursion and say, "Well let's go to the States, and while we're there, we'll do some shopping." I am not sure that that applies to the people who are very close to the border any more; it is people who are 15 or 20 minutes away who can go and spend a lot of money. They go and fill up their gas tank and buy milk by crossing the border and coming back again.

Mr B. Ward: Yes, they are passing, say, away from St. Catharines, which is a distance away, so to speak. They would have looked at it as an entertainment aspect.

Ms Anderson: John Winter Associates also did a survey for Windsor of their downtown market, and there was one section that looked at shopping in the United States. They found, again, that quite a lot of Windsor sales were lost to stores in Detroit. As in the other surveys, groceries, gasoline and clothing were the most common items purchased, and two out of five consumers went across the border just to pick up one item at a time, which, again, is not the people who are going for entertainment. Those would be the people who would go for a particular item that is much cheaper there. Their survey indicated that 10% of the retail trade was lost from Essex county, which is the county closest to the border, representing about $60 million in sales and about 650 retail jobs.

They felt that cross-border shopping was likely to increase, and from farther away as well. Again, the main reasons given were price and selection, and the GST was expected to create an additional reason for people to shop across the border.

In their survey, the typical shoppers tended to be younger than average, large family, relatively high household income, but those who intended to shop more often in the US would have the lower-than-average income.

Mr B. Ward: In the study done by John Winter Associates for Windsor, the main reasons given for shopping in the US are price and selection. I have always assumed that we have had pretty well the same products available in Canada and in Ontario that they would have in Michigan or New York state. Did they define what selection was or was that just a feeling that there was greater selection?

Ms Anderson: I did not see the background data that went into that one but I think from some of the things that I have read elsewhere that some people feel there is a wider range of products available, there is a greater selection of certain things in the States than there is here. I have also seen studies that say it the other way, too, and I do not think that is conclusive at all. But my reading of that was that it was a greater selection there than here.

Mr Hansen: I do not know if everybody has had a chance to look at the John Winter Associates main brief and what it says: "What are the main reasons for shopping United States?" It is "lower prices, better value and savings" — 65.7%. "Not too far away" is 7.6. I am just going to go down the first couple there: "better selection" was 7% and "lower gas prices" 5.9 and "stores are open on Sunday United States" 1.9%. You know all indications are that the stores are open on Sunday; that is the reason why. But when people take a look at it, overall shopping in the United States is only 1.9. It goes right down to the bottom, which is 0.3. I like the margin, but I think if you stand at the bridge and take a survey of people as they are going across, it is different from the survey that you actually take in the community. So I think sometimes we should take a look at where some of these statistics are coming from: at the bridge or in the community.

Ms Anderson: Right.

Mr Phillips: Just a really small point, but on the "two out of five go across just to pick up one item," I think the research says one commodity. It could be they are going to pick up groceries as opposed to one item. Because if it is just one item I would be amazed at that, but it is one commodity, I think.

Ms Anderson: Okay. One of the more publicized studies recently has been one that was done by Ernst and Young for the chamber of commerce in Sault Ste Marie, which was again based on border crossings; also Customs Canada information and a telephone survey. They found that between 1986 and 1989 there was a 74% increase in declarations at the border, 207% increase in the B15 forms, which are the ones you complete when you pay duty, and a 92% increase in verbal declarations. Only the verbal declarations increased at a rate greater than the national average. The 1989 cross-border shopping in the Sault is estimated at $39 million, which peaks in July and August of each year. Quite a lot of the cross-border shopping is quite seasonal and is different for different months. In the survey they did 36% had bought gasoline over the last 30 days and 27% had purchased milk and groceries. That seems similar to some of the other surveys. As a result milk sales per capita and also beer sales per capita have been declining in the Sault.

They estimate that the loss of goods and services together in 1990 would be $104 million, and if you look at the indirect effect of that as well, they estimate a total loss of $141 million.

Mr Stockwell: When they do those estimates, they are doing it on the basis of what is declared?

Ms Anderson: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: So they are saying $104 million, but it could be $400 million, $500 million?

Ms Anderson: Yes, it is based on surveys; and they have an economic model, a community impact model that they ring through as well.

Mr Stockwell: These numbers are numbers. They are not very accurate, I would—

Ms Anderson: Not necessarily, no.

Mr Stockwell: I think almost conclusively they are not very accurate. You could talk 4 or 5 times that.

1040

Mr Hansen: I think to get a better bearing on these statistics here, what we need is the number of cars that travelled and the number that declared, to show a percentage. I think this is what Mr Stockwell was looking at also: the number of cars that are travelling across that go through with this $40. To get an average declared amount that passes through the border, we need a better idea of exactly the total. I think you are right in the ballpark there at $400 million when $100 million is declared.

Mr Stockwell: I do not think we can get that figure. It is very high.

Ms Anderson: Yes. They are the only figures that very much are around. It just gives you some feeling for the minimums that are there.

Mr Stockwell: Not having your research, I understand. I do not think we need the figure.

Mr Hansen: It is very high.

Ms Anderson: Yes. So apart from those studies, it seems to me that it confirms what you saw before: that this cross-border shopping is happening with increasing frequency. There are very frequent purchases of milk, groceries and gasoline, and also of larger items such as cars, furniture and clothing. The reasons that come out from those surveys, I think, are the lower prices and the value of the dollar.

The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology is coming here this afternoon to give a presentation, am not going to go into its examination very thorough just to point out that it had looked at this in conjunction with a lot of the communities and had come out in the of last year with a marketing and action plan to help the communities counter the effects of cross-border shopping. In that action plan, they estimate that Ontario has been losing $340-$360 million a year in retail sales, with provincial revenue losses of between $40-$50 million.

The Chair: When did MITT develop this marketing framework?

Ms Anderson: They were doing it during the course of the summer and in the early fall. I think it came around October or something like that.

What I have done so far is describe what people have found has been happening. I felt it would be useful to look at what might be some of the underlying causes.

Mr Phillips: Just one quick question. The $340-$360 million in retail sales per year—what would that be as a percentage of total retail sales? Just a ballpark.

Ms Anderson: I was trying to get that on my own over here actually, and found that the relevant document was not in the library. But in 1985, total retail sales were $45 billion in Ontario. So it would be significantly more than that now.

Mr Phillips: So maybe somewhere between 1% and 2% of the retail sales, do you think?

Ms Anderson: It was $49 billion in 1985, and we need to get the updated figure so that we can get some percentage.

One of the most frequently cited reasons for going to the States is lower prices, particularly gas and dairy products, as well as clothing and household items. Also mentioned had been the free trade agreement, Sunday shopping, and the tourist value of the entertainment value of shopping. Sorry, that was mentioned, but that is a conclusion that I looked at.

It seems there are several underlying causes for the price difference, and I am sure there are many more that have listed, but this will be a start. There is the exchange rate, perhaps; lower US costs, which could come from lower taxes and a variety of sources; lower retail real estate or leasing costs; lower prices on foods that are not produced under supply management. There is also aggressive US advertising, non-collection of Canadian sales and excise taxes, including the RST, and also there is the growth of the discount malls on the other side of the border, which I think are attracting a lot of people over from Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: Just on the issue of the aggressive US advertising, I recently saw in one of the papers that they tried to do an analysis of how much money you actually do save by going across the border. They included the cost of gas to go there, your toll and then that is on the declared items. I am just wondering how much thorough analysis has gone on in terms of deciding how much people are really saving versus the perception of what they are saving in terms of seeing the price in the ad. You know, the price of the milk is very cheap, but to do that—is there a real analysis of what the costs are?

Ms Anderson: I have not seen anything on that line at all, and I think that is a very large part of it, actually. I think that a lot of people now feel that they are going to get a good bargain by going over because there has been so much publicity about it, and I do not know that anybody has really looked at that. I think it would be an interesting subject.

The exchange rate: A lot of people have mentioned the exchange rate, so I have graphed the exchange rate between Canada and the US since the time when I had got early data on the same-day travellers. You can see that the line is very similar since 1986, which is when the rapid increase in travellers to the US started, but it does not follow the same trend in the earlier part of the 1980s. In fact, in 1980 the value of the dollar was very similar to what it is now without any similar increase in cross-border shoppers. So I think it may be a factor now but it is not the only factor in drawing people over to the States.

Mr B. Ward: In the 1970s, when the Canadian dollar was relatively higher even than it is today, do we have any statistics that go back that far to see whether that had any impact on people shopping in the United States?

Ms Anderson: I did not look further back than 1980, but now it goes back at least to 1975, the data they have, and I will look at that and see whether there is any relationship.

Mr Brown: Mr Chairman, I am interested in this graph. It would be interesting to see an overlay of Ontario's economic growth put on the same chart because I have a feeling, just looking at it closely, that this would show that our growth was at its peak when exchange rates were at the bottom. I do not really know what that means, but I would be interested to see the information.

The Chair: I am not sure that that would have anything to do with cross-border shopping, but it would be an interesting overlay.

Mr Brown: I am always looking for interesting overlays.

Mr Jamison: We have talked about certain impacts that really combine to put this cross-border shopping in the hands of people and then leave it there and really be attractive to people.

I know of people who cross the border particularly to buy the sin tax items such as cigarettes. It costs $42 a carton here for cigarettes, $18 at the border for cigarettes. It seems to me that that has not been weighted in. If you are a smoker, I am sure that is reason enough to go in the first place. Once you are there, then it is reason enough to do some other shopping, too. I think the alcohol-tobacco trade in itself is an attractive enticement to people to go across the border. The average smoker smokes a pack of cigarettes a day. That in itself is a tremendous potential saving for that individual. So I believe that as we tax those products to a greater level and a greater extent than what is happening in the United States, it naturally creates a magnetism to get over there and buy Canadian cigarettes at a carton.

Ms Anderson: I think the same thing holds for gasoline and often for milk and for alcohol as well. They are the drawing cards that take people over there, and while they are there—

1050

Mr Jamison: I just wanted to make it clear that the sin tax items are a major draw, in my mind. They almost turn the key and start the person's motor.

Mr Hansen: What Mr Ward brought up on the US exchange rate, the chart on page 8, travellers to Ontario from the US: you show in 1986, when the dollar dropped, the number of Canadians going to the United States sort of dropped also; but what you did see when the Canadian dollar did drop is an increase in American tourists. So if you are looking for an answer there, I think it does have a reflection on the dollar.

I may be jumping the gun a little bit here, but we talk about aggressive advertising, and this appears in the St Catharines Standard quite often. It says: "Attention Canadian shoppers. Beat the recession and the GST. Order your Canadian discount USA today and save hundreds and thousands of dollars." My wife says, "You know, the more you keep talking about this issue, the more you are selling people to shop in the United States, because it's a deal." I do not know where we stop, and the answers we are going to come up with. But this is Creative Investments, Promotional Marketing Dept, 4750 Valley Way, Niagara Falls, Ontario. For $27, including all taxes, you get this card to get 10% off in the United States. Just about a week ago in the St Catharines Standard there was a flyer, and it says right on it, "Printed in USA," and inserted in the St Catharines Standard. What we have to understand is that Canadian businessmen, to advertise in the United States, will not be getting the tax breaks on the advertising that is going on there. I think that is one area we have to take a look at to be on a level playing field. The American retailers are able to advertise in our papers and get a tax break, where our Canadian retailers do not get that tax break.

The Chair: I do not even think they can declare that tax break here in Canada as part of their costs.

Mr Hansen: But printed in the United States, they would write that off. Just an insert.

Mr Kwinter: I think there is a correlation between the products that are being bought the most in the United States and the need for those products. For example, if you are buying clothing—and unless it is branded merchandise, it is very difficult to really compare—you can go over to the United States and you can see merchandise that comes from Hong Kong or Taiwan or somewhere else. It may be marginally cheaper, but there is really a judgement call as to whether it is a good deal or whether it is not a good deal. Most people calculate that, when you add the exchange, when you add everything else, it is pretty well the same price.

But where you really see the difference is if someone is a smoker. Because it is an addiction and they have to smoke, they can see it right away. If I buy a package of cigarettes in the United States, it is going to cost me X; if I buy it in Canada, it is going to cost me Y. It is the same thing with milk; it is the same thing with beer or liquor. These are things that they buy on an ongoing basis and they can see the very significant savings that are there. I would also suggest that because the surveys do not take into effect the GST, that is really going to exacerbate the situation.

I spend my vacations in the United States. I have a place down in Florida. There are lots of Canadians and they all say the same thing, "Can you imagine if I had bought this?" They discount the state tax, which is relatively minimal. They say, "If I had bought this"—never mind the price—"automatically I would be paying 15% more just because of the retail sales tax and the GST." And as that hits home, there are going to be more and more people saying, "It pays to go to the United States."

There are organizations that are printing newsletters in Ontario, sending them to Ontarians, and not just in the border cities, but sending them to people in Toronto and people farther from the border states than Toronto. They are organizing buses to take these people over to the United States for shopping expeditions, saying, "The cost you are going to pay for the bus and everything else will be more than offset by your savings."

I think the situation is going to get worse long before it gets better unless we do something to counteract it. I would hope that this committee, once we get past the initial examination of the research, will start addressing those concerns.

The Chair: That is the stated goal of the committee, to try to come up with some recommendations that we can give the Treasurer or Revenue on this issue.

Ms Anderson: I wanted to turn to the price of gas. That seems to be one of the big drawing cards to get people to go over to the States, particularly the close ones. I have some information from the federal government, from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They collect the average retail gas price for Canadian and US neighbouring cities, and you can see on page 16 that there are six US and eight Canadian cities, one of which is Toronto. These prices are a weighted average of both full service and self-serve stations. This particular one is for regular unleaded gas and it is the full pump price, so it includes taxes. In January of this year the average price in Toronto is 57.5 cents and in Rochester would be 41.8 cents. There is a difference of almost 16 cents a litre in that.

The Chair: Did they factor in the smaller American gallon?

Ms Anderson: Yes. That allows the exchange rate and converting to that.

Mr Hansen: Another thing, too, is when they say $1.04 for a US gallon, you have to realize that is a very low-octane gasoline they are quoting. Most people who go over to the States do not buy the lowest grade, but buy either the medium or high-test grade; I forget exactly what the octane is, but it is a lot lower than what you would buy over here. You would not put it in your average car.

Mr Phillips: It looks as if Canadian gas is about 50% higher than the US. Is that the kind of conclusion we should draw from this? I mean, I assume they are apples to apples here.

Ms Anderson: Perhaps not quite as much as that, yes.

Mr Phillips: I just look at 40 cents to 60 cents across board here generally. Anyway, it is between 40% and 50%.

Ms Anderson: Yes. I took the line that has the Canadian average and the line that has the US average looked at the difference between those over a period of time. They have the information going back to 1980, but have not been able to get it further back than that at the moment, but if you look on page 17 you can see the difference between the Canadian and American averages, both with taxes and without taxes. It can very easily be seen that a lot of the difference is in the additional taxes in Canada. If you look in 1990, the difference was 20.7 cents a litre if you include taxes and 5.8 cents a litre if you exclude taxes.

Mr B. Ward: I could be wrong, but it is my perception that the Americans still import a large amount of oil, which they refine for their gasoline. Does the oil and gas branch of Energy, Mines and Resources Canada have an explanation? When you take away the taxes, our costs are still higher than the American. Do they have an explanation as to why that would be?

Ms Anderson: I have not gone into that, although you look on the next page, there is just a rough breakdown of the components of the price. On those two bars, the bottom is the crude cost, which actually looks to me to be very similar. The Canadian cost for refining and marketing is slightly higher and then the taxes are higher still.

If you want to look at it specifically in Toronto, on the next page, you can see the components for the Toronto price of gas. The crude cost is 26.5 cents a litre—this is for December 1990—federal tax 12.3, provincial tax 11.3, refining and marketing 8.7, for a total of 58.8 cents a litre. The federal tax would be about 21%, provincial tax about 19% of that total price.

The Chair: Why would the refining and marketing costs in Toronto be so much lower than the refining and marketing costs in Calgary?

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I hate to take the time of this committee, but I think it is important. The Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, and every minister before and since me, always has to answer for gasoline costs. They have really nothing to do with it; it is a federal issue. But there is something that most people do not understand, and I listened to my colleagues in the House of Commons and they are always railing about how come the costs in northern Ontario and eastern Ontario are so much higher.

Interjections.

Mr Kwinter: It is a common question, but I think people have to understand the issue of gasoline marketing. What happens is that the Toronto market, which is the most competitive market in Canada, is an unnatural market. There are a lot of guys—and we had problems when we were in government—who can go across to Buffalo and buy a tankload of gasoline on the spot market, bring it across and sell it through the unbranded stations; if the going rate is 45 cents a litre, it at 41. They still make a very healthy markup. But they are jobbers: They do not refine it, they do not do anything. They just go and buy spot oil and bring it in and sell it. And people, in their buying of gasoline, and the one thing with cigarettes and milk and beer, that is why they go to the United States: They are very, very price conscious.

People are, in many ways, illogical. They will be driving along a road and they will see gasoline at 43 cents. They will drive four miles and see it at 45 and say: "Oh, my God. I missed that station." They will turn around and they will drive back to buy it at that 43 to save the two cents a litre, and they have spent more gas going back to get it than what they save, but they are very, very price conscious.

And the gasoline companies are very, very price conscious, and they want to try to keep their market share. So what happens is that these what they call renegades come and sell it four cents below market. The next day, the gasoline companies decide, "We have to meet the competition," so they will take it down and they are, in fact, not making the kind of money they normally would like to on their gasoline to get a fair return on their investment, but they are trying to meet the market, and as soon as this guy is out of his gas and has to buy it through his regular channels and puts the price up again, they put their price up. So it is a very, very fluctuating market because of the competition.

The minute you get out of that market, and the minute you get into these remote areas where you do not have a service station on every corner or every three blocks or every six blocks, then they have a stable market and they say, "This is the price we should be getting to get our kind of return, and that's what we're charging." It is the competition, it is the market that dictates the fluctuation. They will decide, "Competition be damned; we're going to keep the price high," but they will lose market share. And the reason people go to the States—most people could not tell you what brand of gasoline is in their car, as long as the price is right. You cannot refine gasoline in your backyard obviously—it is gasoline that is going to work. They will buy it, and buy it strictly on price. That is what happens. As I say, when this thing came up when I was the minister, I visited all the gasoline companies and I was satisfied that is a fact of life.

Now, the federal government has set up, to my knowledge, at least three royal commissions to look into the pricing of gasoline, and every one of them has come back and said, as far as they can tell, there is no collusion, there are no artificially high prices. It is a problem because it is one of the few products that fluctuates so rapidly and there is the feeling that, how come everybody is at the same price? The reason for that is the competition, because if you drive down the street and one guy has it at one price at one corner and it is one or six cents or two cents or one cent or a cent cheaper across the street, that is where you are going to go, unless you have a credit card only for that one guy. But generally, if you have a general credit card, you will go wherever the price is cheaper, and that is why they are always trying to match each other's price, so that no one does not get a price advantage on it.

I am sorry for the lecture on gasoline pricing, but it is something I spent a lot of time on, and it is something that is very emotional, and people go crazy.

Just let me just finish with one other thing. When I was minister, the price of gasoline on one particular day went from 34 cents a litre to 42 cents, and everybody went wild. They were calling for public inquiries, royal commissions and everything else. And the main problem was the big jump overnight.

Very recently, within the last two months, the price of gasoline has been up to 62 cents a litre. It has dropped back again, but right after the Gulf war started, it went up as high as 62 cents. But it was a very gradual increase, and people were unhappy but they were not calling for anybody to do anything about it because it was gradual. It is the big jumps and the seeming collusion. How come they are all at the same price and they all change at the same time? The reason is very simple: They are meeting their competition because gasoline is so price-sensitive that people will go wherever they can get the best price.

Mr Sterling: Sounds good to me.

Mr Kwinter: The end of the lecture. Sorry.

Mr Sterling: What is the moral of all this, Mr Kwinter? We need more jobbers or more spot price people or what? We need them in eastern Ontario, I will tell you.

Mr Kwinter: The moral of the story is that the petroleum refining business has barriers to entry. As I say, the jobbers are buying excess gasoline on the spot market. But you cannot set up a refinery in your backyard. The cost of being in the refining business is billions of dollars, and the moral of the story is that unless we can get greater competition in the field—which is what happens in Toronto and does not happen up in the north and in eastern Ontario, where there are far fewer gas stations and where you may have one or two in a 50- or 60-mile range—they have a captive market. They charge the price they want to charge, and if you do not like it, you do not drive. It is as simple as that, whereas in a very competitive market, competition works. Competition is in there, and these guys do not make money, but they make money on everything else and they keep their market share for the time where they can increase the prices.

So there is a lot of pressure on the gasoline companies in the metro areas and in the border towns. If they try to get the gasoline prices as high as they can get them so they can make what they think is a legitimate markup, unfortunately the market works against them. I am not crying for the gasoline companies. I am just telling you the facts as they are.

Ms Anderson: The Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping, when it came to the committee for pre-budget consultations, had some information about gas prices then. I believe they are coming to these hearings in two weeks' time, so I will not go into that in any great detail.

They just mentioned that the border communities, they estimate, lose 300 million litres annually in sales, and that the revenues lost as a result of that, $116.4 million, of which almost $34 million are provincial taxes. One of the solutions they are promoting is the use of graduated gas tax zones from the border, but I am sure they will go into that in more detail when they come.

Another item that has been mentioned as a drawing card is the price of milk. The federal government and Agriculture Canada have undertaken several studies to look at this in some of the provinces, as a result of people going over the border so much. They have already completed studies in British Columbia and New Brunswick. They have done one in northern Ontario, which I believe was in Sault Ste Marie, which is completed but not yet released, and they are apparently doing one for several border points in southern Ontario.

In the studies they did on the east and west coasts, they found that for the price of milk, if you take 2% milk in New Brunswick, it was 41% to 70% higher in Canada, and in British Columbia it was between 36% and 60% higher. They estimate that the two provinces are losing 4.2% of sales in New Brunswick and 7.6% of sales in British Columbia to the United States. There is a similar situation for cheese, although it is not as bad in New Brunswick as in British Columbia.

The next page just shows this graphically for the price of 2% milk. The difference is a little under half the price, I would think. This was in 1988, I point out—not very current, but I do not believe it has changed.

Another factor cited quite often is taxation. I have not looked into this in any great detail at this stage. I just want to draw it to your attention. There is a study that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has done on taxation and cross-border shopping, comparing two cities in Ontario and the US. I heard something on the news this morning, too, that they have done one, I think, between Quebec and a neighbouring state. They looked at the effect of total taxes, which would be wages, local taxes, income and capital taxes and commodity taxes, and they find that both large and small businesses in Toronto have a higher tax burden than their counterparts in Buffalo. You can see that demonstrated on the graphs on page 24, which I copied from their brief.

They attribute a lot of the difference, particularly in Toronto, to higher local taxes, particularly for the small firms. The situation is similar in Thunder Bay and Duluth, although it is not as severe. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business is also scheduled to appear here in a couple of weeks' time.

Another item mentioned is the non-collection of duties and sales tax at the border. Revenue Canada is responsible for the collection of federal customs and excise taxes. It does not collect provincial retail sales tax. In March this year the Minister of Revenue announced a new system to try to speed up visitors, or residents returning across the border from the US, and as a part of that program, that express lane, they have devised a system to expedite the payment of duties. Under this system, residents can apply to the government and give a VISA or MasterCard credit card number. They will receive cards which have different kinds of duties, different goods on them, with blanks to be filled in, rather like a lottery card would be, so when you return and cross the border, you can go through the express lane, put your card in a box and go right through. cards are collected and duties are calculated, then charged to your credit card. This is happening in British Columbia at the moment, and they are planning to try it in Ontario too. When I talked to Revenue Canada they were reluctant to say exactly where in Ontario they are going to try. I heard they are planning to start it in May, but they are fairly non-committal at this point.

I do not know now whether this will help or hinder cross-border shopping, whether it will ensure more collection of duties or whether it will encourage smuggling in for having the express lane. We will have to see that certainly does not help the collection of provincial taxes.

Mr Phillips: Two things. One is just for your direction on the role this committee should be playing on cross-border. I think mail order is a growing issue, but I do not know whether you put some bounds around what we are going to deal with on this particular committee or not.

The Chair: We have not put any bounds on it. I think the issue primarily, though, is to investigate why people go across the border and shop.

Mr Phillips: I tend to think that is probably right. I just think that if we get beyond that, this could be bigger than life itself.

The Chair: I have not heard anybody really as concerned about mail order.

Mr Phillips: It is just that it is in here and I think it is going to be growing. But I agree with you; I think it is going to get into more than that. My detailed question is, what are the kind of general duties on these things, so I have some scope to think about and take-

Ms Anderson: On things like milk?

Mr Phillips: Can you categorize groceries? I just do not have any idea personally.

Ms Anderson: Can I bring that back to you this afternoon? I have the tariff schedule, but it is in my office.

Mr Kwinter: Maybe I can be of help. Eighty per cent of all of the goods and services before the free trade agreement were duty-free. Twenty per cent of the goods and services that were dutiable or had a tariff on them averaged between 7% and 10%. The tariff ranged from a low of less than 1% to about 40%, but on average it was between 7% and 10%. That, of course, over the next five years and 10 years is going to be reduced to zero. It comes down to one tenth per year for 10 years and one fifth per year over the next five years. So that is the range we are talking about. In terms of the specific items, I would imagine it is not just meat; it would be meat products, dairy products, it would be those categories. It would all have a different tariff depending on the protections they are given. But the range between 7% and 10%, is the tariff that is in place.

The Chair: The other thing, to refer to Mr Kwinter's point, we have some very high standards in terms of fat content in our meat and so on that are not in the meat across the border. I guess if people go across the border and they are getting a deal, are they really getting a deal if they are getting 7% or 8% more of the meat they are buying is going to dissipate in terms of fat? So there are a lot of factors here

Ms Anderson: The next section was the free trade agreement, but I think it has almost been covered, except that I have a feeling that a lot of people had high expectations of lower prices when the free trade agreement came into place. And when those were not realized immediately, because of the longer implementation period, a lot of them have been encouraged to go across the border and get the goods at a lower price there. I think a lot of the effect of the free trade agreement at the moment is one that is perception rather than reality.

It will develop more as time goes through. But I think overall the effect on the duties at this stage is not great. I haven't listed the schedule that Mr Kwinter was mentioning before. Just a couple of examples: The duties went off immediately on things like telephone handsets and skis and computers. They are coming down in five stages on things like coffeemakers, hairdryers. The slowest stage, the equal annual stages would apply to, I think, things like milk, cheese and also clothing, which are items that are often bought in the States.

Distance from the border obviously has some impact on how often people go across. John Winter described a little model. There is a convenience zone that is within 15 minutes of the US border, where people just go back and forth very easily for milk and groceries. A larger one takes more like an hour to drive, and people will go and buy something and small appliances. About half the Canadian population lies within an hour's drive of the US, according to him. The third zone goes up to an hour and a half, where people would more likely go for the slightly bigger items such as electronic items. I have a feeling that those distances have actually expanded and that people even from an hour and a half will be going to buy clothing and not just for the big, infrequent purchases.

The Chair: Yes, in Ajax I had a phone call on the weekend and they indicated that they go down on a regular basis even from Ajax, and that is two hours. It is two hours drive from where I live to Buffalo. What was really interesting was he said he was going down to buy a VCR. He said he could get it for $200 and I had seen a VCR in the newspaper for $249. I figured that with exchange rates it works out to be almost the same price. No, no, he is on his way down.

Ms Anderson: Finally, just to elaborate a little bit more on what we were talking about earlier on the link between tourism, how it seems as though people who come from further distances will go to the US as part of an excursion or a trip and do their shopping while they are there. There is a study going on at the moment in Thunder Bay. One half has been done, which was looking at a survey of people who go from Thunder Bay to Duluth, and the second half is under way at the moment for the return, people who come from Duluth to Thunder Bay. They also found that it was the wealthier and more educated residents who went down to Duluth, and almost all did shopping while they were down there; for 45%, it was the main activity they did when they were in Duluth. However, when they were asked to rate Duluth and its attractions in relationship to Thunder Bay, about half of them found it was as good as Thunder Bay was. The authors concluded that this supported the idea that people wanted to go just for the change and for the trip, not necessarily specifically to go and buy certain items.

I think Thunder Bay is slightly different from some of the other crossings because it is more isolated. It is further from the nearest big city and its closest city is in the States rather than in Canada.

Mr B. Ward: Within one hour's drive: they included Kitchener in that area. They must be going at a pretty good clip to make the border in one hour from Kitchener. I am assuming that when they did this study, they did the speed limits. I think Kitchener is more than one hour, because I think it is at least an hour from Brantford.

The Chair: It took us an hour and a half from here to Niagara.

Mr B. Ward: Yes. The consultant made the statement that almost half the Canadian population lies within one hour's drive of the US. Well, that would put that statement out of whack if they have used the wrong regions.

Ms Anderson: I would tend to agree with you. I think the idea was that there were kind of zones of distances and people would buy different things coming from those different zones.

Mr B. Ward: Perhaps they fudged to a degree.

The Chair: Moved the border?

Mr Phillips: No, no, lowered speed limits.

The Chair: We are beginning to get through this. I had thought about taking the bridges down and making them paddle across.

Ms Anderson: Another tourism study that relates to this somewhat is a competitive assessment between Niagara Falls, Ontario, and Niagara Falls, New York, that was done in 1989. They found that although Niagara Falls, Ontario, had a lot of natural advantages, these could be overcome by man-made attractions in New York. On the New York side, all the levels of government were working together to help give incentives for the development of things like the discount malls and other large packages that were attracting people into the New York side of Niagara Falls. They did find that there did not seem to be any major price or quality differences in accommodation or attractions except for alcohol and gas. So it seems as though Niagara Falls, Ontario, is beginning to be challenged more and more by man-made attractions in the US rather than—

Mr Phillips: Person-made.

Ms Anderson: Person-made. I am sorry.

Finally, one last study I saw was done by Americans looking at the effect of Canadian tourists in Washington, in the city of ANSpokane. They found that three quarters of the people from Canada who came to Spokane went there to shop. Almost 60% stayed for two nights. The majority, again, were middle income. They were worried about it because they felt this was not enough. They were comparing it, for example, to the Mexicans going over the border to Arizona, who spent $517 million in a year, whereas Canadians going to Washington spent only $17 million. So they were trying to go at it from the angle of trying to encourage more Canadians to go shopping.

Finally, those are just some of the issues and some of the underlying causes. There are many others that I have not begun to look at yet. One was alcohol, which has been discussed. Another is whether or not all goods are cheaper in the US or whether there are some here that are better. I have seen some surveys of food baskets, for example, where, when you add up the whole basket, it is actually cheaper in Canada than in the US. I think it would be interesting to know whether it is just a very few selected items that people are going down for and that the rest is of better quality or better price or not.

Look at reasons why the US are not coming up and spending in Canada, because, as I said, it would matter less that Ontarians were spending in the US if there was a reciprocal level of spending in Canada.

Then there is also effects on other industries as you go back through the production chains. There are effects on the agricultural industry, effects on manufacturing, as retail jobs get lost. I have not looked at that at all or the comparisons.

Then there is whether there are any links with the general economic cycle, too; whether it has been increasing as a result of the economic prosperity in Ontario in the second half of the 1980s and whether it will decrease as we go into a recession or not.

There is the growth of all the shopping malls and there is also cross-border advertising, which is being heavily promoted.

Finally, I would just like to mention that there is a video available in the library, if anybody is interested, of a Speaking Out program that was conducted in I think January of this year, either January or February, with Harry Brown as the host. It took place in Thunder Bay and he had a panel that included the chamber of commerce from Thunder Bay, John Winter, Professor Dille from Lakehead University and Mark Adler, I think his name is, a man who has written a book encouraging people to go and shop in Buffalo. I cannot remember the title offhand. Anyway, that video is available in the library. It is an hour. The first half is panel discussion and the second half is questions from the audience.

That is as far as I have gone at the moment.

The Chair: Are there any other questions at this time? No questions?

Mr Sutherland: This may be comment at this time. First of all, thanks to research this is a very good document and gives a good handle in terms of bringing some of the issues to the forefront. I certainly hope we will take some time in terms of dealing with some analysis, and hopefully some of the groups coming in will deal with the analysis of the perception of everything being cheaper in the States and the reality by the time you add up all the costs of going across to shop in the United States.

I know people like Ron, who are right there in the border communities, probably feel the impact on a far more regular basis, but I am very concerned at the number of people from my constituency who now go across on a regular basis, at least once a month, to the United States. This is only anecdotal information, but it seems to be increasing tremendously. In my riding we are two hours from the nearest border. It is really troubling and concerning, I think. I sit there and try to understand it, and it is very difficult for me to understand why these people are doing that in their sense that somehow in the long run they are saving money, when in many ways it would seem to cost more.

Mr Jamison: I would like to say that I also am aware that there are people as far away who are starting to talk about cross-border shopping on an ongoing basis rather than every once in a while. My own belief is that many of the products that are over there are not significantly different in price. I think I have alluded to a couple of almost identical items that people will refer to almost immediately, if we were to strike up a discussion with them, as examples to indicate that things are in fact less expensive in the United States. But having said that, we have to understand that in our area of safety net and social programs, we are more than the jurisdiction they talk about, and of course those things cost money also.

We, as have previous governments and governments long back as I can recall, have always found it more acceptable, and of course in the public's eye it always has been more acceptable, to tax those products that have high health costs to them in the form of sin tax and so forth. People refer to those things immediately if you were to strike up a conversation with those people. At the same time, we have to understand that our system up here is different from theirs. That has an impact, I am sure, on most people when you really talk to them about the issues. I would realize, and most people I speak to respect that our programs up here are superior, our health coverage is superior, and so forth.

Having said that, there is an obvious bottom line that it takes a great deal of money to fund those programs, and in the overall sense you are really talking two different systems.

Mr Hansen: I have to agree with Norm in that particular area, but another area we have to take a look at is the products that we are purchasing over there. For one thing, the product you purchase here in the appliance field is CSA approved. A lot of these drills you buy for $9.95 would not sell in Canada because they are not properly insulated. It could be a Black & Decker drill, built in Mexico and sold in the United States or Canada, but there is a difference in the construction of that particular drill; a lot has to do with the CSA.

My wife is in the vacuum business. She took a look at a certain brand we sell over here and it was half price in the US in a flyer, but one thing you had to note though was a smaller motor. That motor would last about a year, whereas the ones we sold were larger. So you have to take a look to make sure the product is identical, and a lot of people are not buying the identical product in the United States.

The Chair: I would add, just on the CSA, that if you bought a toaster in the United States that was not CSA approved and you put it in here and it burned down your house, your insurance would not cover it. That is all.

Mr Phillips: It is a fascinating subject. Just a couple things that would be useful for me, at least: Whatever we have in terms of understanding the consumer, there are a number of people out there, maybe a large number, for whom shopping is like a hobby.

Mr Sutherland: Born to shop. Shop till you drop. Madison Avenue has won out.

Mr Phillips: Some of us sail, some of us make model engines, and for some people, believe me, this is the most important thing in their life. It is the "Born to Shop" or whatever it is bumper stickers. I do not think we can ignore it, because I think in the end we are going to have to deal with reality versus what we would like to be. Our intentions, I think, are going to deal with what actually will work versus what we would like to work. I think understanding the consumer, probably in the end, is going to be really important.

Second, wherever we can get a kind of comprehensive analysis: I think people will come to the committee with their own self-interest at heart, obviously. So we will see the Canadian Federation of Independent Business saying fees are too high; we will see somebody else with some other one. We have to look, to the best of our ability, at reality. The example I always use is health care, where our cost is 2% on payroll. Maybe if you are in the US, you are paying at least 6% of payroll to purchase the same service in the US; but people only talk about the employer health plan, never about if you were operating in the US.

The third minor point I would make is: Somebody was surprised that higher-income people were the people shopping in the United States. All the consumer research I have ever seen says the smartest shoppers are the ones with the higher income. Maybe that is how they got there, I do not know, but any research I have ever seen reports that. People with lower incomes, for whatever reason—they do not have the time, they have a big family to look after, they may not have the wherewithal to do it, they do not. So I completely support, probably intuitively, the research that says that is who is doing it right now and would suggest it is consistent with my thesis that we have to understand the shoppers and realize they are not necessarily like all the rest of us, or maybe we are not like all the rest of them, or something like that.

The Chair: I am not going to get into that one.

Mr Sterling: As you may know, Mr Chairman, I was very much involved in talking about the same point Mr Phillips brought up as to high-income people who are doing the shopping. When I was looking at statistics related to the habit of smoking, if you had a grade 8 education or less—these are statistics that are about three or four years ago—there was a 50% chance you were a smoker. If you had a high school education or less, there was a 35% chance you were a smoker. If you had post-secondary education, there was only a 20% chance you were a smoker. So therefore you would assume that the people who were better educated would not smoke and, therefore, I suggest that probably the better educated people are finding the barriers first because they are reading about it or whatever. In any rate, that was not the point.

You mentioned in your brief—I just want to get this very clear in my own mind—that if I am over in the United States for, I think it is, more than seven days—it is not important, the actual time—I can bring back $300 duty free. If I am over more than 48 hours I can bring back $100 duty free. However, if in fact all of the tariffs are gone in 10 years, 1 January 1999, do all of those prohibitions go away? What happens on 1 January 1999?

The Chair: I think Mr Kwinter has the answer to that.

Mr Kwinter: This was one of the greatest fallacies when free trade was sold. I would go out and talk to consumers and they got the impression that once the free trade agreement was passed, you could drive over to the United States, open up your trunk, fill it up with everything and bring it back. That will happen in Europe in 1992, because they really have economic union—they are going to eliminate customs barriers at their frontiers—but that is not happening in Canada. The free trade agreement does not provide for the elimination of customs.

In order to protect the economy, there is still going to be restriction as to what you can bring in. You can only bring in so much at a given time. The big issue is that some of them will have a tariff and some of them will not.

The other common misconception is that many of the attractive items that are purchased in the United States, like VCRs and TV sets and tape recorders and CDs, all that stuff, hardly any, if any, are ever made in the United States. Under the free trade agreement, in order for it to qualify it has to have at least 50% content of either Canadian going that way or United States coming this way, so there is not going to be any tariff reduction on goods that are not manufactured in the United States. So that is going to take care of that situation. The tariff will be reduced on those items that meet the content rules, but there will still be restrictions as to the amount of products you can bring in without an import certificate or without going through the whole business of being a regular importer. But for the person coming across the border, there will still be restrictions as to what they can spend when they leave the country.

Mr Sterling: I do not understand that, because I can go over there now and buy something and pay the duty on it. Let's say something has a 10% duty on it at this time. I am not restricted to $300. I am not restricted to $100. I can bring back whatever amount I want to bring back. But once that is gone, how are you going to restrict me in bringing back whatever I want to bring back on American-made manufactured goods? Let's say a US-made car: What is going to restrict me from bringing that back and just paying my GST and my PST as I cross the border? Is there going to be any restriction? Do you know, Anne, or can you find out for us?

Ms Anderson: I will find that out. I do not know that. I know there is the content problem; we will always create duties for that.

Mr Sterling: We are assuming the content problem is taken care of. I know it is an important consideration, as Mr Kwinter has indicated.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter was answering Mr Sterling's question and had his hand up for something else.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to comment on two things. I wanted to comment to Mr Phillips that being a sailor or being a shopper are not mutually exclusive. Just because you do one does not mean you cannot do the other.

The Chair: You could sail over.

Mr Kwinter: Yes. I do not think you can categorize shoppers. I think everybody is a shopper, regardless of what other hobbies they have, and it is something that has to be addressed.

The Chair: Some of us are not shoppers, Mr Kwinter. I can tell you right now some of us are not shoppers.

Mr Kwinter: The other thing that I think is important and it is unfortunate in that—I want to address some of the things Mr Hansen said. You can make the argument—I should not say you can; it is almost impossible to make the argument. You can try to make the argument that the quality of life is better here, that every time you buy something in the United States you are potentially putting a Canadian out of work because the product that is not sold in Canada means that worker who is making that product is not going to be around to make it. But it really falls on deaf ears. It is a difficult thing to sell, to tell people, "Don't go across the border and buy there because by doing it you are depriving maybe yourself or your family or your neighbours of a job, because every time you buy something there it means you are not buying it here and if it's manufactured in Canada and people aren't buying it, the plant is going to shut down and you are going to put them out of work."

I remember there was a huge campaign that went on in the late 1950s called "Buy Canadian" and the Ontario government had it and said, "Some things have to be bought somewhere else." They used the hippopotamus as their symbol, saying that if you need a hippopotamus obviously you have to go to Africa to get a Nile hippopotamus, but if you need anything else that is made in Canada you can buy it here and you should buy it here because it is in our economic self-interest to keep the purchasing power here because that means there are jobs here.

Unfortunately, it is a tough sell. How do you get that message across and how do you get people looking and seeing these ads and saying, "Gee, yes, but I better stay here and keep those jobs"? I do not know how you do it. I think that is one of the things that we as a committee are going to have to address, because it is a significant problem and unfortunately too few Canadians realize the result of this cross-border shopping. It is more than just economic. It is economic in the broad sense, but it is more than just saving the dollars and cents now. It could impact on the whole economic structure of the province.

Mr Hansen: On Mr Sterling's question on the importing of cars, the one thing I would like to see, if Anne can take a look at it, is the GST being applied against a car that comes in duty free which is seven years or older. I know that when you go to register it at the licence bureau you will pay the 8%. Is anybody straight on that, that you pay your GST at the border if it is duty free? You do not?

Interjection: No.

Mr Hansen: Okay. This is one area. The other thing that I met with the Lincoln Chamber of Commerce Tuesday night and, bringing up cross-border shopping, of a sudden Lincoln is a border town. In the paper it is Welland, St Catharines, Port Colborne, Fort Erie and Niagara Falls, but all of a sudden we wind up getting out a little farther and they said, "What is a border town?" I think a lot of people come from Hamilton. I do not know where to draw that particular line. I think Mr Ward earlier had stated Kitchener as being a border town also within one hour.

The other thing is that we are talking about appliances. We are talking about radios, CD players, but one of the businesses in Beamsville, part of Lincoln, is a block plant. I can tell you the owners of the block plant were quite upset to see cement blocks coming into Beamsville to build a house, which were brought in from the United States, so it is not just radios, CDs and that. I had a person come up to me saying he bought the panelling for the outside of his home, which is made by Canfor, in the United States and saved $30 a sheet—imported into the States. So we have a lot of areas to take a look at. I think when I was talking to Mr Sterling earlier about different things in our last meeting there was the point: why is there a price differential in particular items? We will have to take a look at that.

Mrs Sullivan: One of the things that has really struck me about the whole issue of cross-border shopping is the fundamental question of the price of products, whether they are made locally, whether they are made in Canada or the US, whether they are imported to those places. There are still enormous differences in the price cross-border.

I think it might be useful for us if we are able, through our research phase, to actually look first of all at what the economic impact of retailing is on particular communities and then, second, look at what the input costs are on one side of the border in comparison to the other. I am thinking of things like the usual overhead costs, the cost of space, rental, telephones, whatever; the kinds of market sizes that are appealed to; the kinds of advertising and promotional commitments that are made in those communities; whether the retailer is purchasing in volume to meet a larger market or whether in fact in our border communities we are finding that the retailer is making smaller purchase decisions in inventory to meet what is in fact a smaller or perceived to be smaller market; the cost of goods.

It has always been a puzzle to me why, for instance, a product which is manufactured in Japan with exact specifications—Mr Hansen has talked about products with different safety and efficiency specifications—still can be sold in the United States for less money than it is sold in Canada. What is the impact of retail sales tax versus the state and municipal taxes, once again on the input; the impact on employment costs, whether it is for salaries, benefits, whatever.

I think that there is more to this price differential than we have seen in the studies that have been done, and I think it would be useful to look at those things. When you are looking at market research that tell us that 84% of the people, in no matter what circumstances, are satisfied, they are going there for the bargain, period, then some of the other matters are less important for us to look at.

by the bargain exists. It may be of great use to us in terms of coming to terms with some changes that we may want to recommend or to say this is the way it is.

When I was a kid, I can remember people from my farm community going to Buffalo—oh, gosh, not all the time, but there would be a little trip where the car was organized and the people in the community would go down to buy linen, the cotton goods and so on. That is why they went. Now people are going for very different products. They are still picking up cotton goods, but it is a very different kind of a product where there is a substantial price advantage. So I think we should look at some of these other input costs.

The Chair: Thank you. I think those are good questions.

Mr Jamison: I still believe there is a perception that has been created through various means out there in the public's eye that really overstates the case for cross-border shopping. Yet it is a reality in the public's eye. There are certain key factors out there, and we talked about them all here today: gasoline prices, prices of alcohol and tobacco products and so forth.

There is also another kicker there. People understand that we are supposedly into a free trade agreement. I think Monte Kwinter has really outlined very well that there is a tremendous amount of difference in what was there before and what is there now. Again, we are dealing with, I believe, a perception in people's minds that things have changed dramatically in the last two or three years. They really have not, and I guess part of that promotional state of mind, as far as promoting that in people's own minds, has to do with that thing we called the free trade deal, which really did not change a lot. Eighty per cent of the commodities traded freely, and so forth.

Again, this is something that is not new, because I know that it is just a matter that people seemed to have picked up on this in a tremendous way, and especially, I think, the GST has had an effect. If you were to look at this particular ad, for example, it says, "Beat the recession and the GST." When advertisers are advertising that fact, people say, "Yes. Darn right. It is 7% more in the tax it costs me to purchase anything. That is 7% more of a reason to go."

The Chair: They should be paying that at the border, though.

Mr Hansen: Well again, it tends to speak too about that kind of job is being done at the border in assessing the type of goods that are coming in. All those questions are very difficult, we understand, and that is why the committee is here. But we are dealing, I think, as much as anything with that enhanced perception in people's minds that things are now more different than they ever were, and I do not believe they are.

Mr Phillips: Just a quick point. Mr Hansen has his finger on a challenge, I think, for us and that is: What is a cross-border town? I think the Solicitor General said today that he was going to allow or encourage, or whatever it is, cross-border towns to open on Sundays and close everything else. That will be one of our challenges. Is Lincoln a cross-border town? That is why I sort of half kiddingly said we will be able to tell which ones are open on Sunday; it is where the cross border is. So I think that will be one of this committee's challenges as we get into the discussion.

Mr Jamison: I do not know if he spelled that out as his intention. He said he would look at that particular situation. I do not think he has indicated that he has made a final decision on that.

Mr Phillips: I may have misread it today.

Mr Hansen: Commenting on that, I think it was about two months ago when we had a short discussion here before I left, on what is a border community. Before, St Catharines was not a border community or Welland was not a border community or Port Colborne was not a border community, but I read in the paper that it is now a border community, and that is why the constituents in my riding are saying, "What about Fonthill and Beamsville and Grimsby and Smithville?"

An hon member: Where is the line?

Mr Hansen: Yes. What has happened, though, is a lot of these small communities are hurting, because what you had for a period of time was the large malls opened in the larger centres in the Niagara area, which drew business away from the rural community, so the small store closed down. But now you are having the mall close down and a lot of stores closing, and it has had even more of an effect on rural Ontario, especially in the Niagara Peninsula. The services are not there any more. The garages closed up, and you drive to town and the garage is closed on Sunday and Saturday night at 6 o'clock. So what we have done is eliminated a lot of the service in rural Niagara.

Mr Sterling: I have a supplementary point I would like to make. One of the studies we have looked at today was Thunder Bay, which is 200 miles from the border. If we take everything which is 200 miles from the border in Ontario, we have 95% to 98% of Ontario as border towns, so we are going to have wide open Sunday shopping, I guess, in this province.

Mr Phillips: Well, not in Moosonee. Where is Moosonee?

Mr Sterling: No, no. They would be safe.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe it is just me, and I just must be a naïve individual but—

The Chair: But you are young.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe that is it. But it would seem that those people who are receiving most of the benefits from Ontario society and from Canadian society and those people who receive benefits of our occupational health standards or the fact that they do not have to pay directly for health care and that; that those people would somehow develop some sense of the values that make us Canadian and should be willing to spend their money here in this province. We talked about values and we got the constitutional debate going on and yet it would seem that in some ways people are not willing to pay the price—the collective price, not individually—of being Canadian and being Ontarian. In some ways that seems very discouraging. But I guess it is just me. I am just naïve enough to believe that people would still be willing to spend their money here and pay that extra price to be in Ontario.

The Chair: Way to go.

Mr Phillips: I never shop at sales and stuff like that.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to respond to that. Where you have the problem is that a lot of Canadians and a lot of Ontarians feel they are paying the price for this through their taxes, and now what they are trying to do is mitigate that by going out and getting something back, which is the problem. And to say to them, "You are paying taxes," then on top of that, "Restrain yourself from saving so much money by going somewhere to buy it cheaper," is a tough thing. Idealistically, it is a great thing to talk about, but good luck if you think you can sell it.

The Chair: Okay, this committee is adjourned until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1158.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1538

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: I see a quorum. I think it is time to begin the afternoon session. This afternoon we have the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology: Peter Friedman, director of Small Business Ontario; George More, manager, small business development; and Rena Blatt, small business research adviser. This is a very important topic, as we found out this afternoon in the House, so if you can help us out, we would certainly appreciate what you have to say.

Mr Friedman: Thank you very much for inviting us.

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: Can we have the same procedure as we had this morning, that we want to question we can do it as we go along, or do you want to wait until the end?

The Chair: I think if the questions are short and responses are short, we can do it that way. If the questions get a little long and the answers start getting a little long, then we may not get through the document they have prepared for us.

Mr Kwinter: I have no guarantee on the answers, but can give you the assurance on the questions.

The Chair: All right.

Mr Friedman: For those of you who are not familiar with Small Business Ontario, we are a branch of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology responsible for the province's advisory services to new small businesses across Ontario, to arrange financing programs for new and existing small business, for programs relating to growth in technology areas and support of entrepreneurship education in the schooling system. We are also involved in advising the minister on small business issues in the province.

We have prepared the brief you have in front of you to reflect our understanding as a government group involved in small business on a daily basis of the cross-border phenomenon.

I think it is interesting for us to mention to you that the reason we are involved in this particular issue is that it is that one of the important elements of this problem or phenomenon involves the small business owners in the border communities and the effects this is having on them.

The brief we have outlines our involvement to date and one of the responses to the issue we have seen from other governments and from the Canadian business community. I will not read it to you but I would like to highlight some of the points from it.

As you are all aware, this cross-border shopping phenomenon has been with us in Ontario and in Canada for many years. It has been going back and forth, dependent to a great extent on the value of the dollar and so on.

It got into high gear in 1989 when the value of the Canadian dollar went to around 87 cents and when the free trade agreement was passed, which in fact made consumers believe that the border disappeared, and in fact they are able to more easily cross the border.

Our particular involvement in the issue on small business in Ontario dates to the fall of 1989 when a study was done in Thunder Bay that highlighted the problems that were brought to our attention then. In particular, this northern community was suffering significantly from this issue.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, the reason I asked my first question is that the first line I read on the page raises a problem for me, and now that Peter has talked about Thunder Bay he has given me the opportunity to talk about it.

I am concerned, and we have expressed a concern this morning. Thunder Bay, I think, is 200 miles from any border, and yet it is considered a border community. Toronto is 100 miles from the border. People go to Buffalo every weekend. They have buses and everything else. My concern is that you have identified 10 border communities when, in fact, any community within 200 miles, which means most of the communities in Ontario, are really impacted or could be impacted by this cross-border phenomenon.

I was just wondering why would you selectively pick Thunder Bay as a border community, when it is nowhere near the border, and not include Hamilton or anywhere in the Golden Horseshoe or anywhere that is close to the border, within 100 or 200 miles.

Mr Friedman: It guess it is not so much that we have selected Thunder Bay as the community at the border. It is they have selected themselves as a community that is being highly affected by this phenomenon. We did not select these communities; these communities came to us and said, "We believe this problem is affecting our community and our situation." Toronto I am sure is affected; I suppose Hamilton and others as well. But they do not see it as clearly, whereas these communities I think see it more clearly. So my answer to you is, we did not go to Thunder Bay; it came to us. I am using Thunder Bay only as an example. They happen to be the first people who noticed this phenomenon happening. That is the only answer I can give you, basically, on the question.

Once we recognized the problem we met with a number of communities, the first one being Thunder Bay. Once it became known, then the various other communities came to us. Sarnia, Windsor, Kingston, Cornwall, the Niagara region began talking with us on this phenomenon.

I think it is important to realize that the problem seems to be accelerating at staggering rates. It is very difficult to keep a tab on how fast it is happening. One measure we have seen is that there was a 60% increase this year over last year in terms of the number of people paying duty at the border, coming across in cars paying duty.

There are a number of other measurements, and I do not want to tell you that we have all the measurements. We do not have all the measurements to put this phenomenon in precise terms exactly, because it is changing rapidly. You are all aware that in the last couple of weeks in the Buffalo and the Niagara region borders there are two-, three-, four-hour lineups. So the problem and the situation is growing at staggering rates. Why? We have some answers to the why.

The next set of answers, I guess, from our standpoint came from a survey that was done in Sault Ste Marie, again at the request of the town of Sault Ste Marie, done by Ernst and Young in the fall of 1990. They asked a number of consumers in Sault Ste Marie: Why are you going across the border to purchase? The answers those consumers gave are price, selection, service and friendly people. By far the largest factor in this is price.

The next piece that came out of the study is, how much? At that time, what is the ballpark of this phenomenon, at least in Sault Ste Marie? The study indicated that it was in the $100-million ballpark for the Sault Ste Marie trading area. That is how much money was going out.

The third piece of information that came out of that study was what kind of products people were buying. The study indicated the main products were gasoline, groceries, clothing and alcohol. Those are the main products that were being purchased by the people who were interviewed in the Sault Ste Marie study. Along with that, the point was made, and has been made to us in most of the communities, that gasoline seems to be the trigger mechanism that makes people go across the border. Whether this in fact is exactly precise we do not know. It has certainly been made: the consumers are saying it and many people from various other communities where we have not had studies done are also saying that gasoline seems to be the trigger point.

At this point I would like to mention that our perception is that cross-border shopping is a symptom of our competition problem. There exists in Ontario, Canada, a complex series of problems that are reflected in some major price differences between Canada and the United States. These differences are in our distribution systems, our costs of real estate, wages, social costs, the value of the Canadian dollar, interest rates, and so on. These are a complex series of interwoven factors that at this point, as far as I know, no one has been able to totally analyse. The federal government has a study going on right now, which it will unveil on 22 April, that will try to get a little better understanding of these pieces of the puzzle that relate to the price differences.

However, beyond the price differences, over and over again we are hearing that there are other factors that are important in this particular phenomenon. These, as I said in regard to the Sault Ste Marie survey, are selection, innovative marketing techniques, customer service, the shopping environment and convenience. As you see in the outline, some of these are unfortunately perceived to be better in the United States. I want to use that point, perceived versus real, because I would like to get back to some of the marketing efforts we are doing in the communities to emphasize that it is not necessarily true, but it is definitely perceived as being true.

Our strategy in Small Business Ontario, where we have been a catalyst in this, has been to get the various players to address the various pieces of the problem. We have talked with the federal government people and suggested that interest rates, value of the dollar, customs and excise, gas tax and GST enforcement are important issues in this particular phenomenon that they should be looking at. I know they are aware of it. They are doing studies on various aspects of this phenomenon. I cannot tell frankly, whether very shortly you will see moves on area. I know they are aware of all these factors in terms of the problem.

We in small business Ontario have been concentrating on forming community working groups in each of the seven communities that have come to us and said a particular community is being affected by this phenomenon. There are at present in place in the seven communities working groups involving most parts of the community and we have worked with them and formed a border communities task force on cross-border shopping. So we are meeting with all the community task forces on a regular basis and trying to work with them on what they are doing in their communities to deal with this problem.

The task force determined that there is a requirement to do a marketing strategy for the communities, so we undertook to finance a community marketing framework study which we developed, completed in October of 1990, and submitted to all seven communities. It is a fairly in-depth study of what can be done or should be done by the communities and local retailers and local components of the community to deal with mostly the non-price issues involved in this particular phenomenon. The communities have embraced this framework fairly well and we have also assisted three communities across Ontario to implement this particular framework, that is, in Cornwall, Niagara and Sault Ste Marie. We have assisted them financially helping them implement the various suggestions and recommendations outlined in the study.

The task force also identified gasoline prices and harmonization of GST and PST as issues it wanted to talk to the Ontario government about. As you are aware, we made a presentation to this committee a month ago or a few weeks ago, in essence bringing their points of view on those two important issues forward to the committee.

We have continued meeting regularly with these forces and with this overall task force to help them implement the community programs. It is also important to know that various other players are getting involved in this particular phenomenon. The Retail Council of Canada has begun doing some work and has some studies going on, because retailers are one of the main players affected in the border communities by this phenomenon. So they are working and getting some studies from their standpoint in terms of what they see as potential problems or improvements they would like to see. The chambers of commerce, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, have brought forward suggestions from their standpoint. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has also done some work on this particular issue and has presented a brief and a study to the Ontario government. The Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors is also doing some work. The downtown business improvement areas are working on this issue, shoe retailers. And recently, I understand, there has been a mayors' committee formed from the seven so-called border mmunities, which is looking into some of the aspects of this phenomenon.

Through the year or so that we and others have looked at this, some innovative suggestions have been brought forward, not necessarily, frankly, to solve the problem, because I do not believe there is any one easy solution. But, for instance, in Trail, BC, the local merchants and the local banks developed an innovative concept where the banks would loan local residents $1,000 at no interest and the residents would use it to purchase products from the local merchants. My understanding is that that worked extremely well. It was particularly highlighted for the past Christmas season and it had quite a significant good effect. I should tell you that Trail in British Columbia has a bigger problem per capita than we are having here in Ontario, so it is a serious problem in British Columbia as well as here.

So Kingston and Sarnia are looking at this kind of mechanism to see if they could, as a group, bring this kind of initiative into their own communities. Quebec, a few months ago, implemented a gasoline tax reduction scheme at their border points, which included Ontario and New Brunswick. They have pricing zones where at certain distances from the borders the prices are lower. We are trying to get exact information on how effective that has been. To date we have not been able to get extremely good data. We are trying to get that information from Quebec. Other provinces have projects on the go. New Brunswick, which is also being hit very hard, has some interesting, innovative projects again, dealing with other items, not necessarily the same one, which is the price promo.

Our own local communities are making headway with their marketing concepts. They have quite active programs in Cornwall, Sault Ste Marie, Niagara and I believe are beginning to make some headway in this arena, although I cannot tell you that the problem is disappearing by any stretch.

In summary, I would like to conclude by reiterating that this is a highly complex problem for which there is no single easy solution, in our opinion. We are making some headway in some of the areas that relate to the non-pricing issue and continue to work with the communities, trying to get a better understanding of the fundamental aspects of the pricing problems. I will be happy to answer any questions.

Mr Stockwell: Any problems with people in American cars crossing over to shop Canadian? Do you know of any problems where American citizens are crossing the border to shop in Canada at any serious number?

Mr Friedman: Our understanding is that that has diminished some. There is definitely still going on—

Mr Stockwell: But not like it used to.

Mr Friedman: Not like it used to, no. In Fort Erie, for instance, there is still some of that going on. It certainly has not disappeared. There are certain items that are not as expensive in Canada, in fact that are cheaper; higher quality merchandise, brand names, in fact are not more expensive. So people are coming over, for instance, I understand, to buy higher quality suits, shoes and so on.

Mr Stockwell: Not any huge number or disproportionately higher than it used to be or anything along those lines?

Mr Friedman: Definitely not higher than it used to be.

Mr Stockwell: The question that seems to keep popping up, and I can see it as an obvious problem, is price. Are we looking for a complicated answer when a very simple one stares us right in the face? Being a retailer, I know, quite frankly, if you are selling the same piece of merchandise next door to an individual who is selling the same piece of merchandise, if your price is lower you will sell more than he will. I see the report says 82% feel the US has better prices, which seems to be very significant to me. How much further do we have to look and would we be better off looking at figuring out why it is cheaper and what we have to do to reduce the cost?

Mr Friedman: I would like to go back to the statement I made that sometimes it is not an actual versus a perceived cost.

Mr Stockwell: Well, gas is actual.

Mr Friedman: Gas is actual, yes, but groceries overall can be perceived. For instance, there was a study done where a Niagara supermarket compared a basket, the average basket of groceries with an American supermarket and, taking into account exchanges, the prices came out to be even. What is happening is that consumers, as they should be, are becoming very price conscious, and certain products are very much cheaper. Milk, for instance, as far as the groceries go, happens to be an item that is cheaper in the United States. Some other items are not. But when you go in to buy milk and you are in the supermarket, you have a tendency to buy other things as well.

So what we are trying to do in our consumer marketing in our communities is highlight that not everything is cheaper, that certain items are not and that you should not have this idea that everything is cheaper. Now, as far as analysing the price elements—as I mentioned, the federal government is now doing that. We are waiting until the middle of April to get a better understanding of the elements of the pricing structure, where then we will be able to see if there is anything we can do. We know the distribution mechanism. For instance, sharp retailers are now turning to use American distribution mechanisms to buy their materials, which are making them more competitive.

There is an element here that I talked about a bit. One of the elements that we need to work on—this is where the marketing element comes in—is that our retailers are having to become more competitive in their purchasing, in their avenues, and they are now beginning to do that, and also in their methods of merchandising and in their methods of selling.

Mr Stockwell: What about taxes?

Mr Friedman: Taxes definitely play a role, but I think it is—

Mr Stockwell: We had a report in the finance committee saying specifically that state tax on gas, compared to provincial tax on gas, was the sole discrepancy between the gas prices. That seemed pretty clear to me. Have you done any studies to indicate whether our taxes are simply higher than the bordering state?

Mr Friedman: Gas is, for sure.

Mr Stockwell: Gas, okay. Sin taxes we will agree with, but others?

Mr Friedman: The others are somewhat higher, but they are not the only, or even the main contributor to the price differences. Real estate costs, interestingly enough, are a very big contributor. Distribution mechanisms are a big contributor. When people begin to use the American distribution system to purchase their materials, they are able to compete.

Mr Stockwell: Last question is: You have suggested the hook is the gas prices. That hooks a lot of people down there and then they continue on from there. If we did in fact reduce our gas prices, and I guess the sin taxes would be the ones like liquor, cigarettes and so on, which I imagine would be a bit of a hook as well, as stated earlier today—what if we got a little more competitive in those? Would you see that as resolving some part of the problem?

Mr Friedman: The communities are telling us yes. The communities are telling us that if we can equalize the gas pricing to some level—it does not even have to be exactly equal, but so that the differences are close—that would eliminate a fair amount of the day shopping. Mr Kwinter talked about the Toronto people going to Buffalo, Detroit, wherever. I do not believe it would eliminate those problems. People who go for the weekend from Toronto are not going only because the gas prices are lower. They are going because there are social elements and there are other things they wish to purchase. But the border community people, the day trippers, I believe the message we are getting from the local people is that that would in fact be reduced significantly.

Mr Stockwell: And those are those people who will be shopping back in the communities?

Mr Friedman: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Exactly those people they need to get back. They are not worried about the Torontonians. They are worried more about—thank you.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to follow up with what Mr Stockwell was saying. I am old enough to remember when, as a teenager, a lot of Torontonians went to Buffalo for the weekend. They went there for very valid reasons. You could go to the movies on Sunday, which was totally unheard of in Ontario. It was something you never even thought you would ever be able to do. They had the opportunity to buy products that were advertised extensively on television that were not available in Canada. They had the opportunity to buy products that were cheaper and they had the opportunity to do things like go to nightclubs and see name entertainers, things of that kind. It was quite common for people who wanted to make a major purchase to go to Buffalo for the weekend. That was something that you would talk to everybody and say, "I'm going to Buffalo to do that."

Then of course, Toronto and the Golden Horseshoe started to expand. We have Toronto, which is a major metropolitan area, and Buffalo went into a real decline as a matter of fact, Buffalo was the butt of jokes. People talked about Buffalo being the armpit of America. Nobody went to Buffalo. There was no reason to go to Buffalo; as a matter of fact, northern New Yorkers were coming to southern Ontario. It was very common. They used to come to Toronto and they loved it because of all the things we had and because they could then get their entertainment. If they could buy quality goods, they could get the quality of life that we enjoyed. They could share in it for the weekend.

In the last five or six years, the pendulum has swung and now it is going back the other way. It seems to me that the key is strictly price. Even though these things are important and people may have these perceptions, I do not think someone is going to go to Buffalo because they think the service is a little bit better in a restaurant. That is not a motivation. That is a plus. It is a benefit if they can perceive that, but I cannot see someone travelling all the way there when that is the only advantage. So it seems to me that the advantage has got to be strictly price.

And when you talk about your task force or your recommendations and you say, "We don't really address the costs or the pricing; we are talking about the marketing," I think you have to be a pretty good marketer to convince somebody, "You should be paying twice the price for goods in line in Ontario that you are paying in New York because of all the great benefits that are going to accrue to everybody and we are going to show you that this is something that cannot hurt, but I really do not think it is going to help."

I do not think you are going to really convince people so that they will not pursue their economic interests. They can save money, particularly when times are tight, particularly when people are being laid off, where they have to make their dollar extend as far as it can, they are going to be enticed—which is really the word—by all the activity that the merchants in northern New York are doing, seminating to the people in southern Ontario to attract them there. I mean, they think they have literally died and gone to heaven, because suddenly here is this bonanza. Here are these people coming over, lining up to get their cars filled up their cars with merchandise and then going back to Ontario.

To suggest that we have to do a better public relations job—as I say, I do not think it hurts, but I cannot see how it is going to really change it unless we get to the basic problem, and that is our competitiveness. It is not a price problem. When you go into the States, there is merchandise there that just are not available here, there is innovative marketing, there are all sorts of things. I love to go into hardware stores and things in the United States and see some of the products they have that you just cannot find in Canada. They are inexpensive, but more important, they are really innovative. There are really interesting things that you just do not seem to see here, and the reasons for it are many-fold. One, we have a very small market, and many cases it does not pay for a manufacturer to ship to Canada or Ontario because there is not a large enough market for them.

These are the problems we have to address. As I say, I do not in any way deny that public relations and a marketing to try to extol the virtues or the benefits of doing things in Ontario are important, but I still think it gets to the bottom line. You can do all the marketing you want, but if a guy says—and I was talking to Mr Sterling.

Why fill up my car in Ontario? It usually takes, if it is fully empty, about $40, give or take $3 or $4. It is about $10 to fill up my car. I was in Florida two weeks ago. I have a large car and it was down low and I went into a service station and I filled it up. It does not matter whether you are talking imperial gallons, US gallons, litres, the change on the dollar, you could fill up your car for $16. You can compute it any way you want, with exchange and everything else. All I know is there is a gas tank that has the same capacity and it cost me $16 to fill it up there and $10 to fill it up in Canada.

That is the issue. It is an issue where when you go across the border you do not have to worry about it. They are not going to come with a dip stick and say, "How much gas have you got in your car?" You go in and you fill it up and you come back and you can do that every single day whenever you need the gas. That is the main thrust why people do it. There is an incredible saving, if it is not too convenient to do.

There are other things like that where it is the economic drive that is attracting those people there because, things being equal, and I am not trying to be a hometown supporter, I think you cannot compare the amenities, quality of life, the entertainment packages that we have in Toronto vis-à-vis Buffalo. So it cannot be that. It cannot be that people are saying, "Wow, Buffalo is just fabulous, I know; we're going to go down and watch some fires" or something. It is just not going to happen. It has to be a situation where it makes sense to go to Buffalo because we are going to save some money.

Mr Stockwell: Remember when these questions were being asked to be short?

Mr Kwinter: No, no. That was before.

The Chair: Compared to what I have heard some of our federal fellow Liberals doing in some of the other committees, this is really quite short yet.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: There is a question in there somewhere.

Mr Kwinter: The question is: Do you not think that it is dollars and cents as opposed to marketing, public relations and projecting the right image?

Mr Friedman: I guess it is price on gasoline. I do not think it is price on everything. That is the point I am trying to make. I was trying to make that. We know, you yourselves already said, there is interesting, innovative retailing in the United States that is catching the attention of people, which we have only started to do here. Factory outlets are a very big phenomenon around the border areas where we are going. People go to those places because there is a shop-till-you-drop concept of shopping—

Mr Kwinter: Yes, but the bottom line is price. If you have Gucci in there, and you could have all the fancy things you want, people will go and look but they will not buy. The bottom line is, there has to be an economic reason why they are going to shop. They are not going to just shop because it is there.

Mr Friedman: Let me complete my answer. For instance, let me give you an example. Sporting Life in Toronto, an innovative retailing operation, is not a low-price operation. You go to Sporting Life on Saturday and the place is mobbed. What I am saying to you is that when we begin doing innovative marketing with a combination of discounting, which is what the Americans are doing, with the concept of selection, which you yourself mentioned is important in going shopping, along with using the distribution mechanisms that the Americans are using so our retailers can buy the products that their American competitors are buying, I think we will be able to counter on some products.

I cannot argue with you that on certain products, commodity products like gasoline, like milk and other things, you cannot dress it up. There is only so much you can do. But I do not believe that that is the sum total of the situation. Our big worry is not so much on the milk and on the gas, a big volume item, and there is a difficult arena in dealing with price, but we are more concerned about higher-value goods: consumer electronics, household wood products, large appliances, which are being advertised by Americans in our arenas. We think we can fight against that concept by becoming innovative and by doing things differently.

So my answer to you is that on certain products I cannot argue. How are you going to argue on commodity pricing on certain products? But I do not believe it is as simple as price only. We are trying to get our retailers and our communities to fight some of the elements now and deal with the prices by the distribution and other elements to try to reduce the prices as much as possible so they can compete with their American counterparts.

Mr Phillips: I have four quick questions. I will give you all four of them but I would like your thought on this. A very ominous thing is that I think part of the solution, which you have kind of articulated because you are working with retailers, is better sourcing of stuff to sell. You have used the term "the same distribution network as the US." To me, that says buying more in the US.

One of the things that in my judgement is going to happen very quickly because of the US border shopping is that retailers across Ontario, in order to survive, are going to increasingly look to sourcing their stuff out of the US. I think you are looking at that as a solution, but as I say, I think it is because you are heavily represented by retailers, and it will only be a period of time, I think, before the manufacturers will be to this committee saying, "The solution you are proposing is going to dramatically impact on us." I believe that strongly.

Let me give you my four questions: If that is the solution you used, I am interested in whether you see any downside to it.

The second thing: I would not mind you just telling me what might be in the price study, because I like to deal with the facts, and when the federal government comes out with its study, what will be in that to help us determine fact from fiction? It should be very easy, by the way, to determine all that stuff, I would think.

The third point I have is that I think many of us think the Canadian dollar is going to drop versus the US—80 cents or something like that—over time. But the other thing that is ticking away is the reduction of the tariffs, and to the extent that we are seeing this cross-border phenomenon now, with some tariffs still in place, I am wondering if we may not see the tariffs reducing the price of US goods almost as quickly as any forecast of the drop in the Canadian dollar? Can you help me on that? I just do not understand the terms well enough.

My fourth question is the one that was said earlier and that is: Do we have any evidence of what is a cross-border? I know that you have determined it on the basis of who came to you. But are there any facts about what are the cross-border cities or towns in Ontario in terms of surveys at the border of where you come from? I think it was Mr Hansen this morning who said that it looks like the border of cross-border is moving further from the border. It is going to be fairly important for us to determine what is a cross-border city and what is not.

Those are my four questions.

Mr Friedman: The answer to your first question: I think you are right. I guess our strategy is a short-term, long-term strategy. We are trying to combat the phenomenon in a relatively short term, while in the long-term our manufacturing competitiveness comes into line.

I guess our view is that we are trying to change a consumer habit and we are trying to do that by any realistic short-term means possible, while the longer term competitiveness issue has to be dealt with. I do not argue with the fact that eventually our Canadian companies, our Ontario companies, will have to be competitive with their American and European and Japanese competitors, but I think that is a longer term situation.

We are trying to dampen this cross-border shopper-consumer phenomenon in the short term as much as we can and then hope that the long-term situation will right itself, which I believe it will. I am confident that in the long term our manufacturers are going to be able to compete. They will have to. In the end, we will. It will take a while to do that because we are right now, I believe, in the transition period.

Mr Phillips: Can I just complete the thought just so I make sure? The short term can compete by sourcing more of their goods from the US?

Mr Friedman: The US or wherever the products come from. It does not have to be from the US.

Mr Phillips: But outside of Ontario.

Mr Friedman: Many of the products come from outside: Europe, Japan, etc. They come from different sources, basically.

Mr Phillips: But sourcing outside of Ontario, increasing—

Mr Friedman: Well, wherever the cheapest or most effective mechanism is. I am sorry, I have forgotten all the questions.

1620

The Chair: Can I just have a point of clarification on a matter? Are you saying that if a Sony that is made in Japan can be put into a Canadian retail store more cheaply by using an American distributor, that is what we will do?

Mr Friedman: We will not have to do it; the retailer is going to have to do it if he is going to stay in business.

The Chair: Okay, so that is what you are talking about when you are talking—

Mr Friedman: Yes, that is what I am talking about the distribution mechanisms. In the short term, that is one of the ways that our retailers will be able to compete.

Mr Phillips: The other three questions were: the study, what will it include? Will the tariff reductions create any benefits we get from the reduction if the Canadian dollar is reduced, and where does MITT feel the cross-border might be?

Mr Friedman: In terms of the study, it is trying to deal with the various aspects, all aspects of pricing, and we will be happy to provide you on 22 April with a copy of that, but it takes down the retail costs and the whole thing, costs and the various elements of the thing as much as possible.

Mr Phillips: Would that show a Heinz ketchup in Buffalo—

Ms Blatt: It is not going to deal with food, because the Department of Agriculture is doing a separate study on food items, which will be coming out late April, early May. This study is being done by the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, and they picked three areas to look at: women's sportswear, personal electronics and household linen. They picked those as items that come across customs forms very often. So that is how they made their decision. What they are going to do is pick items in each of those categories that are manufactured either in Canada and the United States or that are imported and then look at them from the point at which they leave either the import point or the manufacturing point to see what happens to them as they go through to the consumer.

Mr Phillips: So maybe 300 items or something that we can compare of Canada and the United States.

Ms Blatt: I do not think there are going to be 300 items. I think they are going to look at something like 100 items. We did not have any input into this. They sat down and decided this is what they were going to do, but it is a very complicated thing to do, because they have to look at different mechanisms of distribution and different mechanisms of sale, because you cannot compare women's shoes from a factory mall and from Holt Renfrew. You have to find comparable kinds of retail outlets as well and comparable systems along the way.

Mr Friedman: As far as the tariffs are concerned, most of the tariffs are fairly low in the areas we are talking about, so I do not believe the tariffs will be a major factor in this phenomenon.

Mr Phillips: When you say low, just give me a hi

Mr Friedman: I think most of them are 5% or less, so I do not think the tariff is going to be a big factor.

Mr Phillips: That is why we are looking at reduction of the dollar, though, about a 5% or 6% reduction in the dollar.

Mr Friedman: Yes. I guess I can only tell you that I do not believe that tariffs—the dollar, I think, will have an interesting effect, although in some areas not as large as others. For instance, the gasoline pricing is a particular example: It is not going to be a particularly important factor. In some areas where the pricing is reasonably close, I think it will be a factor.

As for the distance from the border, that is an area we are just beginning to study. We cannot tell you. We only know about the seven specific border points. How far and what per cent the phenomenon is reaching beyond St. Catharines and the Hamilton-Dundas and the Niagara area and others, we are just beginning to take a look at. So I do not have a good answer to tell you.

Mr Phillips: When will you have an answer on that?

Mr Friedman: Probably in three or four months.

Mrs Sullivan: There are a couple of things that are new observations in the beginning. The issue has been identified by retailers as being a problem in a recessionary period as well, which may be a factor in some of the difficulties here, and I do not think we have talked about that very much. We have talked about the impact on the retailers themselves, the fear of going out of business. We have talked, to a certain extent, of the economic impact on the community. But we have not at all talked about the social impact on the community, and I would like to come back to that, because I think it is quite significant in some of our towns.

When you talk about the distances that are affected, the merchants in my town and in the towns I represent tell me that this is a factor, that is, Oakville, Burlington, Milton. That is some distance moved in. Mississauga people tell me that it is affecting their retail operations as well. It seems to me that where people used to shop for specialized merchandise and were prepared to travel distances for that merchandise, say, going out antiquing for an afternoon or to a model train store, whatever, you would be willing to travel, say, from my community to Oshawa or to North York or wherever as an outing, but within Ontario. Now what I am seeing, even in Ontario shopping, is people willing to travel distances, say, to go to a price club—which is an American concept and in fact ownership—to go to Cambridge for the specialized prices on men's shoes, to go to Acton for the leather and so on. And people know precisely where those places are located, where you can get the bargains and are willing to travel the distance to do so, even within our own borders.

When the travelling decisions are made, I think, to go to American outlets, they are made for the same reasons. The fact is that there are bargains, and people are finding bargains. You are suggesting that maybe pricing is not the reason. In my community, people make return visits because they find there is an advantage—and they have done all the analysis, I will tell you—just for the same reasons that they go back to the price club to buy their groceries instead of going to the local greengrocer or the local Loblaws which is down the street.

In Quebec, the tax reduction in terms of the distance affects a very different community than it affects in Ontario. If you look at where the gas tax reduction is, it is basically through the eastern townships into a distance that is substantially away from the border towns where people are doing their shopping. Their analysis says that people in fact are moving far greater distances to go into the American towns for shopping than in fact we have identified so far in Ontario, and I would just like you to comment on that.

I am interested in your comments about innovative marketing, because the innovative marketing ideas so far that appear to be to have been looked at tend to the factory outlet, the loaded-down operation and so on. I will tell you, the downtowns of our communities are going to be extraordinarily and negatively affected if that is the major kind of retailing operation that will suck the breath out of the downtown retailers. That is an economic factor that somehow has to be built into these discussions. Oakville is already suffering, for example; Burlington already suffering. We could go into the Oshawas and Whitbys. They have already identified a problem, and the cross-border shopping, the retailers there feel, is simply adding to it. I think the business improvement areas have probably identified that as a factor. The historical societies in fact are identifying it as well, because they are seeing downtowns destroyed because of the kind of retailing that tends to occur in the older downtowns. I do not know if you have factored that in. I guess it is something else I wanted to throw in, relating to, once again, the distances that are affected and the various kinds of effects on communities that are involved in this problem. I guess that is it.

Mr Friedman: Let me begin with your first comment, which talks about the recession. I think that is a very interesting point. When we first started looking at this phenomenon, there was not a recession, or at least people did not perceive there to be a recession. An interesting factor was that in many of the border communities that we have identified most people were not working on the problem because, in fact, retail sales in most of the communities were still up 5%, 8%, because consumer spending in the fall of 1989 was very good. So they knew the phenomenon was happening, but no one was doing anything.

Thunder Bay happened to be an unusual community, which was affected by it or interested and so on, but in most of the other communities we visited and talked with there was not a great panic about this issue in the fall of 1989, not by the retailers, not by the municipal politicians, not by most of the economic development people in those communities.

The panic, or at least the attention, if you want to call it that, started to develop as 1989 came and as the recession began to take hold and consumer spending began to dry up. Then people began to say, "Holy smokes, there are serious problems here." Cross-border shopping is one of the things we could put our hands on to say, "Look, this is something that is hurting." To be honest with you, there are more things hurting than cross-border shopping.

We already talked about the lack of innovative moves by many of our retailers. Some of the problems are that our downtown merchants have not been upgrading, updating. So it is a complex problem. It is easy to put your hand on cross-border shopping because it is visible. But the reality is that change is what we are talking about. Unfortunately many of our business people were not keeping up with change as quickly as they might have.

Now we are using the cross-border shopping issue as a way of focusing the people to take a look at this rapid change. It is not only factory outlets. Factory outlets are the way the Americans started to do it a few years ago. We would like to look at the next wave—we should be looking not at the factory outlet wave—but what is the next wave that is coming in retail shopping, and let's get on to that before the Americans get on to that.

So that is really what we should be looking for, to be innovative and looking for what is coming down the pike next year and the year after, not only copying the Americans or the other people. And the other people are even ahead of the Americans in retail in many parts of the world.

I guess what we are saying is that the important elements are to be innovative, to keep ahead of the change, to understand what consumers want: price, convenience, quality, all those things; value, really. When we are able to do that, whether it be in the downtown cores or in the outlying cores, that will remain to be seen, I guess, and what are the new kinds of things one wants to do.

The other important point, I think, which I did not talk about when Mr Phillips talked about the manufacturing, is that it really is not only a retailing phenomenon in the concept. It is really an integrated mechanism, where the retailers have to work with distributors, with the manufacturers. The whole concept has to be innovative. Another example I could use is IKEA. IKEA is an innovative retailing concept because it is an innovative manufacturing concept.

It is those kinds of mechanisms we have to work towards to keep ahead of the game and be able to compete with our American cousins and anyone else. I do not know whether that answers your questions or not.

Mrs Sullivan: When you talk about moving away from the factory concept—I was very interested in looking at the Sealy operation that went under at Steeles and 427. That company went under. It was bought out in a liquidation by another operation. Within two weeks of that company closing down—and it had been selling its merchandise basically through the large department stores—it was doing $1 million worth of business a day, and people were travelling hundreds of miles to make their purchases there. Now, some of that is management, some of it is distribution, but there have to be other factors as well. That is one situation that has occurred here, where the merchandise was not going out to the community; the people were coming in there.

Mr Friedman: I think you are right. Again, I go back to convenience, value. That involves delivery, it involves having good stock on hand, it involves a lot of factors that make consumers happy, and that is what we have been striving for. I guess my own view is that we have the capacity and capability of doing that. It is a matter of being motivated, and I think we are not motivated.

Mrs Sullivan: Just to my last point, are you looking at the effect of this phenomenon on the economic viability of the downtowns?

Mr Friedman: We are certainly working with that to look at—the downtowns are being devastated in much in those communities. There is no doubt about that. Even Windsor. Certainly Sault Ste Marie is feeling it just because of the cross-border shopping but because of Algoma. The Niagara region certainly is feeling it. Cornwall and Kingston. All of them are feeling it in the downtown core, no doubt.

Mr B. Ward: I recognize this is a very complex issue that has a number of factors all playing together one or the other, interacting. I would like to focus on the real estate cost for a moment. I do not know for sure, though, just what I have heard, that land in Buffalo—and a manufacturer used it as an example—is dirt cheap compared to what it is in Ontario and Canada. Recognizing that perhaps there is some economic devastation occurring along our border towns in the core areas in the retail sector, if our land was more expensive in the past, should market forces have some play into the cost? If no one is willing to buy or lease space in Ontario border towns, obviously the cost should be coming down. At present, you think the cost of real estate is playing a role in the price of a product that you can purchase in the United States compared to Ontario?

Mr Friedman: I think you make a very good point. However, there are many people in existing shopping malls paying huge prices on long leases. So I think you are right in new facilities or many facilities that are now being developed. I think the prices in fact have come down dramatically, the real estate prices, but they are still higher than they are in the United States.

The interesting part, which we did not really get into very much on this issue, is that prior to 1989, the Americans really were not doing very much to promote this issue. It was happening, but they were not promoting. Since then the Americans have gotten significantly more interested in this, and two things have happened:

One, major shopping malls have been positioned at each border point, so now in Cornwall you will be able to go to a very sophisticated shopping mall just across the border, where prior to that there was nothing; the same with Sarnia, and certainly in the Niagara region they are improving their situations.

Two, they are doing a significant amount of promotion in Canadian newspapers, so they are widening up their perspective and doing significant marketing to the Canadian scene.

These new malls are coming in and they are very large malls, many of them, 800,000 square feet and so on. They are not incidental little malls they are putting in; they are very large. And because of that, they are providing a lot of elements.

In terms of real estate, I think the prices have come down, but where people are on long-term leases it is a blem.

Mr B. Ward: They are stuck with them.

Mr Friedman: So it is improving, but by no means realized.

0

Mr B. Ward: I have two other points I would like to focus on. The aspect that these super malls are locating in very close proximity to the border points, does that more or less give you, in your opinion, the fact that some American retailers are no longer focusing on the American consumer and are focusing on the Canadian consumer to a greater degree and, in fact, that is what they are relying on for their business growth?

Mr Friedman: Exactly. I think that is certainly true. In many of these situations the Canadian side is bigger than the American side. In Sarnia, in Cornwall, in Sault Ste Marie, the Canadian side is larger than the American side. They definitely have a campaign to get the Canadian market to come, and what I am saying is that is a more recent phenomenon. It certainly happened to some extent prior to 1988-89, but now it is sort of a conscious effort, which is not helping our problem. I think that is certainly contributing to our problem.

Mr B. Ward: The third point I would like to get at is that Canada has always been a safe society; we have always played it safe. We invest in Canada savings bonds, in traditional banks, whereas the Americans invest in stocks and bonds, seem to be more risk-takers from a capitalist standpoint than Canadians, traditionally. The fact that Americans seem to be outthrusting us when it comes to retail along border points, innovations—they have already gone through the phase of the discount factory malls, and now we are kind of looking at that as an option, when you think we should be looking to the future. Other than long-term marketing, how do we instill the innovation that is necessary for our retailers to begin to look to the future? I say, "We can compete head to head"? It has to come from inside, I think. We need risk-takers, people who are willing to take a chance, and how do we overcome the fact that we are Canadian?

Mr Friedman: That is one of the things that our marketing strategy and community involvement are trying to do. We are trying to get our retailers to begin, or continue, some of them, being innovative. With communities, groups of communities looking at the issue, I think we are beginning to do that. I think some areas will be faster than others, but I think what is happening, and the reason I said that is that necessity is now forcing people to do this. Entrepreneurs are entrepreneurs. They do not like to be out of business and they will become just as aggressive, just as innovative as their American cousins are if they are required to be that way. I think we are beginning to see that in some areas; we are starting to see that phenomenon opening more and more. I think it can be done. It is a matter of how fast, and it certainly will not be across the board simultaneously.

Mr Hansen: I guess I do not have to give Mr Kwinter any history lessons. I think he has been there before I have been, but I know in the early 1960s, most young people went to the United States just to grab a beer because the age was 18. That was your shuffling off to Buffalo.

At that time you did not dare bring anything back across the border with you because they would impound your car. There was that fear of coming back, if you were going to smuggle something in, and there was not the openness of saying that you could purchase this and you could purchase that, even right up until 1980. I took a look at the chart in here and my experience coming back from the Buffalo Zoo. One of my children bought a small item at the zoo. It cost $3. I wound up paying, I think, 78 cents duty on it. So it was a lot different in 1980 from what started in 1987. In 1987 we hear the rumblings of free trade coming up. More people are starting to go over. In 1989 they get the impression that free trade is here, that the consumer can walk over. At the borders now there are so many people they cannot stop me. Look at the lineup. They just push and push and push through. So nobody ever thinks about your car impounded now because there are so many waiting behind. A lot of attitudes have changed. People do not fear that any more.

The other thing I wanted to mention also is the service over there. We talked about service. Buy something in the United States, you know where you take it for service? Back to the United States. You cannot take it to your corner dealer. They cannot honour the warranty here in Canada because it is a different division of a lot of the companies.

The other thing I want to mention—and they are more comments to maybe take back—is that for years our businesses have invested in our communities. The American businesses are not investing in Vineland, Fontheil, the small towns. This is what I brought up earlier. If we are going to have business investing, we have to patronize these businesses in our small communities. I think this is a point to tell people: that these businesses have supported ball teams, supported the hospitals, supported all these different activities that we have in our small communities. If we stop dealing with some of these businesses locally, just because we are talking about a dollar or two, we are going to lose out with what we have in our communities. It is not a question, but it is a point. Listening to all the questions here I think there were quite a few that came out. These are my feelings living in the Niagara area.

We own a business there in Welland and we do have Americans come over to buy our central vacs, which are better quality than what they can buy in the United States: 5% of our business; it is not all of our business. We depend 95% on local people to purchase from us.

Mr Jamison: I have two questions for you today. I would like to ask you for your information or background on the one vital area for small business, that of course being interest rates and how a small business carries its debt. I would like a comparison of what it would cost a small business in Buffalo or in any border community to carry the outstanding cost of doing business compared with the cost of a small business borrowing from the bank here in Canada, and what kind of impact that would have on your ability to compete. That is my first question, and I have a second question after that.

Mr Friedman: Certainly the interest rates are an important factor. The interest rates vary between Canadian and American by four or five percentage points. So carrying costs on merchandise definitely are a vital component. It is very difficult for me to tell you what percentage that component is. That will be looked at in the pricing mechanism that we are looking at. But it certainly is an important factor, no doubt, because it involves more than just the working capital that you need to operate, it involves other kinds of capital costs that you have to borrow money for. So it is certainly an important factor, no doubt.

Mr Jamison: Okay. You do not have any real information about the actual cost, but what you are saying is that you are going to develop that information.

Mr Friedman: Yes. We know the differences are around 4% or 5% between the Canadian and American interest rates, but what factor that is on each product is not a simple thing to determine. On each product you have to analyse, and some of that analysis will be done when they look at these various products.

Mr Jamison: The second question: I have a perception that over the recent months there has been a tremendous increase in the number of people who are cross-border shopping, and I think it has proven out here from what has been said already. Myself, I really feel that once the GST was implemented, it was almost like a backlash, that people said: "Well, that's it. I have had enough." It is almost as if it were an automatic response to cause that quickening of the pace of cross-border shopping. Do you find in any of your studies that the introduction of the GST may have played a role in heightening the response of people to go across the border more readily?

Mr Friedman: Rena has some data. I can only tell you that it is early in the game as far as the GST goes. It is a contributing factor and we may be able to tell you how much it is, but it is a continuing phenomenon. It certainly has not helped and has probably accelerated the situation, but it is a continuing curve that has been going on very heavily since 1989. It has certainly added to that phenomenon on certain products.

Mr Jamison: Just so I am getting the message clearly across to you, I wonder if we could look at that from the time of implementation of the GST—because there was a standard date on implementation—to see if there is any increase. I know that is a lot of work; I know you are doing a lot of work, and you are doing, in my opinion, a very good job of trying to get a handle on this, but I think there was a reaction in the general public that basically said: "Hey, enough is enough. If I didn't have a reason for going, now I do."

Mr Friedman: We will certainly be very happy to come back to you and get the January-February statistics as soon as we can and let you know just what added effect that had on the issue.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to talk briefly about an issue that we really have not touched on. It was alluded to when we talked about Sony, but we really have not explored it, that is, how you overcome—and I am looking to you, Peter, for some solutions—the economies of scale and that fact that you have a 270-million-person market in the United States and you have a 27-million-person market in Canada. A company like Pharmor, which is a combination of Consumer's Distributing, K-Mart and all that stuff, can go to Sony and say: "We will order from you 10,000 Sony Walkmans and use it as a promotional item. What is your best deal?" In fact, they can buy it and, in most cases, they can sell it cheaper than the Canadian retailer can buy it, and even at the promotion price make more money than the Canadian retailer can make on it. This happens all the time.

One of the Toronto papers—I do not remember which one it was—had a comparison of branded merchandise, not one with smaller engines but identical, saying, "If you bought this in Buffalo, this is what it would cost you if you bought in Toronto—"factoring in everything, factoring in GST, factoring in the tax. Some of them were kind of comparable, I think a couple of them were even cheaper if you bought it here, but by and large most of them were significantly cheaper in the United States than they were here.

That has nothing to do with marketing. It has nothing to do with competitiveness. It is the power of being able to buy it, the clout that an American Sears or another American company would have with its vast customer base and its ability to buy in the tens or hundreds of thousands, depending on the item, and negotiate that kind of price. We do not have that consumer base here to do that. How do you deal with that?

Mr Friedman: I guess my answer is that, in certain areas, to deal with those giants is going to be difficult. I think it is a matter of marketing mechanisms. Quite often those situations look for the lowest quality product, quite often the low line of the area, and in that area you probably will not be able to compete. But if you are going up to the higher line areas, which is where perhaps we want to concentrate—but that is where the merchandise mix comes in and how you might look at it—we might be able to compete, because they are not going to be able to perhaps quite as large a number of those areas.

In some areas, where you are competing against a huge volume in a huge situation, you probably will not be able to compete directly. But maybe people are not interested in the lowest-priced consumer electronics. Maybe they are interested in buying one that is better quality. For instance, Bay Bloor Radio is in business; it is not selling products that are at the lowest in the market and it is selling them very effectively. Again, it is through a merchandise mix. We will not be able to compete in every area, but we might be able to compete in parts of the market. We have big retailers as well here. We have Eaton's; we have Simpsons. Those people can buy fairly large volumes.

As I say, in the short term, these people and the people at the border communities are going to begin looking at those same distribution mechanisms and those same volumes of buying big volumes. We know products, for instance, are sold in Canada in those fields cheaper than in the United States, even electronic products.

I guess my answer is that selectively, I think we can compete—not on everything, so we have to choose our products and educate our consumers that sometimes the best-priced product is not always the best value.

Mr Kwinter: Let me give you a case history of something that happened to one of my constituents. He came in to see me about it; he knew I used to be the minister of industry and trade. He took some pride, and he is a professional man, which was kind of interesting. He wanted to buy a Lifecycle, you know, one of these things you ride on. It has all the computer printout and everything else. He went to one of the major chains in Toronto and I think—I don't remember the exact figure but it was in excess of $3,000—$3,200, $3,300. He had three of his friends who wanted to buy it as well. These guys are very, very sharp, and they said, "This is ridiculous; that's too much money." So they took a look at where it was manufactured. It was manufactured in the States, and they called the manufacturer located in the Midwest. He told them who he was; he told them he is a doctor. He said: "I would like to get this thing and I have three colleagues who want them. Can you tell me where in northern New York you sell them?" They gave him the address of a company in Buffalo. They called them in Toronto and said: "We've talked to the manufacturer. They gave us your number. Could we get four of these pieces of equipment?"

First of all, he called up and asked if they had it. He didn't say four; he asked them how much, and was told $1,500. He said, "Oh, great, do you have them in stock?" They said, "Oh, we have lots of them." He said, "What about four?" They said: "Well, if you want four, I'll really give you a deal. I'll give them to you for $200." So he said: "Fine, we'll take four. We'll be there over the weekend to pick them up."

They got into a van, they drove to Buffalo, they paid $1,200. They came to the border, and the total with everything, the GST, the works—because they are not manufactured in Canada, I do not think there was any tariff on them—cost them $70 plus the exchange. He came back and said, fabulous, they love it.

That is being duplicated every single day, where people are taking a look at their economic opportunities and saying, "A dollar in my pocket is as good as a dollar in some other person's pocket and I am going to go where I can save myself some money." And they become very ingenious about it and they really work at it. This is just a casual kind of thing. They look at it and say: "You know, it pays us. We can go down there and, collectively, do you know how much money we are saving just by taking a trip to Buffalo?" That is the problem we have to address.

Mr Hansen: It was four people who went?

Mr Kwinter: No, they just sent one guy down to get it back the—

Mr Hansen: Because they ask at the border: Is it for your own personal use? Normally, you would not bring that thing in unless you were an importer.

Mr Kwinter: Maybe the four of them did, I do not know. The four of them may have gone down and got them.

Mr Friedman: I guess the only comment I can make—and that may not help—is I believe that our consumers are much more innovative today than our retailers. I think the name of the game is that when our retailers become as innovative as our consumers, then some of these opportunities are going to change. I understand what you are saying, but our consumers seem to be extremely innovative, and they are becoming more innovative by necessity. Doctors do not necessarily have to be innovative. The reality is that they could have probably bought it for $3,000. But being innovative and looking for opportunities seems to be what many consumers are doing.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just make one comment. The point is that the consumer has the option to take a look at the options that are out there. Unfortunately, a lot of our retailers do not have that option. They cannot be as innovative as the consumer because they do not have the option. They cannot pick and choose where they are going to be selling or where they are going to be. They are stuck where they are and they have to deal with the people who walk in their door. The consumer can go anywhere he wants to where he thinks it suits economic advantage, and that is the problem.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to provide a supplementary to Mr Ward's comments relating to interest rates, because they are a factor in several ways, including cost of interest on land purchase or, if that happens to be a phenomenon, cost of borrowing for inventory, and then the other side of it is the cost of credit.

In fact, I just looked at a bill—the American credit laws require disclosure on monthly and annual basis of cost of credit to the consumer—that I had on an American credit card. The cost of credit there right now is running 16.6%, yet if I look at a comparable store in Ontario the cost of credit is 24% to 26%. So it is clearly a factor both from the cost of the overhead and cost to the consumer. Just to say you are right; it is the first time I have agreed with the NDPs since they were elected.

Mr Stockwell: I talk to some people occasionally and they talk about the retail business. Right now, I think you would have to have rocks in your head to go into the retail business. Clearly, the taxes, locally, provincially and federally, are killers. I do not know whether you have investigated it or not, but in my humble opinion, if you look at these things, your tax rate as a small business person is absolutely ridiculous. You are paying taxes that you never paid before now and you have to pick up exceptionally high costs to operate a small business. I am not suggesting interest rates are not part of it and I am not suggesting there may be some build in for GST, but when you pile health tax—they are talking about worker protection tax on top of that tax—and your local tax, your business tax, your corporate tax, etc, and you compare it to your American counterpart, I think you will find one of the largest discrepancies of all.

Mr Friedman: I would like to answer that because that is one of the most interesting phenomena of all. One of the things we are finding, interestingly enough, is that the rate of new business starts in Ontario is just as high as it is in the United States. Even in the present recession, we are getting 40,000 to 50,000 new businesses being started in Ontario.

Mr Stockwell: How about closing?

Mr Friedman: The closings are definitely up, but you are making the point that people perhaps would not or should not or are not starting businesses. The interesting part is that people are in fact starting businesses.

Mr Stockwell: I am not disagreeing with you. I think they are starting the businesses; they are just not staying in business.

Mr Sutherland: Is that retail or all businesses in general?

Mr Friedman: No, no. All businesses are about that. About 70% are service, 6% are manufacturing and the rest are retail. So there is a fair number of retailers starting now, as there were last year, as there were the year before. I think that is another element, frankly, that is interesting, that will help our competitiveness: that there are a lot of people starting businesses. That is one of the reasons that I am optimistic about what may be happening in Ontario.

Mr Stockwell: But that is the most misleading figure of all. I am in my mall, where I am. There are lots of people starting businesses and they are coming into business and they are going out far quicker than they ever were. They are opening and closing sometimes in months. I do not think that is indicative. If you are going to look at openings, look at closings as well.

Mr Friedman: We are looking. We have looked at closings and they are up—

Mr Stockwell: Dramatically.

Mr Friedman: I do not know about dramatically. But from my perspective, as long as we have a lot of people starting businesses, it is a very healthy sign. The Americans, by the way, are also going out of business. Failure rates in the United States are almost as high as they are in Canada, so one of the interesting parts about the overall elements of small business is that we are not worse than the Americans. We are in the same basic situation. We have just as healthy a business startup situation. The failure rates are no higher in Canada and in Ontario, particularly, than they are in the United States, and that is the good sign. I mean, that is really what is exciting. People are still starting, and a percentage of them are going to grow and a percentage of them are not, so there are various people out there who are going to be innovative, are going to find new ways of doing things, and they will certainly not overcome all the barriers.

Many of the things that you have said, and Mr Kwinter and others, are real barriers, and no one is going to say that some magic wand is going to eliminate them, but nor, on the other hand, are we doomed to failure and it is all over and everybody is going to go to the United States. I do not believe that either. So there is a sense of balance that seems to be, at the moment, tilted this way, which I think we can neutralize some more, and that is really what the point is all about.

The Chair: Just in closing, I think it might be useful for the committee to have copies of your marketing strategy. Can we get that? I believe you said that in early 1991 Agriculture Canada is bringing in a study that it has done. Will you be getting copies of that, and can you forward that to us as well? And could you also forward to us studies about what you are talking about as being the next wave in terms of retail marketing? And any other studies that are coming in, perhaps you could share them with this committee as they come in so we can be updated. Thank you very much for coming. For the rest of the committee, we have one last item to do.

Mr Kwinter: Peter, well done.

Mr Phillips: Solve this problem.

The Chair: That's right; we have the answers to your questions.

Miss Anderson has done some research for us and another item for us today that she would just like to share a few words about.

Miss Anderson: This morning people had asked about different tariff rates coming into Canada, and about limitations, and I just happened to get this in the mail today, this article, and from page 7 onwards, it gives you different tariff categories that are applicable to goods coming across the border now; also on page 10, the limitations that exist at the moment, that you can only bring 2 kilograms of meat in per person and certain other things like that. So I will continue to get the staging categories for you and it gives you some initial information anyhow.

Mr Phillips: I think that is almost all I need. When I looked at those, actually it seemed different than the impression the MITT person left with us, that it is a minimum 4% or 5%.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just explain: What you are talking about is that it just happens that those items are at that level. As I said to you this morning, the tariff rates range from as little as less than 1% to as high as 40% but on average, it is between 7% and 10%. Now, it just depends on the category. In these particular categories there, it is 18%, 16%, whatever it is, but overall, the average is between 7% and 10%.

Mr Phillips: I am just saying the MITT. You are saying the MITT. The MITT person said around 4% and, to me, when I eyeballed these things, just thinking about a typical category coming across the border, it seemed higher than 4% or 5%.

Mr Hansen: What they do is average it at the border at 12%. So they do not break it down. You have a case of beer, you have some groceries. They usually just say 12% for the total purchase.

Mr Phillips: I think judgementally that 12% is probably closer than 4%, and therefore my own feeling is that I hope that the dollar move from 86 cents to 80 cents is going to solve a lot of this stuff—I think the tariffs are going to go down faster than the dollar. That is all I am saying.

The Chair: Yes, but just remember that from 86 cents to 80 cents is somewhere in the area of 9 percentage points.

terms of exchange rate. It is calculated differently. It is a one-to-one relationship.

Mr Phillips: Let's say it is 7% or 8% and let's say it is % of the tariffs. I am just saying that that ain't going to be the solution. That is all.

The Chair: Thank you. This committee is adjourned until next Thursday, 10 o'clock in the morning.

The committee adjourned at 1712.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 4 April 1991

The committee met at 1007 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Chair: We have a quorum now. I would like to welcome the Minister of Revenue this morning to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. If we could begin with your written presentation and then we will move into the questions. If you would like to begin now, Minister.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I would like to thank you for the invitation this morning to come and speak with all of you. I would like to also thank you for taking on this issue and recognizing it as an important issue across this province and actually across the country.

With me this morning is Roy Lawrie, assistant deputy minister for tax revenue; Burke Williams, director of the retail sales tax branch, and Ralph Robertson, senior manager of legislation in the retail sales tax branch.

The Ministry of Revenue has been doing some work on cross-border sales. Being from a cross-border shopping community, I also am very aware of the problems and some of the complaints and some of the avenues that were suggested to solve the problem.

Underlying reasons for cross-border shopping are many. The first one and the most obvious one to the consumers is that goods are cheaper in the United States, so it makes dollar sense for them to go there and purchase what they are looking for. The Canadian dollar is high, which also makes goods even more appealing in the US. The marketing practices: In the US the retailer is more likely to buy directly from a manufacturer, while in Canada the tendency is more to buy through wholesalers or distributors. Economies of scale: There is more demand in the US because of the larger population than what we have in Canada and Ontario. Business costs are lower in the US and this is the result of different health, social and educational services that are offered. And in Canada, the provincial support is at a higher level.

The free trade agreement created a perception among consumers that they could go to the US and get their articles cheaper and pay less tax or, in some cases, no tax. Also, the tariffs have affected that. The goods and services tax too, after it became law in January, increased the amount of people cross-border shopping, and one of the reasons that they were giving was that because of the goods and services tax it seemed to be cheaper for them—economic sense for consumers—to go there.

I believe a very small reason is not enforcing the collection of the retail sales tax. Many consumers believe that when they cross the border, they have paid all the taxes. They have to pay to the province and also the differences in what we would be charging tax on compared to what the federal government collects, the customs offices collect. If there would be a minimal effect, I think, of collecting the retail sales tax at the border, and I think that has to be an educational experience where people are educated on that.

The ministry has been lobbied by border area chambers of commerce, merchants in close proximity to the border who are losing business, border area city and town councils and, I assume, we will be lobbied in the very near future by the new committee that was set up by the area mayors who were in the city yesterday to meet.

Many people have talked about collecting retail sales tax at the border. It is our understanding that in order to do that, the province must join the federal government's GST before the federal government will consider collecting retail sales tax at the border for us.

The least expected is a harmonized tax base. Our bases are different from the federal government's. The training of customs staff would be very difficult and would have to be taken into account. The issue has been explored at the senior staff level with Revenue Canada, customs and excise, and also with other provinces. No other provinces have yet achieved it, not even Quebec and Saskatchewan, which did harmonize with the GST. The federal government is still not willing to collect retail sales tax for them at the border crossings. The difference in bases includes the following items exempt in Ontario but taxable under GST: children's clothing, books, newspapers and shoes under $30.

Canada has a returning-resident exemption which Ontario has not adopted. Difficulties for Revenue Canada caused by residents of other provinces crossing into Canada via Ontario: Something else that we would have to take into account is travellers who just end up coming through a border crossing, not because they are cross-border shopping, but just because of their travelling plans.

Ministry of Revenue border collection has also been looked at. It would be a very costly project to begin. It would require at least five people at all border crossing points, and there are 14 US-Ontario border crossings. Consideration would also have to be given to establishing the same type of collection at provincial borders and at the international airports.

Without a returning resident-exemption, the retail sales tax would be payable when the GST and duties are not. There could also be a constitutional argument, as Ontario may not have the right to check on international border points.

Ontario could place employees in the Revenue Canada customs offices to collect retail sales tax. We would have to ask for permission to do that, and most of the border crossing offices are now too small for the staff who are in there. So the thought of bringing in more staff I do not think would be accepted by the staff who are presently there or the federal government.

Recent federal action: the express lanes that were set up in Vancouver. Apparently there is going to be one set up in Ontario; I believe it is this summer at some point. We have not been consulted on any of what the federal government is planning to do with that.

The rule for the express lane is that it is a special lane at the border, set up for permit holders only. The users must be lawful residents of Canada or the US. They must be frequent travellers between the US and Canada. They must apply for a permit and pay a $10 annual fee. The permit is not transferable. The permit holder must report loss, theft or sale of the vehicle. Only family members listed on the application may be in the vehicle. No controlled or restricted items may be carried, no business materials, professional goods or goods for resale. All items must be for personal use and adults are entitled to 1.14 litres of alcohol. Canadian residents would use the traveller declaration system and pay tax with Visa or MasterCard. The 24- and 48-hour tourist exemptions may be claimed by qualifying travellers.

So far the Ministry of Revenue has limited to vendor mailouts explaining the obligations of returning residents. An advertising campaign and education campaign was considered by the previous government, but it felt that it did not want to go ahead with that for its own reasons. The present newspaper articles on cross-border issues have also made the public more aware of cross-border shopping and the effects it is having on us as a province and the effects it is having on the municipalities directly affected.

Co-operation with other jurisdictions has begun. Exchange-of-information agreements have been signed with all provinces. An agreement has also been reached with the state of Ohio, and we are actively pursuing agreements with other states. This addresses, unfortunately, only the instances where the goods are shipped into Ontario and exemption is claimed in the sending jurisdiction, so the agreements will not address the Ontario residents shopping in the US and returning with their purchases. The branch is able to assess tax on the purchases made and shipped to Ontario from the data received from other jurisdictions.

Sunday shopping also has a minimal effect, I feel, on cross-border shopping. In meeting with people through the whole time period before the ruling came down from the Supreme Court, the chamber of commerce people did not feel that having the stores open in their community was causing more people to stay in the city, in that municipality, to shop on that Sunday. People were still going cross-border shopping, so they did not feel that had an effect.

The two main articles that are purchased when people go to the US have been gas and groceries, both of which we do not collect retail sales tax for. So collecting retail sales tax at the border would not mean that we would be collecting on those two articles, which are the largest purchases that people make when they go to the US.

There have been explanatory talks at senior-official level with regard to the collection of retail sales tax by Canada Customs. The differences on the tax paid would create a lot of difficulty and therefore would make it almost impossible to do unless we were willing to have the same tax base as the federal government has. As I said, where the tax base has been adopted by other provinces, as in Quebec and Saskatchewan, the federal government will still not collect the tax for them.

We are presently working on an agreement to go to Jelinek, the Minister of Revenue for Canada, to ask if we would agree to collect the retail sales tax at the border in order to do this, we have to be prepared to have a bargain tool to take with us. I am prepared, in consultation with the Treasurer and other ministers affected, to introduce an amendment to extend the federal returning-resident exemptions to retail sales tax. All the indications we have from the federal government thus far have said quite plainly that it will not collect our tax. Maybe by offering to have the same exemptions as they do, we may be able to collect some. I do not know, and that is something that we are presently working on.

Mr Kwinter: I have several questions that I would like to pursue. One of the things that bothers me about the whole issue is that I do not think we really have a handle on the magnitude of it. I think that all of the figures are predicated on what happens with declared goods at the border. I do not know what the proportion is, but it could be one fifth, a tenth, a hundredth of what really comes across the border.

Do you not think it would be valuable for the Ministry of Revenue to at least identify, as accurately as it could, the magnitude of the problem? You can come across the border and if you have gone over for the day and if you claim that you have bought less than $20 worth of goods, you just say that and away you go. Again, without trying to impose any motives to people, I would be surprised if anybody goes over to Buffalo for the day and spends as little as $5 but they come across and they say that they do.

If we could get at least an idea of the size of the problem it might justify some measures that might seem to be terribly expensive, given the problem as we see it on declared goods, but may be very, very small in comparison to the actual dollar value that is flowing out of Ontario.

I do not know if any of your officials or anyone has had an idea or has thought about trying to identify the size of the problem.

1020

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: We have definitely thought about identifying the size of the problem and realized that it is a very large problem. We do not have a handle on probably how serious the problem is, because as you say, a lot of people probably go through, they say what they have purchased but have not said what they have not purchased or have acknowledged what they have not purchased.

I think doing a study—we have talked about it in the ministry and I have talked about it with the officials—it would be very hard to do. It would have to be a study to get a magnitude from one particular area. I could ask Mr. Wark-Martyn if he wants to comment any further.

Mr Lawrie: I think that only Canada Customs is in a reasonable position to size the problem, and I think it would have occasional surveys of people crossing the border where they are asked to fill out a detailed questionnaire about what they purchased. From our perspective, it would be nice to know exactly how much revenue that we are missing but we would require a further breakdown than the federal government would to determine which of the items were taxable from the point of view of retail sales tax, which is not the same base as GST, as you know.

We have also examined the possibility of trying to estimate the loss over time through looking at our own tax collection in the border areas, but there are problems with that, particularly with chains, where most of their revenue, according to the tax roll, is attributed to the head office of the chain. It is not on a retail outlet basis. That is not how our tax roll is structured, basically because that is not the way the vendors want it. They want one account for the entire business. So there are difficulties in estimating it by way of a drop corresponding to an increase in statistics out of Canada Customs and also out of various studies that have been done by municipalities on increasing border shopping.

So there is a problem. I agree with you; it would be nice to be able to quantify it, but Canada Customs is really the only people who are able to do it, and even then only by way of a partial survey. As you know, you do not always make a written declaration to customs, coming back over the border.

Mr Kwinter: That is exactly my point. I would say that the bulk of the people who come across the border who have been day shopping do not make a written declaration. They just say, "I spent $20," and away they go.

Mr Lawrie: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: It would seem to me that given the fact that we have pollsters and researchers who can supposedly determine within three or four percentage points the accuracy of anything that they want to poll—

Mr Sterling: Except for Goldfarb.

Mr Kwinter: Well, there are some notable exceptions. You would think that they would be able to do a survey. I am not as concerned, although I am concerned, about the loss of revenue as far as the Revenue ministry is concerned, about not getting its 8% retail sales tax. That is an issue, but I am far more concerned with the loss of economic activity in Ontario that is going over to the United States. The numbers would pale in comparison, like the loss of retail sales tax compared to the dollars that are being spent in the United States and are not being spent in Ontario.

So it would seem to me that some creative researchers could devise some method whereby they could actually sample people coming over, and as I say, if they did it properly, where they could assure them that they were not in any way trying to catch them or fine them or do anything else but just to get a realistic evaluation of: "How much did you spend and on what kind of objects? It's not taxable; we're not going to do anything about it other than just to try to get a handle on the issue."

It would seem to me, as I say, that there are companies that could creatively do that, because it seems that until we really know the size of the problem, we are not going to be able to come up with a solution.

If I could just go on to another area that follows on this, which deals with the size of the problem, have there been any studies by the Ministry of Revenue or any other ministries in the government to determine the impact of cross-border shopping as it applies to municipalities that are not normally considered border communities? The minister announced that she, in fact, lived in a border community. We discussed this the last time this committee met. It would seem to me that if you have Thunder Bay, which I think is about 200 miles away from the border, considering itself a border community and considering itself impacted by cross-border shopping, virtually every municipality within 100 or 200 miles of an American border-crossing point would have the same impact. Has there been any research to determine the size of that particular problem?

Mr Lawrie: Not as far as I know. There may have been by other ministries.

Going back to your original question, I understand that the Ernst and Young study that was done in Sault Ste Marie was on the basis of detailed surveys done, asking people what they purchased when they were away. My understanding is that one result of that study was that 36% of total dollars spent were spent on gasoline and 27% of total dollars spent were on groceries. There is one study, I do not know how extensive it was and how statistically reliable the results were in predicting overall patterns, but it has been tried and there have been estimates of who is spending what.

It is certainly clear, as I am sure you know, that driving to the United States for a weekend, particularly to take advantage of $100 exemption, is now not an uncommon thing as far away from the border as Whitby or Oshawa, whereas it used to be. There has been a tremendous rise in the number of Ontarians going across in the last few years.

Mr Kwinter: If I can just end by making two comments. One, the minister referred to the potential of an advertising campaign to educate Ontarians as to the economic effects of their shopping in the United States. I would suggest that could be a double-edged sword. By buying cheap goods in the United States and the benefits that are there, you are depriving Ontarians of a place to work, although I support it. You are also going to have the problem of bringing it to the attention of a lot of people who may not have been doing it, who may say: "This must be something that we should look at. I guess somehow or other we are not as bright as some of these other people. We should be going over to the United States and dealing with this."

The second comment is about the Sunday shopping. I think it is true that when you talk to the mayors they say that Sunday closing is not the reason people go across to the United States. But what I think is true is that up until recently, when Sunday shopping for the last nine months or so was wide open, people were going because of the economic benefits. I think there is no question that that is the driving force.

The fact that there is Sunday opening in Ontario or not is not going to deter those. But there are people who normally would be able to shop on Sunday. They would not go to the States, even when they could. But now that Sunday shopping is closed, they will go. So it will not impact on the people who are already going, and Sunday openings or closings are not going to change the number that is there. I have no proof of this, but it would seem to me that the people who were not going across to the United States, more of them will be tempted to go if they cannot shop on Sunday here and they can shop there.

Mr Stockwell: Other than some gut feeling, such as Sunday shopping has very little to do with the cross-border shopping, the GST and free trade that brought some kind of perception that shopping in the United States is better or cheaper or so on, you have very little data to offer us as far as lost revenues and rationale and reasoning. Would that be fair to say?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Yes, it is very hard to obtain data for lost revenues, because we are not at the border crossings right now. We do not know. Our tax bases are different from the federal government, so that makes it very hard to measure.

Mr Stockwell: You have very little hope in the very near future, other than this meeting with Mr Jelinek where you are taking a chip to negotiate with, that we will have any glimmer of hope in the future as far as marrying some goods with the federal government so that we can collect tax in that way.

1030

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: We are doing what we feel we can. We feel increasing the tax base would only drive our consumers more so over the border.

Mr Stockwell: Yes. I do not disagree with you.

Interjection: Do not drive them any further.

Mr Stockwell: No. The other question is, do you believe that your ministry has any role in resolving this problem and, if so, what?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Our ministry does have a role in resolving this problem. I think there are many ministries and many people in municipalities that have a role. Business has a role; we all have a role in resolving this problem.

Mr Stockwell: I am far more interested in your role and what you see it as.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Okay. I think we should educate the people on the retail sales tax, that it is something that people should be paying, because most people whom you talk to after they have gone through the border crossing feel that they have paid all the tax they have to pay. Many people are not aware that there is also a retail sales tax that they should be voluntarily paying. Maybe people do not realize, and that would be where the education comes through, why they have to pay this retail sales tax, where this goes to. The dollars go to our social system, our health system, our education system, municipalities receive grants. We need this tax base to stay in our province so that we can stay as a province and be able to build economically.

Mr Stockwell: Anything else? Because that is pretty hopeless. You can talk all you want and try to convince people to pay tax; they are going to say, "Buzz off, I already pay enough tax." If they can get away with it, they are going to get away with it.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: If it is done properly and effectively, and if there is more than just my ministry doing things to heighten people's awareness, I think it will have an affect.

Mr Stockwell: The other question is, if we want to get to the root of this problem and bring the proper mind to question what the heck your government is doing and I am not suggesting it is your problem or whose problem I do not know who is picking the ball up on this one for your government—I would really like to talk to that person. Who is it that we should be bringing in to ask very probing questions, exactly what is going on, how you are resolving the problem and trying to help these border towns resolve the issue? Clearly it is not you. Who is it that you think?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I have a role to play in this.

Mr Stockwell: I know, yours is in education.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: So do a lot of other ministers. But the real person you should be talking to, I really think, and I would feel you may have more of an impact on that person than I do, is Michael Wilson.

Mr Stockwell: He will not come, I am sure. He probably will not come. We have a lot of trouble getting him down here. We would probably have a very good deal of difficulty getting Mr Wilson down here.

Besides that, I know you suggest that and I keep hearing that, but there must be some role your provincial government could play. All I am asking you specifically is, what is it that I have to request to come to this meeting who can answer some questions? What are you doing?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: You have to ask all the ministers who are involved, border town community may be the mayors group. Those are all people who are involved. All levels of government are involved in this issue. It is an issue that the Ontario government is going to pick up and say, "We have this problem, we are responsible for this problem, and we can solve this problem," because we are not doing any of the above on our own; not one person in the government, not one ministry in this government.

Mr Sterling: I guess the only solid figure that we have in terms of the problem is the actual declared amounts that are being made. What are the declared amounts coming into Ontario in a year?

Mr Lawrie: Our system is not set up to analyse the source of retail sales tax paid voluntarily, but I think it is fair to say that we feel it is well under $1 million annually in terms of voluntary payments from people returning from cross-border shopping trips.

Mr Sterling: Okay. I wanted to ask that question, appreciate the answer, and that was later. My question was in terms of the people who do declare—and I think it is what Mr Kwinter has said, a minority of the number of people who do come across—how much is declared in a year across Ontario borders and at the airports under the federal government? Surely you have that figure.

Mr Lawrie: We would have to get that information from Canada Customs, but we will try and get it right away if you are interested.

Mr Sterling: You mentioned that there are differences on the tax base. I think you mentioned, Minister, that there were really only three differences, shoes or something under $30. What were the other ones?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Those were the only ones at I mentioned.

Mr Sterling: Children's clothing?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Children's clothing, books.

Mr Sterling: So relatively speaking, you know we are talking about a minority or a very small number of items that might have been brought across the border and declared. What I cannot understand for the life of me is that we have a serious problem here. I do not think there is one member of this committee who would think that if you were collecting retail sales tax at the border that would have a very sobering affect on people going across to the United States and shopping there. Quite frankly, I am amazed you do not have the basics to start from.

I am flabbergasted that you come into this committee and you do not know how much has been declared coming across into Ontario by the federal government, because my empirical analysis would be that I would say we collect a billion dollars from people voluntarily. There is so much being brought in; multiply that times the provincial sales tax and you have a rough figure, where your very low estimate would be. I am just absolutely astounded that we do not have even that kind of concern on the part of the Minister to provide this committee with anything that is of any value.

I hate to be so outspoken on that, but I would have thought that there would be—and I believe that the Ministry of Revenue, when it goes to collect the tax, figures out what are the possibilities of the revenue to the government, and then you calculate how much it is going to cost you to collect that. If there is not a good ratio there—in other words, if it costs you more to collect than what you are going to collect—then forget about collecting. It just does not make any sense to do that, but I thought that would have been the first step that you would have done.

You have to have some kind of estimate as to what you are losing. You know the low estimate I am talking about. Do you have any kind of estimate? Is it $1 million, is it $10 million or is it $30 million?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology did an estimate for eight border communities in Ontario and its estimate was $340 million to $360 million per year.

Mr Sterling: Okay. So let's take $340 million. If you offered to the private sector a contract to collect or put out a tender to the private sector to collect, do you think you could get a tender under $340 million? It astounds me to again hear your arguments and say that it is an impossibility to collect this $340 million.

Mr Hansen: You are talking 8% of $346 million.

Mr Sterling: Okay, so we are talking $26 million.

Mr Lawrie: No, the $340 million is total retail sales. Not all of it would be taxable. In fact, most of it would not be.

Mr Sterling: Okay, so you have no figure on what it is. Now, you say it would take five people at each border crossing. I find it hard to believe that in Prescott you are going to need five people. I know you have to cover all the shifts, etc. I do not know whether that is an average that you are using or whatever. There are how many, eight border crossings?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Fourteen.

1040

Mr Sterling: What kind of cost are we talking here? Have you done any cost analysis at all on what it would cost to collect it?

Mr Lawrie: I believe our rough estimate of total costs would be in the $10-million range. That is ignoring the provincial borders, the borders with Quebec and Manitoba; only road crossings and international airports and providing a 24-hour service.

Mr Sterling: What would it cost to do it with the federal government?

Mr Lawrie: It would depend on how much they wanted to charge.

Mr Sterling: Are you offering them money to collect the provincial sales tax?

Mr Lawrie: We would expect, from our experience in other taxes, that they would want to recover at least their costs, and of course we would want to pay at least that. It is a question of how you prorate those costs. If you are collecting with federal and provincial tax, then some of the costs should be prorated.

Mr Sterling: Oh, absolutely. If you go and talk to Otto Jelinek, I think you should be prepared to put some money on the table. We pay them for collecting income tax; I forget what it is, 1% or whatever it is of the tax collected. I do not see any reason why you cannot enter into a similar agreement on this end of it.

I just do not understand why you are not being more aggressive in trying to strike a deal with them, even if you can break even on what is happening here. Because it is obvious from the deputations that we heard in the pre-budgetary consultations that cross-border shopping is having a very, very significant impact on border communities, particularly for members down in this area.

I do not like putting taxes on shoes under $30 or on books or whatever, but it seems to me that those are pretty minor, insignificant changes to make, considering the overall effect of what is happening here in Ontario. Even if you have to alter your tax base on three items, it does not seem to me that is a significant situation.

I am also concerned about the fact that you are talking about a great deal of training required for the collection of tax. We ask our private sector, of course, to make changes in collecting tax at the drop of a hat. I do not quite understand the significant amounts of training involved in doing this task.

You can blame the feds, you can blame everybody else, but I am really upset that the provincial government is not aggressively going after finding the solution and putting some money on the table when it is talking with the feds, to say: "Look, we are going to benefit. Our revenues are going to be increased, our communities are going to be better off if in fact we collect provincial sales tax." By Jeez, it is about time the Minister of Revenue and this government did something about it, because they have, in my view, all the means to do it. Why do you not do something, Minister, that is aggressive?

Mr Williams: If I might say a few words on that, we are, of course, not the only province that is involved in the cross-border shopping issue. Some of the other provinces before us have in fact pursued it aggressively and the federal government has refused to negotiate any agreement to collect the tax at the border.

We suspect that unless they can get all provinces at the same time to join GST, then they will not go ahead with any agreement to collect tax for any one province, because if they collected it for one province, then that province would be at a disadvantage vis-à-vis any other province. If Ontario were having its tax collected at the border, then everybody would cross into Quebec and come back into Ontario that way, just to avoid paying the tax.

In addition, you ask about the exemptions. You said there were—

Mr Phillips: I will drive from Buffalo.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, and we are going to go through Manitoba, that is for sure.

Mr Williams: In the Brockville area, it would not be quite that far. But you mentioned the exemptions, of shoes of $30 and under and books, as being rather small. I think that you would find the issue of children's clothing much larger.

Mr Sterling: Maybe you have to train your people to make an exception under those circumstances. But notwithstanding that, which problem is bigger? I do not know. Maybe you do something in terms of giving people who have children some kind of rebate on their provincial income tax form to offset that if you want to continue to have it.

I say doing nothing is—you are just watching the retail trade go down the tubes in Ontario and you are continuing to fob it off on the federal government as though it is its problem.

Look, Quebec has said that it is in. If Ontario is into this thing, then it is done because you have probably 70% of the cross-border shopping done in those two provinces. I do not understand the reluctance of this government to be aggressive on the issue.

Mr Williams: The three provinces identified as being the highest cross-border-sales issues are British Columbia, Ontario and New Brunswick. Quebec is not a big issue, apparently.

Mr Sterling: What percentage are we?

Mr Williams: The studies do not indicate. There is only one border crossing in British Columbia.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I am curious, do you really think that if the retail sales tax was collected at the border, people would not cross-border shop in these towns?

Mr Sterling: I think it would have a very, very sobering effect on the practice. It depends on how stiff you make your collection procedures at the border, how many searches are done, all that kind of stuff.

Mr Hansen: I cannot understand why the federal government is allowing the amount of tax lost on gasoline, just the same thing as the provincial government is losing.

I have not got all the solutions to the problems. I have been thinking about this for quite a while. It has been an ongoing problem in our particular area for actually the past couple of years. If the feds do not want to collect at the border, it is too bad that we did not have an envelope when they went in declared on GST that we had a copy from the federal government of their payment of GST. We can turn around with just an envelope there that a person picks up to send the money in to Ontario. If the person fails to send it in, then we bill them for the service charge for the money that they owe. It is just an idea. I am not a professional finance person, but I am just coming up with a few ideas. Could you comment on that, or have you already looked at that already?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Yes. The federal government will not give us that information. We have already looked into that.

Mr Hansen: The other thing is—and Mr Kwinter was just sort of relating—we went through this discussion with other people and our own committee on the actual amount of money that is coming across the border. It is an area that we really do not know, because you can get four ladies in a car and each person, say, with $35 worth of groceries, and they fill the truck up. If there are four different families, they take a look at four different purchases. If you come across with your family, they look at it as a family purchase, or one, say $35. I am talking about street talk, what I hear about what goes on at the border. I am not very far.

The other thing that someone brought to my attention this last weekend is an ad that appeared in the Welland Port Colborne Evening Tribune on, I believe it was, Saturday. The ad in the paper stated—and I was talking to somebody on this and as I say, this is street talk; I have not investigated it at all—they are advertising pools in the United States, a 24-foot round for around $1700 delivered to your driveway in Ontario. In other words, it is going to be dropped off.

I understand—and this may be an area we have to investigate—that you purchase the pool in Buffalo, you pay for it in Buffalo, and it is going through a distributor here in Ontario which is the very same company, but actually you pay New York state tax because it is cheaper than paying Ontario sales tax. So I would like it if the retail sales tax branch would get back to us on exactly what is happening. I think we have to be a little bit of a detective, too, to find out where we are going wrong, not just saying "What can we do?" But I think, as Mr Sterling is saying, we have to get into the problem and see what we can do to solve it.

Mr Williams: The issue that you are raising is whether the vendor outside of Ontario makes delivery into Ontario of goods, and we would certainly obviously like to know who those people are. We would even more like to know who the customer was and therefore we could raise the assessment.

We have an agreement with each of the other provinces as the minister indicated earlier, where in fact we can get the information if it comes from Manitoba, if it comes from uebec, if it comes from Alberta, if it comes from Nova Scotia. It does not matter, we can get that information. So far, we have only been able to get an agreement of that nature with the state of Ohio. We have been actively pursuing it with the state of New York and the state of Michigan. Unfortunately, they have legislative problems in being able to provide that information or to give us such an agreement, so they would like to do it and they are working on it.

Under these agreements, they would list for us all sales which they made exempt of their own tax because the vendor delivered it outside of their own state. They would provide us with that information, they would provide us with the name of the customer, and we would simply ask if the customer has paid the tax, and if not, "Here is your bill."

Mr Phillips: I think the presentation kind of highlights the challenge we are going to have, and that is to get the data. My recollection of MITT was that it was going to give us in two or three months where the cross-border shoppers are coming from. I think they said that. That is the thing. All of us have opinions but nobody has facts, the opinion being that the cross-border cities or towns are moving closer and closer to Toronto or further and further from the border and past Toronto.

The second thing is I am trying to list the facts we are going to need in the end to deal with it. One is, where are they coming from? The second is, what is the magnitude of the problem? I think we have heard today you are not sure of it, no one seems to know.

The third thing I am learning here is that this is a bit of a tar baby and nobody wants to grab hold of it because the solutions are not obvious. So I realize it is convenient to say, "Well, go and see Mr Wilson," and then it is Mr Wilson who will say, "Well, you go somewhere else." We are going to have, I think, a challenge with this one because no one wants to get hold of it. I do not think that will be an acceptable answer for the people who are going to be impacted by it. They are going to want this Legislature to do something.

The other thing is, I think the study may in the end show that the prices, Canada versus US. When all is said and done, if in fact you can go over there and buy dramatically cheaper, legally, all the other stuff we try and do in the end may just be fooling people. That does not say there is not a bunch of things we have to do. I do think there is a bunch of things we have to do over the next two to three years, but if, when MITT's study or the federal government's study lists all these items for us—and as I say, if there is a dramatic difference legally, you can go and buy dramatically lower, we may be trying to push water uphill.

Having said all that, one thing that I believe mayors will be coming to us for is Sunday shopping, even though the minister says that is not an issue. I think the city of Windsor already has said it is an issue and has moved on. So I have two questions really; that will be one of them. The second one is, I think they will be asking for some differential in gasoline prices on taxes away from the border. In other words, the tax will be, whatever it is, 5 cents a litre at the border and 10 cents a litre in Hamilton and 15 cents a litre here, that sort of thing.

My questions to the minister: One is, apart from the opinion, do you have any evidence that would support your Sunday shopping belief that it really is not a particularly relevant issue in here? For example, what percentage of cross-border shopping is done on Sundays and what were the differences in cross-border shopping before and after the openings? Are you planning to track Windsor shopping before and after Sunday openings? Presumably, they have closed for a little while.

My second one is, have you plans to have a tax differential on petroleum products from the border or away from the border?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: This is a challenge. It is a challenge for all of us and it is something that I think everybody who has been affected by it wants to get a handle on, but the only way we can get a handle on it is if we all decide that we want to work to resolve it. The problem that everybody is facing is with the federal government and the value of our dollar. That is a real problem in getting them to deal with it and to learn what it is doing to each of the provinces and the communities and getting them to want to help us resolve it. It has to be something that is very serious and is a very key issue in resolving the problem. It is not that no one wants to resolve it—people do want to resolve it—but everybody has to be in on the game to resolve it. We cannot resolve it on our own without the assistance of the federal government. No one can resolve it.

Mr Phillips: Can I just comment on that, because we had the MITT and it said that the tariffs are, on average right now, 12%, I think it is. They are going to go down over the next eight years to zero. No one is predicting that the Canadian dollar is going to drop 12% versus the US dollar. So, if a lower Canadian dollar is your solution, you may be grabbing smoke there.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The other thing is, there were some studies done on Sunday shopping when the cross-border communities did have Sunday shopping. I know the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce did one. They see no difference in the shopping in the community on Sundays. People were still going to the US for the weekend, for a trip, to get away, and were doing their shopping in the US across the border. They were still not staying in the city to do their shopping. Fewer people were going out on Saturday and you had a few going out on Sunday, a Saturday decline in the workload in the stores in what they were bringing in. They were bringing in more on Sunday, but they did not see Sunday shopping, having the stores open on Sunday, bringing any more dollars into their stores.

So there were some studies done. Sunday shopping and cross-border shopping I think are two very separate issues. People are grabbing at straws to say, "Well, if you let our stores be open on Sunday, then we will not have cross-border shopping." You will have cross-border shopping because consumers feel it is cheaper to go across that border and pick up whatever it is they need and bring it back.

Mr Phillips: Do you have any evidence of that? That is all I am saying, because I think Windsor, just last night or a couple of nights ago, did not think it was grasping at straws;

it thought it was doing something significant. I gather St Catharines or Niagara Falls is going to deal with it tonight, not thinking it is grasping at straws. But do you have any empirical evidence that would help them or us determine what impact Sunday shopping has?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I know the chambers of commerce have done studies. I have talked with them. Sunday shopping was an issue. I know when the north-western Ontario chamber of commerce was here, it did not link Sunday shopping and cross-border shopping as the same issue. They said that it was totally separate, and doing one will not resolve the other. They were two separate issues that they were looking at and did not see them as affecting their economy in such a way that they would stimulate a lot of economic growth by being open on Sundays.

Mr Phillips: The gasoline tax?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The gasoline tax is under the jurisdiction of the Treasurer, as you are aware. If you put in the gasoline tax around border areas, you would have a domino effect within the province because, as you said, people from the middle of the province now are going out to cross-border shop. So I think that would be something that would have to be looked at very carefully.

Mr Phillips: Has anyone looked at it?

1100

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Yes, we have talked about it. But it is under the jurisdiction of the Treasurer, so he will be making the final decision in bringing it to cabinet. But it has been something that has been discussed.

Mr Phillips: Is the belief that it would positively help border communities?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: There is some talk that it may; there is some talk that it may not.

Mr Phillips: Well, that pretty well clears it up.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Yes. People go over to buy and they end up getting their gas there, but they probably end up getting other things while they are there.

Mr Phillips: That is the point the cross-border people make, that they go for gas, then they are getting other things that, if they did not go for gas, they would not get.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: It is something that we are discussing. I do not have a firm answer to give you on that right now.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to get the information. We are going to want recommendations, and if there is some evidence that would be helpful to the committee in terms of the impact of a gas differential—because I will repeat what I said earlier, I have a feeling that our solutions will have four or five things, none of which will solve it, but all of which will be mildly helpful. That is why I think Sunday shopping will not solve it, but it may be mildly helpful for a portion.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Okay. Do you have some stats?

Mr Lawrie: Yes. Obviously, the province of Quebec has a differential gas tax rate the closer you get to the border with Ontario, as well as the border with the United States. Our information from there indicates that it does not really achieve the intended objective, the reason being that there is a drop in retail gas prices initially, but very soon it disappears, within one to two years, because of marketing practices inside the trade. There is also massive evasion.

Mr Phillips: There is massive what?

Mr Lawrie: Evasion. There is a built-in reason to show that product is being sent to low-tax areas where in fact it is not. Also, there is a built-in incentive to actually move product that is sent to a low-tax area to a higher tax area to sell, and unless you put in a lot of compliance resources, auditors in other words, inspectors, to track the flow, the volume of product, then you are going to get massive evasion.

So the three things that I think have been experienced in Quebec are that it did not achieve its original policy intent; it was very much more expensive in terms of lost revenue than you would otherwise think—really, the evasion problem—also, if you want to have it monitored in any reasonable way at all, it is very expensive.

I have some figures for Ontario with respect to that because this is an issue that we have looked at. We have looked at it before, not only with regard to the US border but other specific areas within Ontario. Right now, 1990-91 fiscal year, our total expected revenue in gas tax is $1.1 billion. Our total cost of collection is $1.6 million, everything. So roughly speaking, it costs 0.1 cent for every $100 that we bring in. It is a very cheap tax to administer. I think it is our cheapest. The basic reason for that is that it is levied at the refinery wholesale level. There are only 4 collectors in the entire province. We do not need to track where gasoline goes, as long as this rate is the same in Ontario. All we need to track is gasoline coming into the province and gasoline going out of the province. So you do not need an army of auditors.

Basically, there are about 10,000 retailers of gasoline in Ontario. There are about 3,000 of those within 48 miles of the US border. The present rate is, I think, 11.3 cents a litre on unleaded. In other words, for each cent a litre, you bring in about $120 million a year, and there are 10,000 retailers. So for every thousand retailers, you bring in $120 million a year. So if you were to drop the tax by three cents, for example, for the 3,000 or so retailers close to the US border, it would cost you $108 million in revenue in the year initially. In order to prevent evasion and avoidance, mainly evasion, you would probably need to double the existing costs of administration because you would need to carry out audits, you would need to track product and you would also need to carry out audits at gas stations, reading of the meters, to make sure that the figures were not inflated and that you are not on a paper chase. So it is very expensive.

Mr Phillips: Yes. How much do you think we are losing right now to the US?

Mr Lawrie: We have not tried to estimate that. Perhaps they have in Treasury in terms of day trips and gasoline bought outside the province. I have not got the figures at my fingertips, sorry.

Mr Phillips: Presumably if we are losing in those areas 15% to the US, you could offset your 3 cents a litre very quickly.

Mr Lawrie: If the differential was enough. If you are looking at a differential gas tax rate, perhaps it should be participated in by other governments. Perhaps the federal government should participate in it. Surely an incentive is there for it too. At least that would be the policy rationale. Perhaps the municipalities that think it is a big problem might be able to share in it in some way and perhaps industry might be able to share in it in some way too. It is not a particular provincial tax problem. As a solution maybe it would work but it would need a lot of policing. It is obviously done in Quebec now. I cannot possibly say that it is not possible to have such a differential rate; it is possible. It is a question of how tight you want it to be.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to talk about this gasoline tax and the differential. I really think it is a mug's game. What they are really talking about is that the market would deal with it. If you are in Quebec and you are near the Ontario border, the gasoline wholesalers and retailers could adjust their price to take care of what they perceive to be the marketing differential, if they are losing market share. But for the government to get into it is just going to exacerbate a problem that in the years that I have been here I hear of constantly, and that is people in the north complaining that they are paying too much for their gas compared to people in the south, people in the east complaining that it is too much more than what they are paying in the west.

You would have a situation where, as I talked about earlier, people would be saying, "Well, I am in effect a border town." whether they were or they were not. And how do you define what is a border town? The other major issue is, even if you are, say, in Fort Erie or in Windsor, not everybody in Windsor who drives a car goes across to Detroit to buy his gas. But by reducing the price, you could get everybody who buys his gas at reduction and it could probably more than offset any of the advantages that you would get. As I say, it really is a mug's game to my mind. I would love to see someone come up with a scheme that he thinks would work.

I cannot see how it could possibly work, because the differential at the present time is too great. To bring it down to a level that was going to make a difference would give benefits to the general population in the area that could more than offset it, plus get pressure from the areas that are too far to be classified as a border town saying, "You are just exacerbating the situation," as it is now. The people in northern Ontario, it is going to be worse for them, so I do not see that as a solution.

I also want to talk about the Sunday shopping. I think there is a misunderstanding about the issue. I do not think anyone is suggesting that if you had open Sundays it could solve the cross-border shopping. I agree that they are not related in that way. The people who are going to the United States to shop are going on Sunday whether it is open or it is not. We have been discussing this issue in this committee before the Supreme Court came down with this ruling and we were concerned about cross-border shopping. So it was not that we were concerned that if Sunday was to be shut down it would be a problem. It was a problem then.

I think it is fairly logical that it is going to be exacerbated. It is going to get worse because people who were able to shop on a Sunday will not be able to. The only alternative, if they want to do Sunday shopping and they live in a border town, is to go across to the United States, where they might not go if they could do it. I do not think it is going to lessen it. It is just going to increase it. To my mind, I think that is a very obvious conclusion.

1110

The other comment I want to make is on the discussion about whether or not effectively implementing the 8% retail sales tax would really be worth while and generate any revenue of a meaningful kind, seeing how much of the goods which are brought across are sales-tax-free anyway, or exempt.

The concerns that I have are the concerns that Mr Hansen raised and some of the concerns that this committee has heard. It is not the normal, typical householder who goes across the border and buys her groceries and buys her milk and buys her gasoline and buys the odd little thing. The stories that we have heard are where people are going across with trucks and buying truckloads of siding, plywood and roofing materials and all of these things and bringing that back.

Without the economies of scale and without the distribution advantages and without all of the other things, that 8% in itself may be an incentive. The guy is having a large enough purchase and he feels that if he can go across to a US border community and save 8% on a $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 purchase, where he will pay the federal duty, pay the GST, but save 8%, that in itself might be enough incentive. I think that is something we should be looking at.

Mr Hansen: As Mr Kwinter just mentioned, we are talking about the simple things that are coming in. I have a local supply company in Beamsville and I met with the chamber. They were complaining about cement blocks coming over here to Canada, where just down the street there is a cement block plant. We are getting down, not just to the milk and the gasoline and those purchases of cigarettes etc, over there, but it is getting into some of our basic products that we produce in the Niagara Peninsula. So it is becoming quite competitive.

I think it would be very interesting on the day that Tony Commisso—he was one who I had said should appear before this committee—not asking as a committee, but as an individual knowing Tony and involved with this. He has been very aggressive as a businessman in the Niagara area with his ads. I think he had four litres of milk for $1.99. You are not going to get it cheaper across the border by the time you exchange it. So I can see a lot of aggressiveness by the retail trade in our particular area. But they still get stepped on because we have advertising coming in from the United States advertising these loss leaders to attract customers across there. Here we are, trying to get it to work in our area and being stepped on, especially when it is printed in the USA, delivered across the border and inserted in one of our local papers. Next week I think we will find out quite a bit.

The other thing is that I live in Ontario, but I always thought I lived in Canada too. I am not trying to knock the federal party on that point, but I think I am a Canadian. If we get into looking after Canada, looking after Ontario and BC and the rest of them to follow, if we are going to cut the price of gasoline on taxes at the border, then the feds should be matching what we do at the border. This is a problem for Canada. It is a problem for Ontario, and I think that we should be talking to Mr Wilson to say, "This is a problem for both levels of government, not just the provincial level." I do not think we have to support everything here in Ontario just from the provincial level. We should be coming together as Canadians to fight this problem.

Mr Stockwell: I think the last statement was very clear, it was very to the point. I agree with it. Somebody has to give up revenue somewhere. I am not going to suggest for a moment that the province is the only one that needs give up the revenue; the feds need to give up some revenue as well. I agree, we are gouging them; at the gas pumps we are gouging them. If we were in the private sector, you would be charged with gouging for the amount of money you are generating in revenue off some of these things: the sin tax, the gas tax and so on down the line.

Mr Kwinter: By the way, there is no such charge as gouging.

Mr Stockwell: Yes. There is no charge of gouging. What do they call it?

Mr Kwinter: In interest rates they call it usury.

Mr Stockwell: Usury, that is it. Okay, let's just leave it. I like "gouging" better, it is a better word. The difficulty is that somebody is going to have to give us some revenue. You can have all these tremendous plans, which is the $1,000 free credit in the shopping, and you can have revenue—different taxes at different points in the province, which is totally unfair in my opinion, and you can go through all this theory and you can get all the information you want. Frankly, I am shocked you do not have it. I thought you would have had it, but it really does not matter. Even if you did have it, so what? We would still be losing it. We would just know exactly how badly we are being burned. Maybe it is better we do not, sometimes.

The question is, though, that somebody has to give up some revenue and it is either the feds or the province. If you are going to become competitive again, as I said before, someone is going to have to come forward and cut a deal with the federal government to reduce the tax on some of these items that are crossing, because once you are even through all this, and Mr Kwinter made the point last meeting, once you are through all these little programs and adjustments and so on, if it is still significantly cheaper, they are going to cross the border. Case closed, done. They are going to cross the border. So I would ask this minister to go see the Treasurer and make this point very clear to him, if he is not prepared to reduce some of the taxes on the hooks—and I classify the hooks as gas and alcohol, cigarettes and so on. I think those are the hooks that people go over the border for and then they happen to finish their shopping, because there are significant changes. If it getting to the point where they are going over for cement blocks, then we have some really serious problems in the country—very, very serious problems—and this problem is going to be far bigger than any of us thought it would be.

So I would ask this minister and this ministry to go back and quantify the results of the amount of moneys we are losing. But you had better examine the fact that we are gouging them, and until you deal with the gouging that is taking place on taxes in this province, you are never going to resolve this issue. Frankly, it is a waste of our time to go around talking about this and talk about hokey smoke-and-mirror inducements and thoughts of resolving this issue when no one seems to want to look at the real issue, and that is the tax issue, how much people are paying on taxes in this country and how much they are not paying across the border. Unless you are going to make it illegal to cross the border and come back with products, they are going to continue to do it.

You can laugh all you want. If you want to go down and cross the border yourself and buy a product across the border—I know people who are going across the border and buying stereo systems, from Etobicoke, where I am from. They are driving all the way to Buffalo for an hour and a half or two hours and buying two or three stereo systems because they are going down together in a group and they are literally saving 50% or 60% of the cost of the stereo system. You cannot tell me that we are that uncompetitive because we are not as bright or we are not buying as well. There has to be something more to it and that includes the tax position. If you want to fob it off on the federal government, go right ahead. I think they are much to blame as you are, and the Liberals were, but it is not going to resolve the problem.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I would say to the members, if we were to cut all these taxes, which services were you planning to cut?

Mr Stockwell: I have a list this long.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I am very sure that you are aware of the differences between Canada and the US in our health system, in our social system, in our education system—

Mr Stockwell: I am very aware of it. I have a list this long, if you want it.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: —and our workforce differences that we have between the countries which explain a lot of the differences in the past.

Mr Stockwell: I totally understood it, but if you are not competitive, it is not going to be different for very long.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The other things that you mentioned here for solving the problem, you talked about harmonizing with the GST, increasing the tax burden so that our people are paying more tax and the larger tax bureaucracy, all three of which were different from what you were campaigning on in the election, so I would really like to get it clear where you stand. You do not even start with your own federal party.

Mr Stockwell: No, that is true. I made that very clear 00.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I think you have to go back and do some insight into your thoughts and what you are talking about. The differences between Canada and the USA are very phenomenal. The differences between Ontario and the USA are very phenomenal, and what they have and what we have. There are many reasons why people go cross-border shopping. People have to understand, and people in Ontario, people in Canada, do not mind paying tax. It is when they pay tax and they do not know what they are getting for the taxes they are paying that they start to mind. I do not hear people in Ontario saying: "We don't want a health care system. We don't want an educational system. We don't want some of these social programs."

Mr Stockwell: You might be right.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: In that case, they do not mind paying the tax as long as we are able to tell them where their tax dollars are going. So I think that explains a lot of the differences between the two territories when you are talking about why people are going shopping and why they are buying in the USA.

The Chair: Okay, I get the last word in this, if there are no other questions. There is a way that we might be able to get a handle on the amount of money that is being lost in cross-border shopping and it is not by looking at taxes or looking at the amount of money or the number of people who go back and forth. We may want to get some very clear indications of the source, the origins, of the current account deficit, how much Canadian money is being exchanged into Canada from various locales near the border, Buffalo, Lewiston and so on, so that we know how much Canadian money is actually being spent across the border.

The second source of information that we may be able to correlate is to get an indication of how much American money is being exchanged in the peninsula area.

Mr Hansen: We know that.

The Chair: That will give us an idea of how much is then going to be spent across the border. If we looked at that in a year block, we may come up with a fairly close absolute dollar figure in the amount of money that is being spent.

Mr Hansen: I might just add, I have not got it in front of me, but in Port Colborne alone at one bank there is US$150,000 a week exchanged, and you know the size of Port Colborne. That is not counting credit cards and other means.

The Chair: So it may be more useful to take a look at the other end of the dollar and see where the dollars are going, and how much.

If there are no other questions or comments, then I would thank the minister and her staff for coming, and if we have other further questions we will send them along.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Thank you.

The Chair: Is there any other committee business? Okay, seeing no further committee business, this committee is adjourned until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1124.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1536.

The Chair: There is a quorum here, we have a member from every party, so I think we should begin this afternoon's hearings with Mr Winter of John Winter Associates Ltd, if you would like to begin, please.

JOHN WINTER ASSOCIATES LTD

Mr Winter: Good afternoon. My name is John Winter and I run a small consulting company. In the past couple of years we have been commissioned by a number of municipalities to look at this cross-border shopping issue, and so we have assembled, especially over the last year, a considerable amount of data about it. I have summarized it in a small handout that I brought with me today. I would just like to hit some of the highlights of the cross-border shopping data that we have and draw some issues and conclusions from them.

The topics that I would just like to run over briefly are the consumption patterns, what patterns you find shopping from the border; why have we had such a very rapid, catastrophic, as it were, increase in border shopping over the last few months and why is it increasing exponentially; a few comments on why we cannot here in Ontario apparently sell for less than they are doing in the United States; look at one or two economic consequences of cross-border shopping, and conclude with a few issues and some suggestions from my perspective that I have on this issue.

On page 2, I have a typical distance decay factor. Border shopping changes as you get away from the border. There is the convenience zone where it is a way of life. People do it because that is the way it has always been done in the border communities. The farther you get away, the less propensity there is for people to travel for gasoline or for beer or for everyday groceries and the greater propensity to shop for things like clothing and other larger-ticket items.

One of the discouraging things we have seen in the last year has been people willing to travel from major cities like Toronto down to Detroit, picking up very low-cost electronics, for instance, and then shipping them back to Toronto and being able to do it at a price that is a fraction of what we can actually buy them for in the stores here.

Then a year ago I defined a zone that was about 90 minutes away, which was protected by distance. It was what I called the zone of happy retailers. Unfortunately, the way things have gone in the last year, there are very few of our cities in Ontario that are actually protected now by distance. People are willing to travel farther to go after these bargains, and that is part of the problem. Indeed, I summarize that at the bottom of page 3. The trend that we have seen in the last year, notably in the last six months, is that people are willing to spend more when they go across and they are also willing to travel farther, and that has changed the problem.

We know how people are spending their money at 15 minutes from the border, half an hour, one hour, an hour and a half, and because we know how many people there are in those zones, we can multiply through and get a reasonable estimate of how much money is leaking out of this province, escaping our retailers.

I did the projection six months ago. Today it is already out of date because of the changes that we have been seeing, the rapidity of these changes. And if we do not act as a province, I anticipate that we will be losing another about $1 billion out of this province this year in retail sales in all types of retailing, including restaurant meals. That need not happen of course if some policies are implemented, but it is not going to be easy, because there is no one simple explanation of why this is happening, there is no one force behind it, and if that is so, then there is no simple solution to solve it.

Let us look at a border community where I have the latest data, and it is on page 4. I try to address the question of why a very rapid recent increase in cross-border shopping. It comes from Fort Frances, an isolated community towards the northwest of Ontario, and it has a sister city across the border, one minute away, International Falls. They are both isolated by distance. The difference in price on one side of the border is incredible compared to the other side of the border.

The middle picture on page 4 shows the average national commercial—that is, residential, normal population—retail price collection that was actually declared at the border. That does not include smuggling, of course. You can see it has gone up rapidly and it has gone up exponentially.

Now, there are a number of reasons why this may have occurred, but there is no clear relationship.

First, some people declare that it is due to free trade. Well, if you have a look at the shape of that increase, when free trade began, we did not see a sudden increase in cross-border shopping; it took time. Indeed, one of the factors coming out of some of our surveys is that people were expecting lower prices. So we had a very divisive federal election on free trade and they were expecting lower prices in the stores. Those lower prices may come in 10 years' time, but they were expecting them now and they are taking them now. They are taking them across the border. They appear to have been somewhat disappointed that they did not see these price reductions. One of the great accomplishments of the free trade agreement to date may have been the fact that the guilt has been removed from the cross-border shopping issue. "Hey, we've got free trade. Why can't we just go across there and buy?" Indeed, where are our economic nationalists at the moment, who really need them in this province?

Another reason that is put forward is the appreciation of the Canadian dollar. At the bottom of page 4 you can see the pattern. It has increased in value over that period but again there has been a lag effect. It has not suddenly caused a great increase in shopping.

One of the factors is that the appreciation of the dollar has given a sort of discount coupon to everybody who goes across; they get a discount. The higher the value of the dollar, the less it is going to cost across the border. One of the discouraging things from the surveys is that when you get an 87-cent, 86-cent dollar, people are doing much fewer calculations than they did when they had a 75-cent dollar. They did all the calculations in their head. They seem to be perceiving an 87-cent dollar as much closer to parity than with the 75-cent dollar that we had very recently.

Another reason that is put forward of course is the recession. As we have sunk into recession, and there are some of these border communities that have been very hard hit with the loss of jobs, it is only natural that people start thinking about the price that they are paying in the stores. There are massive structural changes going on in our economy at the moment, and there is a great deal of anxiety out there. Indeed, there is a great deal of anxiety with the retailers. We never hear about the anxiety of the retailers. We hear about consumer anxiety, but, my goodness, those retailers in these border communities are really hurting. So this recession has spurred the trend to the lower prices.

And of course people feel foolish. Nobody likes to pay more than he really should for a commodity. You talk to your friends and they say, "Oh, I bought that for half the price." You feel like a real dummy and nobody likes feeling like a dummy, especially for things that are essential for your way of life.

There are three additional forces which I highlight on page 6: first, the goods and services tax imposition. We have already seen there has been a jump of about 15% nationally at the border crossings in January. When we asked the question, "Will the GST encourage you to do more shopping in the United States?" we got a considerable number of people who said yes, it would. So there has been in the first month and the second month of this year an absolute disaster in retail sales, and one of the reasons why, I think, is that more consumers are going across the border. The GST had a really negative effect on border communities.

I would like to bring your attention to the fact that when we last looked at the Sunday shopping issue on a very comprehensive basis, in the Ontario Law Reform Commission report in 1970, the New York stores were not open because of the blue laws. They are open on Sundays now. I show in my documentation on page 5, in the middle diagram, that the major new regional mall out in Cheektowaga, Walden Galleria, advertises in our markets: "Hey, you guys are closed. Come over and shop with us," and there are some new attractions going into the Buffalo area. One of the most attractive stores in the Windsor area, the Pace Warehouse, is coming into the Niagara area. Wal-Mart, which is the most aggressive retailer in the United States, is also arriving, and there are plans for a casino in Cheektowaga that will again attract some of our consumers away. One of the attractions of going from Thunder Bay to Duluth is that the Indians run a gambling casino right across from the major malls, so there are a number of other things pulling people across, and it looks as if the attraction of the Buffalo area, which has absolutely nothing but some lumped merchandise and good chicken wings, is going to be increasing.

I think there is a very important question that we have to ask in all this: Why cannot Ontario sell for less? There are a number of points that I would like to bring up about this whole matter. First is the gasoline issue. Of course, as you know, it is provincial taxes. Second, there is the whole marketing board issue. It is quite remarkable if you compare and contrast prices on both sides of the border. In Canada you can get this little turkey. Let's say you are a family and you want to put some food on the table, have a great Thanksgiving dinner. You can have a little turkey or you can go to the United States and get a humongous turkey and it is the same price, and people being who they are, they would like to be good providers at Thanksgiving and at other times. Those issues are already well known.

I would like to focus on a few costs of doing business, because those too are important. First, it has to be pointed out that the Niagara area closest to us is one of the great dumping zones in North America. If you are a manufacturer, if you are a retailer, you are not going to dump in New York City or in Los Angeles or near Chicago; you are going to get rid of that merchandise, if you have to get rid of it, if you have seconds and ends of lines and things, in border communities like Niagara Falls. So this is one of the great dumping zones in North America. A lot of our consumers, of course, are attracted over for the prices of the seconds.

Rents, for instance, are much lower in the United States. They do not have an Ontario Municipal Board to restrain the enthusiasm of developers. In Fort Frances-International Falls, for instance, about a third of International Falls is currently vacant, and of course you know what that would do to rents. Indeed if you were to set up a retail store in Fort Frances, you would probably be paying 50% more than your competitor across the border before you even open the door.

1550

One of the interesting points, I think, is on page 9, municipal taxes, because our municipal taxes are considerably higher than those in the United States. I have a comparison of what supermarkets pay in International Falls and Fort Frances. You can see the tax burden is certainly onerous on Safeway compared to its competitors. No wonder its competitors can their ketchup for somewhat less than Safeway.

When you have a look at the net municipal operating costs, a resident in Fort Frances of course pays considerably more than in International Falls, but what is never pointed out in some of the commentaries is that our residents get considerably better services than in the United States. If you have a look at Fort Frances and International Falls, we have a professional fire force; they have a volunteer fire force, with all the attendant costs that raises. We have a larger police force. Although they have a much smaller one, they have more cruisers, typically, being American. You have a look at the roads, you have a look at the street lamps, and the standard of municipal services is much higher. But then of course the taxes are much higher, and those taxes somehow ultimately get on to the cost of doing business.

I think the point at the very bottom of 9 is extraordinarily important. We have great strengths as a province, but those strengths are not exportable. We have higher municipal standards, we have health insurance. Why are OHIP cards bootlegged in US border cities? Because they want to come over and get some free OHIP services. So our strengths are not exportable; their strengths are exportable. They have lower costs and they can export their ketchup and their goods, and our consumers take advantage of this.

In tough times, when you are worried about your job, you want to feed your family, it looks very attractive to go over and getting those humongous turkeys rather than a tiny one at the Safeway store, and we tend to forget how good our police force is or our fire force or our drains at times like that.

There are a number of other reasons. We have higher taxes, we have higher regulations, indeed at times we have higher labour rates. With all those higher costs, if you look at the middle diagram on page 10, it is not really surprising that there is not just a small gap but an enormous gap between a basket of goods sold in International Falls and a basket of goods sold in northwestern Ontario.

One of the things that I want to draw your attention to is that the costs of goods in Canada appear to be much higher in many cases than they should be or they might be. Quite often we are finding the wholesale price in Canada is much higher than the retail price in the United States. This is a phenomenon; I do not totally understand it myself. I do not understand why, for a vast range of products, we cannot buy even close to what the United States retailers can buy for.

If you think of retailing, the major cost is your inventory cost. It may be two thirds, it may be four fifths of your total operating costs. If your retailer starts out paying double what a comparable United States retailer will pay, it is obvious that the guy is not going to be able to shave anything off the prices, and so your prices are going to be higher and his are lower. I give some examples of televisions, watches. I give another example in the footnote here of Pepsi, comparing International Falls and Fort Frances. A case of Pepsi costs $6 to $7 in the United States. In Fort Frances the normal retail price is $17. What is this? Consumers say to this, "Hey, we're being ripped off," so they go across the border and they buy their Pepsi across the border.

There is a small Xerox here from the Fort Frances Times of 20 March. We have an enterprising retailer in Emo, which is just to the west of Fort Frances. He goes across the border, buys the Pepsi at a normal retail price and tries to put it on sale in Canada, but of course he cannot do that because he does not have any French labelling on the cans. The Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs comes along and tells him that he cannot sell it any more. So he goes back to selling the pop at the inflated prices.

Now, what does the consumer see? The consumer sees outrageous prices for Pepsi in the store, but it is not the retailer. One of the things I want to get through in this presentation is that it really is not the retailer taking the abnormal profits here. The retailer is paying, off the truck, about $16 for a case of Pepsi. He puts it on sale for $17 and, my goodness—oh, I thought you had a question.

Mr Jamison: I will wait till you are finished.

Mr Winter: Oh, thank you. So again, the consumer says: "Ah-ha. We're being ripped off by the Canadian retailer," so he goes across the border to shop. But it is not the retailer in the vast majority of cases doing these inflated markups. It is somewhere back in the system. I do not understand totally how back in the system this is working but time after time, for necessities as well as for more luxurious goods, we are paying more than the United States. Indeed, it is not just fractionally more. On page 11 I have a price comparison of some 250 brand names compared to Fort Frances and International Falls, and you can see that there are enormous differences in price. We have talked a lot about unleaded gasoline, but look at the difference in price of Pepsi and other commodities.

So these consumers who are going across the border are certainly not wrong. There is a major difference in price.

Mr Phillips: I am sorry. How do you read this again?

Mr Winter: The one on page 11?

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mr Winter: We were comparing Fort Frances prices and International Falls prices, the per cent difference in price, and International Falls usually, when the line is above zero, that indicates the per cent of Fort Frances prices that are higher than International Falls. So unleaded gasoline may be 60% higher, Pepsi may be 150% higher. Those are just a few brand name commodities we were able to find in Fort Frances that were somewhat not affordable across the border.

Mr Phillips: I see. So that 250 is along the bottom.

Mr Winters: The 250, yes. They have been ranked from the lowest to the highest, so it is indicating that it is just a nickel-and-dime issue here. There are enormous differences in prices, and this is what is attracting the consumer.

Mr Phillips: It looks, on average, of those 250, there would be an average 50% higher.

Mr Winter: Oh, at least, and you would need a massive change in the Canadian dollar if you were going to try to wipe that difference out just by the dollar. It is not just a little change that is needed; it is an enormous one. And we can only see one hopeful sign in all this.

Mr Phillips: Where is it?

Mr Winters: You never hear a comparison between Eaton's prices and, let's say, a comparable store to Eaton's like Hudson's in Detroit. You always hear the comparison between Eaton's or a full-line retailer and a super market counter or a warehouse store. Finally, in the Toronto area we are getting the warehouse outlets. I believe there are a lot of outlets of Price Club here already. Cosco from the west coast is coming in. In those warehouse clubs, we are starting to get prices that are comparable to those in the warehouse clubs in the United States, and I have a comparison, for instance, on page 12. At an Ontario supermarket for Heinz ketchup, you might get seven fluid ounces for one Canadian dollar, whereas if you went across the border to a normal supermarket you might get 13 ounces, almost double the volume. But if you went to a warehouse club and bought your Heinz, then you would get almost three times the volume for the same dollar. We are starting to get this in Ontario, but we are 10 years behind the United States almost, in the warehouse sector.

Now, my question is, by the time we catch up, are we still going to have a reasonable retailing sector left in the border communities? Unfortunately, these price clubs, these warehouse clubs, are not going to do anything for northern Ontario, because they need a certain threshold of consumers to support them.

Economic consequences of cross-border shopping involve a loss of sales taxes, loss of jobs, and then jobs of retail spiral backwards throughout the economy, so you see something at wholesaling or in farming or in manufacturing elsewhere in the province, so it is a vicious circle. At the retail store, once you see your consumers dropping off, you cannot afford to have the same amount of inventory. Your attractiveness falls and that too goes into a vicious spiral and you lose more sales. So the implication of this exponential increase is that we are going to lose more retailers in border communities, and if you talk to the mayors—let's say Bill Smeaton of Niagara Falls, the man is going out of his mind. There are terrible economic conditions down there at the moment, and you can understand why, because in a recession you want to get the absolute best value. I say, do not shoot the retailer in all this. It is not his fault, largely. It is the inefficient economic distribution supply system behind the retailer that is causing many of our problems.

You see, it is poised to get much worse. On page 13 on my second diagram, the leakage out of the Toronto market is about $200 million a year, but that survey was done three months ago, four months ago, so it is probably quite considerably out of date. All you need are two people to shop every quarter, and bang goes half a billion out of our retail system, to the detriment of Ontario retailers.

That summarizes my review of the data that we have at hand and the trends and some of the information that comes from these trends. Todd asked me to run through a few issues, as I see them, so I would just like to highlight a few of those issues.

There is no panacea for these problems. There is no quick fix. It is not going to get better soon and it is not going to be easy to stop the flood. Everything seems to be going in the favour of the US retailer and there are many barriers with the Canadian retailer. Of course, as you go down Interstate 75 out of Windsor, down to the suburban shopping centres, you do not see some of the problems in the black ghettos of Detroit, where without a government insurance plan they have an infant mortality rate that is as high as Haiti's. So you could argue that they should have higher prices, but they do not. It seems to me that the Ontario retailer and the Ontario government is getting the worst of both worlds. You can escape these higher prices in Ontario very easily.

I do not think, for the second point, that time is on our side, because in these things the pendulum swings one way and it swings the other way, but at this very moment it has gone viciously against the Ontario consumer and the Ontario retailer. I think it is going to take time, and what level of damage to our communities of Windsor and Niagara Falls and Chatham is acceptable? Are we going to say, well, 20% vacancy in our stores is acceptable? Is it 30%, 40% vacancy? What level of vacancy for the small Ontario retailer, who is the backbone of Ontario communities? What level of damage is going to be acceptable if we let some of these trends continue?

I think there is no alternative but to clamp down at the border more than we have been doing. I think it is ridiculous to speed up Canadian consumers so that they can buy more easily in the United States. I think the border communities are a very strange amalgam because they have economic and social links both sides of the border, but I think that for the remainder of our major markets, London and Toronto and other markets, we have to protect those retailers, and also move towards lower prices in our stores. One of the big issues in my mind is, why are suppliers charging more to Canadian retailers than to United States retailers? Why does MacMillan Bloedel charge considerably more for wood in Thunder Bay than when it sells to Menards in Duluth. Indeed, you are getting remarkable movements of the lumber up there, and sometimes the lumber does not even go out of Ontario but gets sold at US prices to special people.

I think it is remarkable that retailing has become such an international service. But those retailers in Buffalo and near Chatham and in Duluth really are not serving our communities well. We too often see retailers taking money into their tills, but Ontario retailers give a lot back to the community in many ways, if only just in subsidizing the little leaguers and sending the hockey teams out and all the rest of it. You do not get anything back from those New York retailers. They have other agendas.

I think also there is an issue for the retailers both in Ottawa and closer to the Manitoba border, because you are getting a lot of flow out into Quebec and/or into Manitoba because you can beat the provincial sales taxes by buying in another province and then getting a rebate of taxes back. I would suggest that you also, in this whole issue, look at that phenomenon.

Todd also asked me for some ideas towards an amelioration of this issue, and I think it goes without saying that you cannot do anything alone as a province. It is going to need some type of co-operation with the federal government. I think that one of the great things that would stop the daily or frequent shopping trips across the border for milk and cigarettes and just to fill up your car would be a levy on the passenger cars at the border. It seems to me that you pay a levy if you go by plane. It seems to me that if you are driving a commercial truck you have to pay a levy, and I do not see why the consumers and their cars should not have to pay for the service of going through customs. Indeed, that would help to cut down the frequent trips from the border communities. That would be one of the great things that could be done.

I also think there should be some co-operation with the federal government so that they impose provincial sales taxes. I do not see why this province should lose the sales tax potential at the border, if only because it is bound to come back on to me as a consumer somewhere else. If you do not get it at the border, if it is going off to New York state, then you will put provincial taxes up somewhere else. It would be very easy for the federal government, as it does its little calculations—"Oh, that is 10% duty, and we are going to add the 7% GST"—just to add another factor of 8% on to the bill and remit that to the Ontario government, because that too would help slightly to balance the equation.

I think there needs to be better vigilance at the border and I think that one of the key things is that retailers in this province have to be able to buy at more competitive rates. I am not sure what that is going to take, but I cannot understand why consumer good necessities cost so much more here in Ontario than they do in the United States.

Mr Kwinter: I have some questions and some comments. First of all, I want to thank you, John. It is kind of nice to see some of the figures. I cannot attest to how accurate they are, and I am not questioning whether they are accurate because I am just taking your word for it. You have done some work, and someone may come up and say these are not the right figures, or another figure, but at least—

Mr Winter: They are probably higher today.

Mr Kwinter: Yes. Well, what I am saying, at least there are figures and at least there are some of the things that we have been concerned about that have been addressed. For example, what is a protected distance? I am pleased to see that effectively there is no such thing any more in Ontario. Given the differences, 90 minutes from the border is just as attractive as 15 minutes, not on a daily basis but certainly on a weekly basis.

Mr Winter: Or on a frequent basis, yes. There are very few locations that are really protected any more in Ontario. Perhaps Peterborough might be one of the last ones. If you think of Canada, there are very few cities, Chicoutimi, there is Newfoundland, of course, and there is Edmonton, and I cannot think of many others that are protected by distance. Our perception of distance has changed quite radically, I think, in the last year.

Mr Kwinter: I think there is another point that you brought home that I had not really focused on, and that is that we seem to think about cross-border shopping as just going to the United States. That is where the greatest benefits are, but there are certainly whole areas of Ontario where cross-border shopping is a way of life into other provinces.

I have travelled extensively into Kenora, Thunder Bay, Rainy River, Fort Frances, and I was stunned the very first time I went there that their total orientation is to Winnipeg. When they said, "We're going to the city," I just assumed they were going to Toronto, given the fact that I am a Torontonians. I figured that if they said they were going to the city, that is where they were going. They said: "Toronto, are you kidding? No, we're going to Winnipeg."

The daily paper is the Winnipeg Free Press. You cannot get the CBC, even before it shut down the stations. In Rainy River the only Canadian channel you get is channel 11, for some reason, Hamilton. I could never figure out why, but whenever I go up there and turn on the TV set, it is all American or Manitoba, with the exception of channel 11. Even before the GST and the escalation of the Canadian dollar, because of the sales tax and because of the proximity, people were going to Winnipeg to get their things.

As a matter of fact, we had a situation in Ontario where a few years ago we had an ice floe wipe out the community which is now called Peawanuck up on Hudson Bay wiped out the whole community, which was only houses, and they were replaced by a Winnipeg company because it was much closer than any Ontario company get there. So those are some of the problems.

The other thing that concerns me, and I do not know how you tackle it, is that when you talk about the strength that we have in Canada or Ontario not being exportable whereas the strengths that the Americans have are their weaknesses are not, that is precisely why we have this problem. You hear the old cliché, "It's a nice place to visit but I wouldn't want to live there," and that is what is happening. People are paying their taxes in Ontario and getting the quality of life that they want, but they are trying to then sort of offset that by buying cheaper things in the United States, which means that where they live they pay their taxes, but they want to minimize the impact of that then going to the United States, taking advantage of cheaper products so that the impact is not as great. I do not know how you deal with that. Do you have any ideas?

Mr Winter: I think you have to emphasize that quality of life is partially dependent on the price of the goods. When we are paying Ontario taxes, we are paying GST. That is 15% there that is helping to pay for the social services that we all like, and that is part of living here in Canada. I obviously you can escape it, individually you can escape it. You do not have that collective attitude, "Well, we must spend our money here." It is wonderful when you do the surveys and you start talking to perhaps 5% of the people who say: "Oh no, I would never go across there. I live here in Ontario. I must spend my money here."

Mr Kwinter: As a researcher, as a sampler of public opinion, do you really believe that is saleable? It would seem to me that if you did a survey and asked people "Why do you go to the United States?" their answer would be virtually unanimous. The other things are fringe. They would say, "Because I can save money."

Mr Winter: That is right, and that is why I believe we have to clamp down as much as we can at the border because it is going to get worse. Why should we pay three times the price for Oshkosh children's clothing? Indeed, why are we paying three times the price for Oshkosh children's clothing?

Mr Kwinter: Can I ask you another question, because that concerns me. The one solution that you see is the proliferation of Price Clubs and Cosco as being a possible solution in the more populated areas, but not in the north because it does not warrant it.

Mr Winter: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: Okay. I just wanted to make sure that my premise is right. I see that as trading one devil for another. I will give you an example.

I have a place in Florida. When I was down there for Christmas a company—it is not like a Price Club or Cosco. It is supposedly a drug store, but it sells everything om chicken soup to furniture. It is called Phar-Mor. They ive stores that are 100,000 square feet in size and, to scribe it only one way, they are mind-boggling when ou walk into them. When they announced they were constructing one in the neighbourhood I live in, the local merchants got a petition to try to stop them. They said: "There es our business. If Phar-Mor locates, we're done."

I think one of the problems we have is that if you feel e only solution is to have the Price Clubs and the Coscos, en what you may really be doing is shifting some of the usiness away from the United States to these American ores that are now located in Ontario or anywhere else in anada, but you are not in any way addressing, and probably mpounding, the problems of the small retailer. Those ho have a conscience or whoever you have been able to ll this story, "Hey, every time you go to the United States ou're doing your neighbour out of a job or you're doing yourself out the quality of life," will now be able to do the me thing in their backyards or in their neighbourhoods to e detriment of the small, independent store. How do you eal with that?

Mr Winter: I believe you are quite right. Probably a umber of the very small, independent retailers' days are umbered. We have far fewer today than we had 30 years go when I came to Canada.

Second, I think the solution for northern Ontario is to ource out of neighbouring states and not out of Toronto, ecause the cost of actually bringing or hauling merchandise to Toronto and then shipping it up by CN to Thunder Bay points north of that is so enormous that people should e able to reorient their buying patterns and buy out of linneapolis or Duluth or other US cities. But that pattern f trade has not established itself yet. When you talk to the mall retailers, one of the problems is that if they are not in buying group, they cannot buy in sufficient volume from ie US wholesalers and warehouses to make it worth their hile to put French labels on and get the CSA approval and l the rest of that stuff to bring it into northern Ontario. So it l gets funnelled down here through Toronto and then way p there, with all the attendant costs that are associated ith that.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to ask you a couple of uestions. First of all, I thought your presentation was very ood and very thorough in outlining the issues we have to y to deal with. You mentioned the recession and spoke out older consumers and unemployed Ontarians being onsiderably more attentive to prices paid in the stores.
ne of the surveys we had indicated, though, that the igher the income you had, the more likely you were to be ross-border shopping. I am just wondering if you can concile that with your statement here.

Mr Winter: Yes. If you are from the Toronto area, ou are probably more likely to travel and pay the gasoline nd make those big purchases all at the same time. When I as writing that, I guess I was thinking about the union uys in Fort Frances who have been laid off whom I have lked to, and people in Welland, the economy of which as just been devastated. Those people are concerned out the price of necessities. There was a bank manager I talked to in St Catharines. A couple of years ago he used to change $10,000 of US currency a month and he is now up over $250,000. So what are the people doing? They are going and they are taking their paycheques, cashing them, getting US dollars and off they go to buy their basic necessities of life because they cannot get those types of prices in Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: Do we have a sense then that it is not only the people who are laid off? It may be some of those people who are working in some of the vulnerable areas right now, manufacturing, who are still employed but are still concerned. So they are also going across the border, even though they are still employed.

Mr Winter: I think there is a deep-seated anxiety at the moment about where our economy is going. That is very prevalent in some of these border communities that have been hit, Windsor for instance, with a loss of jobs and things like that.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Kwinter mentioned the advertising campaign. I was wondering if you could comment on how effective—I mean, all of us being politicians and watching some of this stuff and realizing what goes on in elections and seeing what went on in—you know, when you watch some of the commercials for American elections how hard-hitting they are. I am wondering, with that type of ad campaign, whether you think that will have any impact.

Mr Winter: Well, no, because consumers are not stupid.
They are not dumb, they know that prices are considerably lower there, so what are you going to say, "Shop here, please"? They will just continue shopping over there. I think you have to put some barriers in their way. I think you have to put the provincial taxes on as they come back over the border. Perhaps that will slow up everybody at the border another 15 minutes. That would be good too. Until we can change the retail system here in the province, it is going to take time. I do not think you have the time. We have talked to the small retailers in the border communities and they are weeks, if not days, away from bankruptcy. So what do you do?

Mr Sutherland: I know you have made some comments about the Sunday shopping issue and how it affects border communities. This may be outside your parameters;
it may be the sociologists who need to comment on this.
But I find it intriguing, in a lot of the surveys about Sunday shopping, about shopping being a family activity. I worked in a grocery store for seven years and packed many peoples' groceries, a regular occasion, and I want to tell you, I was never left with the impression that it was a great family activity to go shopping.

Mr Kwinter: Not to a grocery store, but to a mall it is.

1620

Mr Sutherland: I guess my comment is, if that is the extent of what we consider a great family activity in this day and age, then I think we have some larger-scale problems as well.

Mr Winter: First, I do not want any one-upmanship here, but I worked 10 years in my uncle's grocery store and put myself through college doing that. I will agree with you, for the food, the drop-in convenience items, men do that more frequently than ladies.

Second, I have a bias here because I am the vice-chairman of my local business improvement area in the Beach. It is very serious down on the Beach if we are closed on Sundays because a quarter of our sales are done on Sundays, so I have a bias towards that. Third, I have seen the surveys that have been done relatively recently by International Council of Shopping Centers, ICSC, the shopping centre people in New York, and it does appear that people shop together. It is something you do in the big malls with family and friends.

Mr Sutherland: The other issue you talked about, the Price Club and Cosco, I think four to five years ago we also had some Price Clubs. I believe Titan was one of them. That was around. They came on to the market but seemed to disappear very quickly. I do not know whether you are familiar with them and what happened to them, whether it was just strictly bad management. But if you look at that, the track record of that type of warehousing does not seem to be that great, or is it just that things have changed that much now that you figure their prospects are better?

Mr Winter: I think they are run better. In retailing, we always have to look at management, because it is a tremendous management feat to actually run a retail store, especially one of that size. I think they have better capitalization. They are now run by the Price Club out of the United States. The point I would like to make is that they are not really retailing; they are investment banking. They turn their product so fast that in 20 days they get 90 days' credit and they are making points at the bank. That is why they can make it so cheap in the store.

Mr Sutherland: Just one final question. You talked about where all the economic nationalists are and I guess my basic concern is, do you not feel there is a way we can get the message out to people that you cannot have your cake and eat it too, in terms of all the benefits you receive of living here and the quality of life and lower crime rate and some of the things you mentioned about better health care, lower infant mortality?

Mr Sterling: Wake up and smell the coffee cake.

Mr Sutherland: That cannot be sold to people in terms of any type of aggressive advertising campaign in selected border communities or throughout the province? I mean, we have the Madison Avenue whizzes who are making all these people go out and buy it and appeal to people to go across the border with their effective marketing campaigns. Are there not the effective marketing campaigns to keep them here?

Mr Kwinter: Yes, the bottom line is price. If it was higher you could not do it. You have to use a marketing campaign to try to convince people to spend more money than they have to spend somewhere else. You do not need a marketing campaign to get people to go and pay less.

Mrs Sullivan: If you can buy a $40 shirt for $7.99, the same quality, same merchandise, 15 minutes from your home, how are you going to counteract that?

The Chair: We have a long list here.

Mr Stockwell: Did you want to answer that, by chance?

Mr Winter: I do not know.

Mr Kwinter: Let's try everything. The sales thing is going like that, the leakage is going up exponentially, try everything.

Mr Jamison: I have a number of questions for you if you will bear with me, I would like to walk you through them. The first one, for the committee's purposes, really am asking you to expand further on the list of 250 products if you can give us more information on the particular goods that showed the two examples, gasoline and so on.

I am concerned also as a representative retailer in the retailing sector. You are not aware of where these price differences developed and seem to be thoroughly confused about the large differences on some very basic items. I think it is important that this committee consider that and take a look at why those price differences exist. That is why I asked you to give us as many examples as you could so that we can really look at.

Of course we realize there are a number of factors contributing to the problem we are experiencing, but in your presentation you mentioned the GST and you mentioned a 15% jump in the volume of cross-border trade. Really. How did you arrive at that? How were you able to arrive at that particular equation?

Mr Winter: Canada Customs counts the number of goods. Statistics Canada puts it together and published about a week ago the increase in trade from the previous January. So it jumped quite significantly in January. People were very, very angry about this tax.

Mr Jamison: Do you find that people are continuing to show animosity towards that particular tax in that manner?

Mr Winter: I think the federal government got off the hook very nicely because there was a war, and that diverted consumers' attention. By the time the war was over we were two or three months down the road and the fiasco got off the GST.

Mr Jamison: This was just more or less another kind of...

Mr Winter: Puts up prices, yes.

Mr Jamison: I would like to turn my attention basically to interest rates, and I would like to ask you a question that really reflects the cost of doing business in that fashion.

The Chair: I am having a little trouble hearing.

Mr Jamison: —that asks you to point out the difference in cost, if you can, of doing business with an interest rate that is lower in Buffalo, as far as a retailer is concerned compared to one that would be in Niagara Falls, for example. What effect would the spread have right now?

Mr Winter: Well, the effect has the spread, if you are building space, that it is going to cost you more because your mortgage rates from the bank are going to be considerably higher. And then a retailer always has to carry inventory, so he gets a loan from the bank at our rates rather than their rates and of course that puts up the prices. Well. There is nothing magical about this. It is very simple.

You have your costs, you have your small markup to cover your risk and make a profit and at the bottom fall your prices of your goods—higher costs, higher prices.

Mr Jamison: In your presentation there was a discussion about whether it is saleable to start programs that would promote "shop Ontario" or "shop Canadian." In my experience, and it is limited as far as shopping cross-border, I am aware there is an ongoing campaign in the United States about buying made in the USA. That campaign, when I have had the opportunity to talk to people we are connected to about that, is seen over there as being successful, is seen as flipping a switch in people's minds. We have neither a federal campaign to really speak to that issue nor a campaign of a similar nature provincially. How do you feel about that?

Mr Winter: As I said, I do not think there is any one solution and I think we should try everything, but it still will not address the fundamental issue that things cost less here. I think we have to address that issue and move towards solutions of why suppliers seem to charge more in Canada than in the United States, not just more, but considerably more, in certain areas. The other thing is that I am not a representative of the retailers so I am not—

Mr Jamison: Well, I am not saying that.

Mr Winter: I think you will have Mr McKichan next week to talk to. He is the retailer.

Mr Jamison: Yes. Okay. Again, all of us have certainly had this concern on our minds for a period of time. I found, when I talked to people and really went through the whole conversation about why you would cross-border shop, that the obvious reasons were there but there were also some underlying reasons. I have had a number of people really talk to me about customer service and customer satisfaction. Some people have said, "Listen, I not only go over there and shop and buy what I want for less, but I seem to be appreciated over there more than I am in my own home town."

Mr Sterling: That's only since you were elected.

Mr Jamison: Having been rudely interrupted, I find that to be a concern to me because maybe people are really handling that end of business differently. I know there is a strong drive on to have cross-border shopping continue as far as Buffalo and those relative communities are concerned. What do you feel about that?

Mr Winter: Again, Thunder Bay is making a very concerted effort to improve customer service in the stores. The chamber of commerce has a big program at the moment to encourage better service. I know when I checked in the small town of Fort Frances I was quite astonished by how good the customer service was. The retailers knew everybody by name, they greeted them, they were attentive, they complimented them on their purchases. I do not see how in some of the smaller communities you could get much better.

Of course retailing is not just price, but I think the motive of driving people across is first price and then selection and then there are all these other reasons. One of them that turns up, but not as frequently as selection and price, is service. Yes, we have to improve. We are in a competitive environment and the more we can do to improve customer service, as well as other aspects of retailing, the better.

Mr Jamison: Just a final comment. I found your comment on the value of the Canadian dollar as opposed to the dollar in the US interesting. What I found interesting was your opinion that people now do not even stop to do the calculation in their minds; they know it is close enough to being equal to them that there is not really an assessment; it is taken for granted that there is a saving. In some cases there may be and there may not be, but again, it is something that is in their minds. Having said that, those are my questions.

Mr Phillips: May I just ask three or four questions for clarification and then a fairly large one. On page 3, the $1 billion, what percentage of retail sales would that be in Ontario?

Mr Winter: Well, last year Canada did about $180 billion in total. Ontario is 43% of Canada, so whatever 43% of $180 billion would be—somewhere about $70 billion or $80 billion.

Mr Phillips: It is around 1.5% or something like that.

Mr Winter: That is right, but where is it concentrated?

Mr Phillips: Right. On that share lost to International Falls, the knife, fork and stuff, is that grocery sales?

Mr Winter: I am sorry, that is restaurants. The groceries are—

Mr Phillips: The 12.5%.

Mr Winter: The 12.5%.

Mr Phillips: Right. The price comparisons, the 250-item thing, were you comparing Canadian prices to a Cosco, Price Club type of thing?

Mr Winter: One of the problems with International Falls is that there are a number of aggressive discounters there such as K-Mart, which is certainly far more aggressive in the United States than it is here, so there is an enormous K-Mart crossing. But there were also comparisons in the supermarkets of brand names, Campbell's Soup there, Campbell's Soup here, brought back on to the same volume basis, because sometimes their cans are a little bit different.

Mr Phillips: I take away from that a 50% higher price in Canada than in the US on the 250 items.

Mr Winter: About, yes.

Mr Phillips: On page 12, on the Nintendo and the prices and what not, are those Canadian organizations sourcing that product in Canada, do you think? Or in the US?

Mr Winter: I believe that they would be sourcing the Nintendo from overseas, because it certainly has a French label on the box. So they are probably sourcing it from somewhere else. Very few retailers in Canada source from the same place. For example, Sears Canada does not source from the same place as Sears USA, unfortunately, because if it did, we might be able to get some of their volume-buying discounts.

Mr Phillips: My big question is one that I think the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology also was recommending when it was in here, and that is a concern about kind of one of your solutions. And by the way, I thought this was a very thoughtful presentation and very helpful to us, and really in an understandable form. I really appreciate it.

My concern is that I sense a growing feeling that maybe a fast way to help the retailers out is by perhaps increasing the sourcing from the US somehow or other. I am quite concerned about that, because I think we will find, as a committee—and one of your recommendations is to talk to suppliers—if we got Pepsi in here, it would be able to go item by item all the way down and show why it costs that much more for it to make its product here in Canada than in the US. Indeed, I dare say that a huge part of our food processing business, if it had its druthers, if it could without any muss or fuss bring the product in from the US, would be bringing it in. I am personally concerned that we have to be careful in tackling this immediate problem of retailers and cross-border shopping that we do not look to a solution which moves a lot of our manufacturing out of here to the US. We source for their Canadian retailers out of the US and then we find, lo and behold, it has impacted tremendously on our manufacturing sector.

Similarly, I would think another group we would have in here would be the farm community. It would say that the reason it costs that much for a turkey in Canada versus the US is these things. So I guess my question to you is, I know that right now the thing that is driving us is concern about retailers and cross-border shopping. Is there any risk that your solution 6 would lead to, yes, we could help solve the retailers' problems, but we would emasculate our manufacturing sector?

Mr Winter: Well, of course. There are things you may not know, like Canadian Club is no longer made with Canadian grain. It is too expensive. They are buying it on the world market and bringing it in from Australia because our grain is too expensive. Campbell Soup Co Ltd is bringing in chicken through some little loophole because it cannot buy it cheap enough from the marketing boards. So the chicken you get in Campbell's chicken soup here is not Canadian chicken.

The Pepsi example: They can make Pepsi and sell it in other markets for what you and I would consider a reasonable price, and there seems to be some internal reason why it costs twice as much to transport it to a border community like Fort Frances. It is transported from Kenora to Fort Frances, which is a reasonable distance, whereas from International Falls it is brought in three or four times the distance at a fractionally lower price. I would like to see you bring in Pepsi and ask this bottler, "Why are your prices so astronomically high?"

I think you are right about the sourcing problem. Who knows if Heinz or the ketchup bottlers are going to stay in Ontario? It would seem to me that they can bring in ketchup from Paris, Texas to International Falls, which is an enormous distance, and sell it much cheaper than they can by bringing it in from Leamington up to Fort Frances. It is a very big issue in our economy today whether many of these manufacturers will not move down to the Texas border, or even do as Green Giant has just done. They moved out of southern California at $7 an hour so that they can pay $4 a day to the Mexicans. What are they doing down there? It is frozen something or other.

We cannot stop that. Those are decisions that are being made by other people, and our economy is changing rapidly now that we have this free trade agreement. I think we have to concentrate on some of the bottlenecks that are affecting our retailers and ask those questions, "Why is the wholesale price in Canada higher than retail in the United States?" and get some answers on that.

Mr Phillips: I speculate the answer will be the same reason you outlined for the retailers. It is everything. It is just the cost of doing business in Canada.

Mr Winter: But that does not explain why Oshkosh is three times more expensive in Toronto, which is the fifth largest market in North America. You have New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Detroit-Ann Arbor, and then you have Toronto.

Mr Stockwell: Different governments.

Interjections.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate it, John. I am just saying, I think I know the food processing industry quite well, and there is a substantial risk that it will all leave here.

The Chair: I guess one of those recommendations we have to figure out is how to keep it here.

Mr Phillips: Well, that is right.

Mr Kwinter: Could I just make a comment on this?

The Chair: Quick.

Mr Kwinter: During the free trade debate, I chaired the cabinet subcommittee that travelled around. We had a leading executive of one of the major food companies in the world, the Weston group, and he said that in his opinion if the free trade agreement goes through, as far as the food processing industry is concerned, anything that has a long shelf life than two weeks will no longer be made in Canada. The example he used is that the Oreo cookie factory in Chicago would run for a couple of extra hours on a Friday afternoon to make all the cookies it would need to service the Canadian market. That is the problem—the economies of scale and the volumes.

Mr Sterling: When you go to the solutions or toward amelioration, I guess my focus on trying to ameliorate the situation is to allow people in our country to compete—that overused cliché—on an even playing field. I am not interested in saying to our consumers, "We are going to give an unfair advantage to one side or the other." If our people cannot compete, then they should not be in it and somebody else should be providing that service.

Now, I think that we can compete if we make some changes. Part of those changes, as my colleague mentioned, is that our taxation structure is far too burdensome on our small business people. I think the health tax levy which was introduced by the past government was extremely ha-the small business people in this province. But I am asking for other parts of the solution.

I was at an urban planning conference in late October last year and I heard Michael McCracken of Informetrica, who actually made a presentation to this committee in our pre-budgetary consultation. One of his comments, I thought, was interesting—I do not know if anybody has mentioned it yet in this committee—and that was that our municipal governments had made no attempt to plan or care for what you would call second-class or third-class retailing. They have attempted to do all of their zoning for retailing as first-class retailing. Therefore he saw as part of the problem in competitiveness in the retailing business that we were far overstocked or oversupplied with retailing space which was “first-class” and we were far understocked with retailing space which was second- or third-class or whatever you want to call it. I think that is perhaps something positive which some of the municipalities can participate in, providing some remedy in keeping the business free. Because if you have to pay $54 a square foot at the Manulife Centre, then Creeds can no longer exist, or nobody could buy Creeds at $54 a square foot.

If Manulife would not move off $54 a square foot, then that space is empty, as it is now. I think that part of the problem is not only on the basis of our fixed costs or our leasing costs being too high, but maybe it can be traced back somewhat to a planning problem as well.

Mr Winter: Well, we have far less retail space than the United States and partially that is because the Ontario Municipal Board keeps a restriction on the amount of commercial space that you can build. In the province of Ontario you have to go and say to the municipality, “There is a market for what I want to do,” or it will not let you do it and then you have to fight it out at the Ontario Municipal Board. You do not have that restriction in the United States. You can go and build whatever you want and you can go broke if you want. So, yes, we certainly do seem to have lower standards with Cadillac standards.

If you compare a supermarket on the Ontario side and the Minnesota side, the cleanliness, the presentation, the quality, are far better with Safeway in Fort Frances than they are across the border. However, we are paying more for that and that ultimately gets on to the price of the butter and the margarine and all the rest of the necessities. We are subjected to high standards and we pay for them.

Mr Sterling: I just do not think we are competitive in retail space and I think that a lot of the small business people who are going out of business along Yonge Street and Bloor Street and areas that I see here in Toronto are going out as a result of—well, it is partially as a result of, you know, a dramatic plunge in sales, but I also feel they are being gouged. And they are being gouged, I think, because there is a system where there is not that adequate supply of all kinds of retail space which they can rent at a reasonable price. So I think we should actually look at the planning issue and say to municipalities, “You have to be willing to provide an adequate number of spots for this kind of second-class retailing to go on.”

The Chair: I am just going to comment on that. I am sorry if I am interjecting, but when I was looking for office space for my constituency office, there were at least eight or nine empty facilities within 50 yards of where I finally chose. I asked each one how much per square foot because I was looking for the best price that I could get, like the good socialist that I am, right? I said, “Well, I’ve got a quote from this person over here.” I figure supply and demand in the marketplace is going to give me some kind of relationship, some kind of bidding war because there are eight or nine of them that are empty, and more coming. I could not get anybody to move. “No, leave it empty.” Eventually I went with the best deal that I could get, but within the whole area where I was looking there was hardly any variation and there was very little movement in terms of what you would expect in a supply-and-demand situation.

Mr Sterling: I guess what I am looking for are ways that we can make the system so that retailers can be more competitive. I think we have a real problem with taxation on small businesses but I think there is also a problem in terms of lease costs in this area which just makes it almost impossible for retailers to exist.

Mrs Sullivan: There are a couple of things that I was interested in. First of all, following up, I wanted to know a little bit more about your methodology in terms of the work that you did in Fort Frances and International Falls, because you have emphasized Fort Frances more in your paper than the other communities where you have done household surveys. What other work did you do besides household surveys? Were you visiting in the supplier community, in the warehousing? What were you doing?

Mr Winter: Yes. I talked to probably all the retailers, because retailing is very person-oriented so you have to talk to the consumers and the retailers, talk to their suppliers as well, talk to the US suppliers to try to get a handle on what they are charging. One of the most difficult things in retailing is to get what people have actually bought their product for. It is a great challenge. It is one of the little secrets. It is really eye-opening to sit down with a merchant and have him show you his invoices. There was one guy who was selling some type of skidoo. I do not know which Canadian made it was. He was showing me the invoices he got from a competitor across the border. His prices from the Canadian company were considerably higher than what it was selling in the United States. This is the type of work that I was doing there.

Mrs Sullivan: Was the Canadian manufacturer shipping across the border?

Mr Winter: Yes, he was shipping across the border and the price that was asked was considerably lower. It is just like MacMillan Bloedel in Thunder Bay. The price for Thunder Bay is considerably higher than Duluth. Why is this? Partially it is because the retailers have not complained. They have not got together. I believe some of the retailers in Thunder Bay have started to kick up a fuss and asked these questions and they have been getting lower prices. But still, Menard's down in Duluth is getting much better deals.

I was only quoting Fort Frances more often than some of the other studies because it is the most up to date. I feel that the work I did in Windsor almost a year ago is no longer up to date, because you can see the trend in the Toronto area over the last few months and it has gone up just in the people who are curiosity seekers. They go off and then they tell their friends and they go off and it comes into a vicious circle.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in that, because when I look at the communities that you have looked at, Fort Frances and International Falls as a community are almost like one town and certainly this issue has been one that has been a part of life in that area for as long as people remember, from the time they were children. There were certain shops that you went to to buy certain things on one side and the Americans would come back to buy certain things on the Canadian side. Perhaps one of the things that has deteriorated there is that there are fewer Americans coming across now, but once again that could be a price situation.

When you were doing your work, were you looking at the kind of retail co-operatives that would enable an increased volume of purchases, an increased retail inventory, from a supplier?

Mr Winter: Yes, but one of the recommendations to the retailers was that they had better get together with compatible retailers elsewhere and form buying groups so that they could buy at a greater volume. There was one guy, for instance, who was selling Maytag dishwashers. Now, he could get a really good deal if he ordered 54, but it is a small community and he is never going to get sales of 54. But if he was able to join together, Maytag would actually send it up there without any charges and he would be competitive. But he can only get that deal with such a size. So certainly there is a need to join buying groups and have more buying power, but you run up against the problem of smaller, independent, family businesses that believe that one of their strengths is their independence and the service that they give. That is the way they see it, and they do not want the same type of merchandise as the competitor down the road has got. So it is not easy.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in your comments about the wholesale cost to retail merchants, and I think it might be worth while for the committee to have a future look at those areas. I tend to agree with Gerry Phillips that on Canadian manufactured products, the various items you have identified as making our retail sector less cost-competitive are also going to be reflected in the manufacturing sector and probably in the distribution sector as well. That is something we might want to look at.

Were you able to identify any new trends in retailing that appear to be a move away from existing retail operations that in fact may break some of the consumer habits as they exist now? You have identified, for instance, the Price Clubs, the warehouse operations, as being very attractive. There are other alternatives that are used, for instance, in Europe and we have seen some of them come to Canada, such as Ikea, with the integrated manufacture and retail operation, providing extraordinarily good quality—Habitat another one—with low prices. Do you see any other trend along that line that retailers perhaps are not grabbing on adequately or could develop?

Mr Winter: I think the whole discount sector in the United States, the whole off-price sector, we have very many off-price warehouse-retail outlets. There are a few quite brilliant retailers in Toronto who will sell seconds. They are not in the malls, so many people do not know who they are. I think that has been restricted because of concentration in Canadian retailing with the big department stores and the big Canadian Tires and so on. They do not like to see the same products being merchandised 10, 20 miles away at a dramatically different price. There are so many opportunities. There is one just in northern Kitchener where the Mennonite market is. They have a chance of setting up an off-price discount mall that may rival Niagara Falls. They certainly have the known location and the draw of other reasons.

So I think it is going to come very gradually, but I do not think we have the time to wait for some of that and I do not think our small retailers are expendable. I do not think we should just shrug our shoulders and say: "Well, those guys are not competitive. Too bad." I think we have to do something.

Mrs Sullivan: You see, every alternative that you have suggested as an approach relates to moving into a cut-rate, lower-priced opportunity. Now, Bi-Way was that operation, a beautifully managed, highly profitable operation for years and years. Abe Fish did a wonderful job with that company and it is in virtually every community or region of the province.

The cut-rate opportunity has been available in Ontario for a long time, but it seems to me that if the downtown retail merchant is going to be competitive, something other than a cut-rate warehouse operation is going to be vital and I just do not hear how the downtown merchant in the community is ever going to be competitive, particularly with the new retailing trends are immediately to the low-price seconds operation.

Mr Winter: We are having a dichotomy in retailing. We either go for low price or we go for some type of value added and extra service. You pay your money and you take your choice.

A lot of people, because of the recession and other reasons, are taking their choice for lower prices. I think there is room for both, but probably we have too much of one and not enough of the other.

Mr Stockwell: Some comments maybe and they will maybe arrive at a question. First, I represented municipalities in an area known as Long Branch, New Toronto, Mimico, and Lakeshore. I am sure you know about it, being from the Beach in East Toronto.

Twenty-five or 30 years ago, they wailed and screamed when Sherway Gardens opened. Sherway Gardens was the shopping mall bonanza that took place some 20, 25 years ago, and in Toronto there were a number of them—Yorkdale, Sherway, Cloverdale, some others that opened they are still living in that era. Even if you walk down the street today, they would still complain about our allowing the freeway to open.

Now you find Sherway store owners complaining about the Price Club opening and the Price Club stealing business from them, etc. It seems to me that if we are going to be in a free market system, these things are going to happen. Although it may be difficult to say and difficult to accept, but to try and protect certain segments of our business community such as the small strip shopping area such as the Beach—well, the Beach is different, but let's say Mimico, New Toronto and Long Branch, because the Beach is a little more specialty, high-end, artsy kind of shopping area—but if you did try and protect the New Toronto-Long Branch-Mimico area, are you just wasting your time? Is it really something that can be done to achieve a viable return to those days when they were a big concern?

Mr Winter: I do not think I am talking about going backwards. I am talking about negative changes that are happening in our society and what implications—if we do not do something, a few years down the road we are going to have enormous vacancies.

Mr Stockwell: But you are calling them negative changes.

Mr Winter: Certainly.

Mr Stockwell: You are suggesting they are negative.

Mr Winter: The dollars are going across the border to other things.

Mr Stockwell: I agree with that.

Mr Winter: I remember when Sherway opened and Dixie was just clobbered. It took them, what, 10, 15 years to get back to some type of reasonable—

Mr Stockwell: Dixie mall.

Mr Winter: Yes, Dixie mall. Cloverdale had problems for a few years.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, but what happened to Dixie Value Mall is they found a new niche in the market.

Mr Winter: It took them a little while.

Mr Stockwell: But they found it. Now they are busier than Sherway.

Mr Winter: But I do not think you are going to find another niche in the market in Windsor or Niagara Falls once the little guys go out of business.

Mr Stockwell: Okay. The other question is, I have a very great difficulty with some of your recommendations: if we cannot compete, if we are not going to be able to compete, then let's charge somebody to go across the border. That seems totally counterproductive. We are not resolving the issue. We are just saying: "Okay, yes, we charge you a lot in taxes and real estate is high and so on and so forth, so what are we going to do to solve the problem? We'll slap a new charge on you if you decide to go over the border." It seems totally counterproductive to me.

Mr Winter: We happen to be paying for some of our special services by these taxes that people can escape by shopping across the border. Those taxes, indeed, make some of our retailers uncompetitive.

Mr Stockwell: A $5 charge, you feel, will stop the cross-border shopping for the gas and milk and such things.

Mr Winter: It will certainly cut it down a considerable amount, I feel.

Mr Stockwell: Let's move on to the bigger ticket items. Five bucks is not stopping somebody. I heard of a friend of mine who is planning on going down to get a car. Tell me something: What are we going to do about that? A $5 charge is not going to make one whit of difference to that person.

Mr Winter: I get different stories about cars. I believed from one source that we now had restrictions on car purchase and that you cannot buy a Canadian model in the United States, and a Canadian model is a very simple change. You have to have a baby restraint system and you have to have lights on all the time, something that you could go to Canadian Tire and within five minutes they could change the US car and make it a Canadian car. I believe you cannot do that. There is a restraint, how we protect our automobile market. I do not see why we cannot introduce some other protection against the people who have built our border communities.

Mr Stockwell: The other point you make is on buying power. You have suggested if we had better buying power, we could if you listened to what Mr Phillips said about Pepsi walking in and itemizing it, why would not the same problems that a retailer faces be faced by a manufacturer, a wholesaler or a middle man? For instance, he still has the health tax, workers compensation, unemployment insurance, business, realty, municipal, all these taxes folded into his operation. Why is it so astounding that his prices are higher also than the middle man's in the United States?

Mr Winter: I believe his prices are higher, but what we are talking about is not just 10% or 20%; we are talking about Pepsi at three times the price.

Mr Stockwell: I know, but I ask you, how much of that is made up in just the simple, non-competitive position that our country is in right now?

Mr Winter: I believe the Pepsi manufacturer that we were talking about has a monopoly. He can charge what he likes.

Mr Stockwell: So you think there is gouging involved as well.

Mr Winter: For that example there appears to be, when you have a look at what he is selling at in other markets.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, so gouging is taking place.

Mr Winter: But who is doing the gouging? I do not think it is the retailer.

Mr Stockwell: It is academic, because if there is gouging taking place and people decide to cross-border shop, somebody is going to cut his prices because he is obviously losing sales. Be it the retailer, be it the wholesaler, be it the manufacturer, somebody is going to feel the pinch.

No, he is not making as much money. If he cuts his prices, he realizes his profits are going to go up.

Mr Winter: But they go across the border and buy the Pepsi there.

Mr Stockwell: The point I am trying to make to you is, so they cross the border in droves; eventually somebody comes to the realization, "Let's drop my price, because I am losing all that business to the United States." I mean, if it was that simple, it would be that simple to resolve. The free market system would level the playing field.

Mrs Sullivan: He cannot price it at $10 below his cost.

Mr Stockwell: I guess the point I am trying to make is, there must be more to it than somebody simply gouging. There has to be something more to the equation than somebody gouging, because if he was losing a tremendous amount of business to cross-border shopping, any idiot would say: "Well, I'm losing so much business, I had better drop my prices. I've got a 100% or 200% markup in this. Let's take 40% or 50%."

Mr Winter: I do not understand.

Mr Stockwell: You do not understand the question or you do not understand why they do not drop their prices?

Mr Winter: Part b.

Mr Stockwell: Well, frankly, I do not agree with you. I do not think there is that much gouging taking place. I think there is more to it than simply he is overcharging and that is why he is not dropping his prices.

Mrs Sullivan: He would be wise to buy it at the Price Club and have it shipped in.

Mr Stockwell: Yes. Well, it is true. The sad commentary is, the Price Club's retail price is less than the wholesaler's price to the retailer. It is obscene that that in fact takes place.

You talk about the savings by crossing the border. One of the points during your conversation was the Sunday shopping issue. Open Sunday shopping was adopted in this province for the previous eight months. Did you notice any major difference between cross-border trips because we were open Sundays or not?

Mr Winter: We had done some work in Niagara Falls and there was a significant proportion—and I can get it for you—who said, "Well, we would shop for our convenience items here, but the stores are closed, so we are going across the border." That was before the legislation was struck down. I did not have the opportunity to survey in Niagara Falls because it is all driven by what the client wants and where the client is located. I have been very fortunate to be able to have worked in certain communities at more or less the right time, but I did not have the opportunity to run that survey when everybody was open to see how those patterns have changed, so I am afraid I cannot help you with that.

Mr Stockwell: All right. The last question is, from the percentage of shoppers that do cross-border shop, what is the percentage that responded to you that price was the number one reason for shopping?

Mr Winter: That is usually the highest. I can get that for Windsor and—

Mr Stockwell: Give me an idea: 60%, 70%, 80%?

Mr Winter: Yes, it is up like that. Then the next range, probably 10%, 15%, in that range, is selection and—

Mr Stockwell: Service.

Mr Winter: And then service comes down, and going to see their family and friends and all the rest are reasons in border areas.

Mr Stockwell: Do you believe that if these adopted the problem would be resolved?

Mr Winter: I do not think we are ever going to solve the problem; I think we can ameliorate it. I think we have to do some radical things now or else the conditions in the border communities, in Windsor, in Niagara Falls and Chatham, where it is really hurting, will get dramatically worse.

Mr Stockwell: You say "now." Like in the next couple of weeks? I heard you say that people are declaring bankruptcy today, tomorrow, a week or so down the road.

Mr Winter: I do not know how fast you guys work.

Mrs Sullivan: Slow, slow.

1710

Mr Stockwell: It depends. Well, tell me now. I think in the next couple of weeks that we are going to see some more major bankruptcies along the border towns.

Mr Winter: Certainly, and we are going to see some more retail bankruptcies too.

Mr Stockwell: You are not overstating the problem. We are looking at some huge numbers.

Mr Winter: In January, some of the retailers I know even in Toronto—there was a small retailer who is a Jew and there were days when nobody came into his store and people came into his store and just bought a watch for $6 total sales all day. It is really serious out there in retail now and the figures are showing it. It takes some people a little while to realize how serious it is in retail. It is even worse in the border communities and that is why some of the mayors are jumping up and down and saying "Hey, let's do something."

Mr Stockwell: So we do not really have a lot of time to consult.

Mr Winter: I do not think we have the luxury of time to spin this out for years while we come up with a solution.

Mr Stockwell: Months, months. I am trying to get you down. My problem with this government is it consults, it reviews, it discusses, it answers its questions in the fullness of time. Really, what I would like you to give to me is an impression of what we are looking at here, your time limit, that you think something needs to be done.

Mr Winter: I would like to see in the next couple of months some means by which you apply provincial sales tax to cross-border shopping.

Mr Stockwell: And then also charge for people who do cross-border shop?

Mr Winter: I do not believe that it is your jurisdiction. I think you have to say to the federal government, "Look, guys, you're going dramatically the wrong way."

Mr Stockwell: Last, how did you get involved? You're a management consultant business. Do you have a retail business?

Mr Winter: No. I used to work in retailing, but I have a management consultant business and we have been hired by a number of municipalities to help them come up with a strategy to face this issue. I also have had the luxury, because we do other types of survey, to sneak in questions that I am interested in when we do other types of surveys. Most survey firms do this, but I have a wide database on this issue, along with a number of other issues, I may add too.

Mr Stockwell: My last question is, if you could leave with one thought, it is that speed is very important when it comes to this issue. We do not have time to hang around, debate and discuss, consult and review it and all those kinds of lovely words.

Mr Winter: It certainly is a good summary.

Mr Stockwell: Thank you. I can use that.

Mr Hansen: I just wanted to clarify; maybe Mr Stockwell was not here earlier when I handed this out. As it says, "Price in US dollars." This is an advertisement that was in the Tribune. There is a 7% GST, there is a 8.3% duty, no provincial sales tax, and one thing I forgot to add, no state taxes also in New York state. This will be delivered to your driveway. This is the one I was talking about and this to me is very aggressive. There is an outfit in Ridgeway, I believe, that is into pool sales on a wholesale basis. It is not very competitive for him when it comes in and there is no sales tax. That is an 8% difference right there.

I am sorry, Mr Stockwell. I know you have asked a few questions about when we are going to get going. In this committee we have tried to get going as soon as we can. I think Mr Kwinter will say that we discussed, before we even did pre-budget, that we get going on this right away. So we are doing the best we can. We do have to consult a little bit, but the thing is that I can see that this whole issue has ballooned since January because when the GST did come out there were people writing letters to the paper to say: "It's a revolt. Refuse to pay the GST." Even if they paid 4% in New York state, they were looking at the revolt that they were getting even.

Mr Winter: This is the Canadian equivalent to proposition 13: "We're not going to take it any more, so we're going to go across the border."

Mr Hansen: Yes. So it is something that we have been looking at. I know you say you are not on the government side, Mr Stockwell, but you are part of the government and your participation and your ideas are welcomed on this side, within reason.

Mr Stockwell: That is not true. You know that.

Mr Hansen: To help the retailers out there, I think it is very important that we all work together. The one thing I mentioned this morning, since you were not here, and some of us have repeated ourselves to give you the idea of where we are coming from, I think the biggest thing we have to take a look at and pound a little bit harder is co-operation with the federal government at the border to wind up to see some means of collecting the 8% to keep it even there. I think this is about your line.

I have to really say that this—and you do not have to blush—is the best report I have seen condensed, very short, so far. It seems to be right up to date. It is hard to keep on top of this because it changes. In the period of time that it carries on, if it goes on much longer, this report will be obsolete in another two months.

It gives us a little bit more insight into the amount of money that is flowing across the border and the effects that it is having. Being a representative of the Niagara area, I can see it quite clearly. Maybe Mr Stockwell there, being farther away, does not see the effects as much as living right in there. As I say, I could walk up the street and on a clear day I could see New York state, so that is how close I am to the border.

I just wanted to comment that it is a good report and, living in the area, I see there is a lot of truth there. I have to take a look at some of the figures and I have to believe a lot that is in there.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Winter, I would like to echo the comments of Mr Hansen and compliment you on an excellent brief and thank you for taking the time and lending your expertise. A few of us here are pleasantly surprised at the number of business people, consultants and others, who are prepared to come forward and literally put their time and money forward in the interest of public service. It is appreciated very much.

Just a couple of points, because I think we have covered most of the ground. At the time the recession lifts, how much of an issue do you think this will be to the municipalities that are hurting, the retailers in those municipalities and the drain on the provincial economy overall?

Mr Winter: It is difficult to separate one reason from another for the cross-border. I think what you see in retailing is a pattern developing and it is difficult to change a pattern once it is solidly established. What we have been seeing in the last six months are so many people going across just because they hear about it in the media or they have heard about it from their friends. They might not have known, going out from the Toronto area, that there are such bargains to be had. I think it is going to be difficult to reverse a trend such as this if it gets on a consistent and repeated basis and people get used to it. I think it is going to be difficult.

It probably may not be as driven by the people who travel two hours to buy something for their children; they might buy it more at home when we do not have a recession, but they will certainly know that opportunity is there. It seems to me that the opportunities are getting better on the Buffalo side with Wal-Mart coming into that market first and with Pace Warehouse coming and some of the other attractions, so I think it is difficult to reverse.

Mr Christopherson: Your recommendation regarding clamping down: I have also had suggestions about, why does the government not lean more on the issue of the smuggling aspect, quite frankly, of goods that are not being declared as another way of, to use your words, clamping down?. How would you separate slowing down or removing some of the ease of going across and shopping, and in many cases not declaring, as a way of offsetting this from those individuals who you want to have good, easy access by virtue of the business they do, whether that is truckers, which is an obvious one, you can have a trucking lane, individuals who are going across to do business; people who perhaps work in one city and live in another? How would you see on a practical level those separations taking place?

Mr Winter: In some of the border communities you do not have enough lanes across. The Windsor tunnel, for instance, is constricted, but the Ambassador Bridge is not. I think a lot of it at the border is a scheduling problem. I think the federal government should ask a supermarket operator how to operate checkouts. The key thing would be to have enough people on when the demand is highest. They know when the demand is highest and they could quite easily schedule more people to work at those high, peak times. Have you ever come into Pearson when three or four jumbos are coming down and they know they are coming down and there are only a couple of people checking people through? What is this? If a supermarket operator did that, he would be out of business very quickly. It is a scheduling problem.

You could quite easily take some part-time people, put a funny hat on them, let them sit at the border and say, "Please, open up the trunk of the car." Those guys do not even get out of their little cabins. "Have you anything to declare? Where do you live? Welcome back to Canada. Have a nice day." I do not call that work. They have the option of not charging duties and not charging GST, whereas our retailers have to charge GST on minuscule amounts. Those guys, if they do not feel like it, if there are a lot of people there, can just wave them through. What is this? Meanwhile our Ontario retailers are going down the toilet because these guys are not doing their job properly. They should be collecting those taxes. They should be taking every dollar of taxes that they should be doing.

Perhaps we need to go back to the system that we had in Canada 200 years ago where the customs guys got a percentage of what they collected. If you linked their pay to productivity—

Mr Kwinter: They found out that the guys were making more money than the government, so they cut it out.

Mr Winter: If you had some type of bonuses for those guys, linked to the amount of money that they collected, would you see them opening up the trunks of more cars? "Would you please open up your trunk, sir? I want to look in." Sure they would.

I think it is a scheduling problem. You just look and see how many checkouts they have open. I would ask whoever runs Loblaw to give some advice to the federal government on how to run a checkout, because he runs them pretty good on Saturday mornings when I want to get through.

Mr Hansen: If I can just interject, one thing that happens is that those bridges built in Fort Erie and Niagara Falls were built for tourist trade; they were not built for shopping trade. I think that is the big problem right there. They were not designed for the amount of traffic going across.

Mr Winter: On some bridges, like Rainy River, there is no charge whatsoever, so there is absolutely no restriction. You do not have to pay your $1 or 60 cents; you just go across.

Mr Hansen: The other thing too is the long lineups. Gets so backed up I think that the people who are doing inspecting are getting telephone calls saying, "They're five miles back from the bridge causing traffic jams," so they wind up, "Next" and going through. I know it is wrong.

Mr Winter: Put more checkouts open on a holiday Sunday night because, yes, there are problems at the other end of the Windsor bridge. It is on Jefferson Avenue in Detroit. Sure it backs up in Detroit, but if you put more people on when you know that there are going to be peak periods, then you would be able to process them faster and you would also be able to ask them whether they have something in the back.

Mr Christopherson: Another question: Does anything come to mind as an obvious answer if the tax on gas or anything else were slashed, whereby the price that Americans are paying in terms of their cities and the quality of life would not happen here without having to pay on those taxes somewhere else? I realize it is an economic question, and a political one, but it is kind of the other side of another question that was asked by someone else.

Mr Winter: One of my solutions, one that I think works with the market, is to try a test market where at a border point you permit a gas station to sell gasoline at lower levels, so if you are going to drive to the border and if you are going to go across, you may as well buy your gas at that border point. You have driven there anyway. You would buy it in Canada. Now, you as a province are going to get a lot of taxes, because those taxes are going across the border. There are state and federal taxes in the United States that are considerably lower than in Canada, but it would be interesting to see, and that would be a test that would be quite easy to do. You set up an intervening opportunity where you can buy the gas.

In a small community like Fort Frances it might be that you would not be able to build a gas station at the border but you could rotate it among the gas stations in the community. If you are going to drive across, then you can get it. And that process of driving across for your gas engenders a whole lot of purchases, because you may just as well stop there and pick up your cigarettes or pick up a nice, humorous turkey for Christmas or for Sunday dinner, and so on.

Mr Christopherson: I follow your logic. The only thing I have had trouble getting over on this issue, quite frankly, is that I still see us just moving the border in terms of the cost of gas. In other words, no matter where we lower it and where we put it, there is going to be somebody on the periphery of that line who is going to say "You've drained my business." The communities are going claim it; certainly the gas station operators will. I know the zoning idea has been suggested, and there is a lot of experience. I do not think we have seen anything innovative, and maybe that does work, where you feather it. But that is always my concern about that; no matter where we put it, if we just isolate it in one place and say, "Well, here, you can have the same benefit as there is across the border," you are just moving the problem somewhere else. If someone in another community is going to feel that he is being wronged by it.

Mr Winter: I believe if you are going to drive to the border, you may as well be able to buy it on the Canadian side rather than the US side. I think that is worth a try. It does not cost you anything. Indeed, it will be revenue-positive because you will get more taxes. Let's see how it works on different locations. It is a reasonable idea. It sure works for the market.

I know the Quebec experience is they lower the taxes as you get closer to the border, but I do not think that is going to be dramatic enough. Okay, you are going to spend 54 cents instead of 54 cents, but they have got it over the border side at 26 cents, so you will still drive if you are determined to fill up your gas tank at half the price.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate very much your time and your answers and thoughts.

Ms M. Ward: I think most of the things that I had in mind have been discussed and answered. One of the things I was going to ask you has been touched on slightly. You were saying in here that the GST had an effect but it is mainly not a major explaining effect in terms of price. You have identified a lot of causes and some possible solutions, but what I was wondering about was really asking you to delve into people's minds, and I think your surveys might be able to do some of that. How much does people's perception about taxes, in the sense that if they feel taxes are unfair, then they give up their national sense of responsibility—you were saying, "Where are all the nationalists?" I guess I am a nationalist, because Mrs Sullivan was giving the example of something $7.99 and some other tremendous price. I would go for the higher price if it were Canadian. I do not understand why there are not more of those.

But what I was getting at about the taxes, if people feel that taxes are unfair, does that make them just decide to give up their national sense of responsibility to buy Canadian, or do you think? Like the anger over the GST, I can see that leading to increases in municipal taxes also, just a sense that taxation is unfair.

Mr Winter: I think it is like the free trade debate. We have had a very divisive debate on the GST, which unfortunately does not work. Hey, retail sales shut off like a faucet in January. It was just a disaster. It might have been better if they had introduced it in the middle of the summer when we were all feeling better, but in the depths of winter, in the middle of a recession—anyway, we are told that we want to become one big market, so why are those advantages in our stores rather than in their stores?

What I have seen is that people have been sold a bill of goods on the GST. They expected things that it would not produce, and unfortunately they were led to believe there were going to be some changes that they would see. They have not seen the changes and they are taking them. That is one force here. Now, how important that is in the total scheme of things, I could not say.

Ms M. Ward: Yes, it is maybe not very large. I think you mentioned something about 5% of people would buy Canadian no matter what.

Mr Winter: In the surveys they come through. Now, those may be the wives of retailers in the town, for all I know.

Ms M. Ward: There should be other reasons, but is there any chance of expanding that?

Interjection: The kids.

Ms M. Ward: I am not a retailer's wife.

Most of the other things I was wondering about have been discussed. One other thing: The Fort Frances and International Falls situation here that is covered in your paper, I am not familiar with International Falls. What is the size of that, relative to Fort Frances? Are they both the same size?

Mr Kwinter: Very small communities.

Ms M. Ward: So it is not an attraction of a bigger—

Mr Winter: There are 10,000 people in the hinterland around it on each side, so it is 35,000 total, both sides. But it is nice because it is isolated and they are equal distance from a large city. The trouble when you have price comparisons in Windsor versus Detroit is that Detroit-Ann Arbor is four million or five million people and Windsor is only about 250,000. The advantage of this area was that they were both relatively isolated but relatively the same distance from major urban areas.

Ms M. Ward: The other thing I was going to comment on, and I think Mrs Sullivan discussed this also, or maybe Mr Phillips, was the effect on other businesses, such as production. You were speaking about the manufacturers. It must also have an effect on small producers. You know, your supermarkets do buy from the small farmers and so on in the surrounding areas. You can imagine other groups being affected, such as people involved in crafts and so on. Is that a factor also?

Mr Winter: Of course. There is a negative spiral all the way down through the economy. You see the retailer's problems first. It is difficult to put a finger on, let's say here in the Toronto area, if you are selling bedding or linens, why your market is so poor at the moment. Look, we are losing out of Toronto 9% of our linens and bedding market to the Buffalo stores. There are a number of reasons for that, but that is high.

What level is acceptable? If you are in that market now, you may not realize how much is going across, because it is such a large and diffuse market, so you cannot put your finger on the fact that somebody in handicrafts has suddenly got his market cut off or reduced significantly because people are going across the border. Some of these things are difficult to nail down, but you can see the processes involved and they appear to be negative for the economy in general.

Ms M. Ward: One last thing just occurred to me. Is there any chance that this is cyclical? I can remember years ago people used to talk about going to Buffalo. It was a big thing. I was only a kid at the time, believe it or not. Is this something that ebbs and flows and so on? Do you think it may die down again?

Mr Winter: Yes, I think there is a pendulum. I think it does go from positive to negative. I think it is very significantly negative at the moment. I remember 12, 13 years ago our gas prices were actually lower than in the US and in some border communities there was a flood over to our side, for the gasoline only, not for these other things.

Mr Kwinter: That was a supply problem.

Mr Winter: Always the supply, because it is remarkable to see in Fort Frances that the truck goes through Fort Frances and the gasoline halves in price. It is all Canadian gasoline being sold on the other side. It is all the government taxes.

But, yes, it swings. I think it is significantly negative at the moment. If our economy continues to be weak, it will continue to be solidly negative against us for the short-term future.

Ms M. Ward: It is not just prices, though, and economics. It is also attractiveness, is it not, of the area that you are visiting? Buffalo for a number of years was not an attractive place at all.

Mr Winter: That is right. Buffalo has come a long way.

Ms M. Ward: I would not go there, so I do not know.

Mr Winter: I do not really know why you would go there, besides the Knox-Albright gallery and the chicken wings.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you. I appreciate your report also.

Mr Phillips: Again, just a comment, because I feel rather strongly about it and I think it is important for us as a committee to keep focusing on this. I personally think that the cross-border issue is the first of a growing issue, and I think how we treat it is extremely important.

Mr Winter, I repeat, has done a fabulous job here. I just have a fundamental concern about one of your recommendations, because I think that what we are seeing with this cross-border shopping is a kind of a focus and a highlight of the difference in the cost structures, Canada-US, and the retailers are looking for a solution.

If we grease the skids that make it easier for products to come from the US to Canada to solve this, I think we are going to accelerate the problems for our manufacturing sector. Maybe there is no solution to it, but I think I know some of the industry well. I do not believe the food processors are gouging. I think the profit margins Canada-US are about the same, and many of them, frankly, because they are US-owned, would welcome greasing the skids and would say: "Your problems are over. We'll manufacture. We'll keep our plant in Rochester moving a little faster and we can sell Pepsi here in Canada for $6 a case. Don't worry about it."

I am just saying I think we as a committee have really watch that we do not buy that solution, only to find we have undermined our manufacturing and our food processing sector—our food producers, our agricultural communities.

Mr Winter: I think we are having some change. Ontario for a long time could not get enough chicken market share, for some reason, and the prices were just double. My understanding is that we are addressing the problem and Ontario will get its reasonable share of the chicken quota. But I think that is going to take time. How long have we got?

Mr Phillips: Believe me, I appreciate your recommendations. You are here just to help us and I am not trying to be critical. I am just saying I think we have to watch that one as a solution.

There may be some tax things we can do. I do not know. I have not really thought a lot about this, but the problem is that if you are crass, you would say, "Income tax cuts for everybody who resides in Canada, but there is a group of people who are avoiding sales tax and that sort of stuff." I do not know whether we should be trying to think creatively about the tax structure. Maybe it will not work. There is, in a sense, an opportunity to inadvertently ease normal taxes here in Canada and maybe we should think creatively about that.

You have suggested one solution, which is an interesting one, of sort of the gasoline duty-free shop. It would be interesting. I imagine a bunch of people would sort of go to the end of the bridge and drive to the end of the bridge and turn around and come right back again, or maybe they would just back up from the thing, but I think that was a creative solution that you have given us.

I do not know whether you have ever considered whether you have any recommendations generally on the tax structure that may be of assistance.

Mr Winter: I believe you are talking to the Retail Council of Canada next week. They continue to say that you should be looking at the taxes that are on the retailers. I would agree with them that the taxes are high, but when you look at the total scheme of things and how much taxes are as a percentage of your normal operating costs, they are pretty low. But anything that will improve the competitiveness of the Canadian retailer is good. But again, how long is it going to take?

Mr Kwinter: I just want to make two comments. One of the things about the taxes, we are saying the GST is not necessarily a factor and the retail sales tax may not necessarily be a factor. When you look at it, for those items that do not have to be declared, where they would be subject to the GST, the total is 15%. That 15% really represents the difference between the value of the Canadian dollar and the value of the American dollar almost exactly. So if you go over to the United States, and as long as you are buying something you do not have to declare, it is at par. You are really buying it at par. I mean, you do not have to calculate; it is exactly at par, because you are not paying 15% extra as you bring it back that you would have to if you bought it in Canada. So what you do is, you look for the bargain and you do not even have to calculate; it bargain. Whatever you pay for it, that is the cost in Canadian dollars because you are saving that 15%. I think it is a significant number, a significant factor.

The other thing that I want to caution everybody about in any recommendations is that we are now into a free trade agreement and there are certain obligations on both sides of the contracting parties and you cannot erect non-tariff barriers. You cannot suddenly put a charge on people coming back into Canada and not have it going the other way, because that will be seen as a non-tariff barrier. It would be a disincentive to trade, and anything you do of that kind, you have to be very careful that it can stand up to the test of the free trade agreement and also stand up to a challenge by any interest group in the United States. That is just something that we have to really be aware of. You just cannot unilaterally do things that may contravene the free trade agreement.

Mr Winter: But I believe the US has a test location where it is trying the $5 service charge. You know, it is a pay—you use those services, you pay for them—and I believe they have started one or two where they are testing it at the border. I think that is going to be the test, because if they put a $5 charge on, we could put a $5 charge on, and suddenly it does not pay you to go across and fill up your gas tank.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, if I could just interject, this $5 charge experiment, is that $5 per person or $5 per car? It makes a difference as well.

Mr Kwinter: I do not know any of the details of it.

Mr Winter: I do not know, I think it is $5 per car. It is certainly $5 if you go across on a commercial vehicle, I believe.

The Chair: Are there any other questions from the committee? Then I would like to thank Mr Winter for coming. It has been a very informative afternoon. Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: It was really very good.

Mr Stockwell: The best we have had, no question about it.

The Chair: If you find out any information or anything that you feel you would like to share with this committee on an ongoing basis, we would appreciate any information that you could send along to us.

Mr Winter: We have just done something in Brantford, but we have not processed it, so we might know what the Brantford share is. Somebody is on the committee from Brantford, I believe?

The Chair: Brad Ward.

Mr Sutherland: I just wanted to bring up one other item of business before we adjourn. I wanted to discuss whether we were going to extend an invitation to this group of mayors that has kind of got together. I would ask either them or a representative from them to come and appear before the committee and I just wanted to see whether they thought that would be a good idea as well.

Mr Stockwell: Sure.

The Chair: The committee is adjourned until Thursday the 11th at 10 o'clock.

The committee adjourned at 1744.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 11 April 1991

The committee met at 1009 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Vice-Chair: I welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and our task force, sense on the cross-border shopping issue.

ONTARIO MILK MARKETING BOARD

The Vice-Chair: I would like to welcome the Ontario Milk Marketing Board, and I would appreciate it if you would introduce yourselves for the rest of the committee.

Mr Core: Thank you, Mr Chairman; it is a pleasure to be here today. I am John Core, chairman of the Ontario Milk Marketing Board, and to my right is Peter Gould, an economist who works for us; Claude Chartrand, who is a member of the board representing northern Ontario and its particular interest in this subject; and our general manager, John Smith.

I would like to begin this morning by thanking the committee for the opportunity to make a presentation. This is not the normal mandatory opening expression of thanks. You cannot turn on a radio or even open a newspaper these days without finding something on cross-border shopping. This is the current issue. It is the most obvious manifestation of some very fundamental problems in this country. However, the dairy industry started raising alarm bells at least as far back as 1986. While it is some solace to see the issue being given its due, we have seen continuous and aggressive erosion of our industry over that five-year period. At the same time, erosion is now affecting many other products and commodities. The impact is felt most directly in border communities, but that is the tip of the iceberg in our view. Lost sales mean lost jobs anywhere in the country where manufactured goods or food products are produced. In a general context, cross-border shopping is a very difficult problem to address. Border controls and duty collection are federal jurisdictions, but obviously there are provincial areas of responsibility that impact on the incidence of cross-border activity.

Perhaps what might be as difficult as anything is to change consumer attitudes. For reasons that are haunting us already, we have allowed and even encouraged Canadian consumers to take shopping excursions to the United States as a right. Who among us is going to challenge that constituency?

As you are all too well aware, another dimension to the problem is the erosion of the tax base. Do those taxes just get shifted or do we forgo services? Once either of those occurs, we enter a spiral that is difficult to stop. Canadians, like everyone else, complain about their taxes but somewhere along the line public finances have to be explained.

The problems faced by the dairy industry and dairy farmers are just a microcosm of a much larger problem. However, because of our system of national supply management, the dairy industry has a special need for effective border controls. That does not mean, though, that the impact on other industries or sectors is any less severe.

Furthermore, there is a direct relationship. As the incidence of cross-border shopping increases, the effect on the dairy industry worsens. The dairy industry has been seeking a solution to cross-border shopping for five years without success. Perhaps now that the issue is much more broadly based and being addressed in forums such as today's, there is a better chance that something meaningful can be accomplished.

In this presentation I want to do two things: provide some background on the issue from a dairy perspective and quantify the impact, and discuss our assessment of the problem and some potential solutions.

From the dairy industry perspective on supply management: To understand our concerns, I thought it might help to provide a little background on national dairy policy.

It is safe to say that supply management, as practised in Canada, has been at the forefront of the public policy debate for most of the last decade. It started in 1981 with the Economic Council of Canada's review of regulatory reform. That was followed in turn by intensive debates during the Canada-US trade negotiations, the GATT negotiations and most recently the National Dairy Task Force review.

Over that period we have been forced to synthesize and define what exactly are the key elements of national dairy policy and supply management. It boils down to three elements: border controls, production discipline and compensatory pricing.

The system only works with all three elements working effectively. Producers collectively limit their production by means of a quota system. The government carries no surplus removal responsibilities in Canada. This is not the case in virtually every other major dairy-producing nation. If surpluses are produced, they are exported at Canadian producers'—farmers'—expense. In exchange for limiting production, producers expect fair returns for their labour, management and investment capital. That is the compensatory pricing we were talking about. Finally, to prevent surpluses and maintain prices, effective border controls are essential.

Traditionally, supply management has been viewed by many as a program designed for farmers and by farmers. As the GATT process untangles, it is becoming more clear that our system evolved as the only viable means of sustaining a Canadian dairy industry from the onslaught of the grotesquely unfair but somehow legitimate trade practices of other major dairy-producing regions, notably the European Economic Community and the United States.

Just as a side comment, you might be interested in knowing that the surplus dairy production in the United States at the peak of their surplus exceeded the total Canadian milk production. Their surplus, about two years ago, exceeded our total production.

Too many of our critics view border controls as a means of sustaining supply management when quite the opposite is true. We discipline production because of Canada's use of article XI to put border controls in place, and in that regard we are virtually unique around the world. Just a footnote: Article XI is that section of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which gives the authority to countries to implement quantitative restrictions on imports for products whose production is limited to domestic requirements. So that is the authority from which we use border controls.

To put it simply and succinctly, without effective border controls over the past 20 years it is doubtful whether there would be a dairy industry of any consequence today. We limit production to meet our GATT obligations. Canada uses article XI as the only means available to defend against other countries' predatory and unfair trade practices.

Import control measures: There are three main ways by which imports are managed. These are: the use of the import control list, the Canadian Dairy Commission Act and tariffs.

The import control list identifies certain products for which imports are currently prohibited. Examples are butter and skim milk powder. Other products are permitted but are regulated through quotas. The best example is cheese. Canada has an annual global import quota of 20 million kilograms. That is about 7% of the Canadian domestic requirements for cheese. Issues relating to prohibitions and fixed quotas are part of the ongoing GATT negotiations.

Under the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, the commission has the authority to restrict the importation of blends or further processed products containing more than 50% dairy ingredients.

Finally, tariffs exist on a range of dairy products. One problem with tariffs is that they are being phased out under the Canada-US trade agreement. This led to dairy farmers asking for and having yoghurt and ice cream added to the import control list in 1988. That in turn led to the United States GATT challenge of Canada's authority to add yoghurt and ice cream to the import control list.

Blends have also been an issue in recent years with products customized—and I use that term loosely—solely to circumvent the 50% dairy ingredient provision. The most blatant example here is skim milk powder mixed with rock salt to circumvent the regulations and, more recently, cream and sugar mixtures.

The bottom line is that the industry cannot tolerate leakage in any form. Unplanned imports undermine the viability of the entire system and national dairy policy. Controlling imports is a federal responsibility. Their attitude is not always supportive, especially at a time when they want to project a more free trade-oriented image.

It is in this context that cross-border shopping affects the dairy industry. Whether a milk product or component is imported in an illegal blend or as a consignment purchased south of the border, the impact is the same.

There is a sideline to the yoghurt and ice cream issue. Canada has established, as a result of the agreement with the United States, an import quota of about 300 tonnes for both yoghurt and ice cream into Canada. You might be interested in knowing how much yoghurt and ice cream can be imported into the United States under this agreement. You can export no yoghurt into the United States because they have particular regulations saying that USDA inspectors must inspect farms from which milk is used to make cultured dairy products. So there can be no access to the yoghurt market in the US. I believe that the ice cream quota is in the neighbourhood of about 100 tonnes, most of it allocated, I understand, to countries that do not traditionally export ice cream. So even though they challenge Canada on our right to establish quantitative import restrictions on yoghurt and ice cream, they in fact have even tighter restriction, but they have a waiver from GATT that was established back in the 1950s that is not able to be challenged. I just wanted to make that side point to you.

The impact of cross-border shopping: As noted, the dairy industry is always concerned about border leakage. In the mid-1980s, producers in British Columbia began noticing a sizeable effect on their markets as more and more consumers, particularly from Vancouver, made the short trip to the United States. No different than today, milk and dairy products were not the main or only reason for making cross-border trips, but they certainly were a frequent purchase. Preliminary studies sponsored by BC producers produced alarming results.

Finally in 1988, Dairy Farmers of Canada persuaded the federal government that the issue was serious enough to warrant attention. Through Agriculture Canada, detailed studies were commissioned for BC, Ontario and New Brunswick. After lengthy delays, the results for BC and New Brunswick have been released. The study estimated that 7.6% of fresh milk and 4.5% of cheese consumption was being brought into BC by same-day Canadian travellers. Comparable figures for New Brunswick were 4.4% and 0.5% respectively. Those studies are almost two years old now and we know by the volume of traffic that the increase has been substantial since then.

No figures for Ontario have ever been released. One can draw one's own conclusions. The original Ontario study only included Sault Ste Marie in 1988. A year later it was deemed that the study had to be redone. When completed, another year later, it was deemed that Sault Ste Marie was not representative of Ontario and that southern Ontario border points had to be examined. Last week, we learned from the minister's assistant that the Ontario study has been submitted to him—that is by Mazankowski—but findings will not be released in advance of a "solution," which rather disappoints us.

What we do know is that cross-border traffic by same-day Canadian travellers increased by 36% between 1988 and 1990 and is likely still on the rise. We also know between 1985 and 1990 marketings of milk to the fluid plant in Sault Ste Marie have dropped by 30%. The figure may could be as high as 40%. Last fall, that plant went out of operation four days a week to three. In the near future it could be two, and at that point the viability of maintaining that plant in operation is highly suspect.

Finally, we know that the national market share for milk in Ontario has been reduced by 6% since February 1990 and it will go down 2% or 3% again next August. We look for all sorts of reasons to explain these cuts but have not put enough emphasis on the impact of cross-border shopping on that regard.

Because we have a national system for industrial milk products, lost sales not only affect the province where the losses occur. Similarly, we should not for a moment think that cross-border shopping is not a problem in Quebec or other provinces just because Agriculture Canada did not conduct a study there.

To put the costs in perspective, each 1% loss of national milk production ultimately translates into 200 fewer farms in this country, with lost farm-gate revenues of nearly $23 million annually.

We cannot quantify how much of these losses are associated with cross-border sales. We are simply making the point that they are contributing to them.

The dairy farm loss is only one dimension. Parallel losses occur for the processing sector, leading to plant closures, and for milk transporters, veterinarians, equipment dealers and feed suppliers. Losing dairy farms has a profound impact on the rural community.

As noted above, leakage under a supply management system is simply unacceptable. A solution must be found.

Why are prices lower in the United States? There is no doubt that prices, after adjusting for unit size and exchange rates, are lower on virtually everything south of the border. In the cases of beer, alcohol, cigarettes and gasoline, the explanation is fairly straightforward: Most of the price differences are due to taxes.

For milk and dairy products, the explanation is not as straightforward. To be as brief as possible, I will outline the contributing factors.

Made-in-Canada costs: Simply put, doing business, whether by or other, costs more in Canada. The same fuel that costs consumers less when they travel across the border is a higher input cost in producing milk. Interest rates on borrowed money have been consistently 4% to 5% higher in Canada. Labour costs and most other purchased inputs simply cost more. What critics superficially allege as being an efficiency is not accurate.

Policy differences: In many respects, dairy policies in Canada and the United States have a lot of similar objectives. However, how those objectives are achieved makes comparing the two systems like comparing apples and oranges. One of the most fundamental differences is that whereas Canadians operate with production disciplines, the US operates an open-ended support price system. There are no limits on milk production regardless of market conditions. The Canadian government buys all surplus production. Second, the cost of surplus disposal is borne by taxpayers, not producers, in the United States. Both these policies belie the true cost of producing milk but result in lower farm-gate prices. An obvious outcome of US dairy policy is a very costly surplus removal program. Rather than limit production, the approach until now at least has been to lower support prices. Since 1985, producers in the United States have arguably responded to lower prices by maintaining or increasing production as a means of survival, and they are again heading towards a major surplus situation in the United States.

The previous section alluded to higher interest rates in Canada. Beyond that, US agriculture policy provides access to below-market rates for farm credit. Another significant factor is their deficiency payment program which subsidizes both purchased feeds and homegrown feeds. The net effect, again, is to lower farm-gate requirements and mask the real cost of producing milk.

Market structure: There are two levels of comparison to be made; one at the farm gate, the other at the retail level. Price Waterhouse recently completed a study for the National Dairy Task Force. It found that on a cash cost basis, costs were fairly comparable between Canada and dairy farmers in border states. The one big difference was that if a 10% return on equity was factored in, however, most US farmers had a negative return for labour and management while Canadian prices allow for positive returns to labour.

The US dairy farmers involved in this study are living on their equity; the equity is bleeding down. In an attempt to try to stay ahead they are milking more and more cows, trying to do more and more work, which is leading to a surplus situation again in the United States. So they are in a vicious spiral now with the fact that their prices are moving down; they are trying to compensate by keeping their farm cash receipts up by producing more milk, which further compounds the problem.

You might be interested in knowing that the current US farm bill calls for the United States to consider putting in place standby supply management programs if their purchases reach a certain level of overproduction. That is the first time we have ever heard of the US government talking about something like a standby supply management program.

Perhaps more significantly, the study found that one of the biggest factors in price differences between the two countries is processor margins. Processors in the United States have much higher capacity utilization—it is not unrelated to open-ended support prices—and they also have lower margins.

We should also not lose sight of the fact that in unregulated markets retail prices do not necessarily bear any relationship to farm-gate prices. There is no reason to think that retailers in US border areas are not using milk as a loss-leader to build traffic.

Exchange rates: As mentioned above, retail and farm-gate prices are not necessarily related. In Ontario, our authority, the board's authority, for pricing only extends to the farm gate. In carrying out our responsibilities, the objective is to establish prices that provide fair returns for producers' labour, management and capital. Wholesale and retail prices are totally unregulated in Ontario.

If one looks back a few years to when the Canadian dollar was valued at 72 cents to 73 cents, US farm-gate prices for milk were virtually comparable to Canada. At those exchange rates, milk selling for US$12 per cwt, or hundredweight, equated to $37.85 per hectolitre Canadian—less than 4% below our class 5 price, and that is the price for milk being used to make butter and skim milk powder. The same US$12 per cwt translates to $31.67 per hectolitre at today's exchange rates. Relative to today's class 5 price, which has increased modestly, the difference is 25%. Long-term policies cannot react to short-term fluctuations in exchange rates. Exchange rates are crucial to the whole issue of cross-border shopping and exert tremendous pressure on the entire Canadian economy.

International competitiveness: Ever since Canada entered discussions with the US on so-called free trade, Canadians have been beleaguered with rhetoric about globalization and becoming internationally competitive. Global trade is a zero-sum game, meaning total imports globally equals total exports. If you have a positive trade balance, you are on the winning side; it means that some other country must have a negative trade balance.

Canada was internationally competitive. In 1985, Canada had a total merchandise trade surplus of more than $20 billion. Our surplus with the US alone was of the same magnitude. Between 1985 and 1989, the surplus has dropped to under $12 billion and the surplus with the US has declined in lockstep. Exports to the US have increased by 24%, roughly in line with inflation, while imports have increased by 42%.

Canada's monetary policy has meant that instead of exporting goods and products we are now exporting jobs and job opportunities. There is a tendency to look at details like tax structure, health care, subsidies and labour costs to rationalize differences. In theory, and usually in practice, exchange rates account for all of those factors.

If exchange rates are allowed to find their proper level, normal trade and structural adjustments will occur. Depending on the state of an industry, some goods will be less expensive in one country and others will be less expensive in the other. When a situation develops, or indeed is fostered, where all goods appear to be less expensive in one country, the other country, unfortunately Canada in this case, has serious problems. Consumers are not stupid; they will gravitate towards the lower prices. Not only do we lose Canadian purchases, we also lose a substantial American tourism that used to flow in our direction. What is happening at the consumer level is also happening at the industry level, and that ultimately is a much bigger problem.

Why exchange rates have drifted upwards is hard to rationalize. From a US perspective, it certainly has helped reduce their trade deficit. Is it the unwritten portion of the Canadian-US trade deal? One explanation has been that we need high interest rates to attract foreign capital. High interest rates appeal to currency investors and speculators. This country needs to attract investment in productive resources and that is not likely in an environment of decapitalization.

Canada's economic health depends on our ability to export. Until exchange rates fall back to where they belong, living and working in Canada is going to be a less happy experience.

Taxes are set and collected to pay for the services all enjoy as citizens of this country, from transportation, education, to health care, to garbage collection and public security. When Canadians go to the US to buy groceries, gasoline, electronic equipment or whatever, they are paying their share of the bill. Only two things can happen as a result of that; one is that the tax burden is shifted. Governments can increase existing taxes which they are loath to do, or charge the taxes in areas which are harder to avoid, such as property taxes. The second possibility is the ultimate outcome is that services will be reduced. These are tragic consequences.

The average Canadian has to be made to understand the effect of their actions. Canada, like any country, is a community of citizens where we all enjoy the benefits and similarly share the costs.

To that end, all applicable taxes, excise taxes and sales taxes—GST and provincial sales tax—should be collected. Furthermore, existing rules regarding duty-free opportunities—for example, being out of the country for 48 hours to bring back $100 worth of duty-free goods, unlimited, or being outside Canada for at least seven days to bring back $300 worth of goods, once per year—should be rigorously enforced.

These regulations did not change with the signing of the free trade agreement, although many Canadians have the perception of open borders. The only thing that has happened is the reduction of tariffs on some items. Other taxes still apply.

Along these lines, the British Columbia fast-lane experiment seems like abject nonsense, a carte blanche to smuggle, with the government turning a blind eye. If an honour system is going to be used, it has to be accompanied by an effective deterrent, including confiscation of goods not declared and/or the vehicle. If anything, we need fast lanes for American visitors. Every effort should be made to prevent further expansion of the fast-lane concept for returning Canadians. A fast lane for American visitors would make much more sense.

Dairy Farmers of Canada position: Dairy Farmers of Canada is our national organization that represents milk producers across the country. Independent of the broader implications, Dairy Farmers of Canada views effective border control on the importation of milk and dairy products as an essential element of national dairy policy. It is a federal area of responsibility, and if a key element of dairy policy cannot be fulfilled it places the entire policy in jeopardy.

While the importation of dairy products is administered through the import control list under the export and imports act, there is an exemption for milk and dairy products with a value of less than $20. Dairy Farmers of Canada believes that amending the exemption to require a stay outside of Canada of at least 48 hours would provide the authority to address the cross-border issue. Failing that, our government needs to look no further than the United States to find solutions. It is virtually impossible for US citizens to bring back milk or dairy products from Canada. If the will is there, it can be done.

While we believe the issues are separate, there is also a very close interrelationship. The dairy sector needs border controls to maintain the viability of national dairy policy and the dairy industry. However, as cross-border shopping increases and becomes more deeply entrenched as a way of life, the impact on the dairy sector grows proportionately.

The secondary effect of cross-border shopping is the reduction in domestic demand. Lost jobs in border communities and lower sales of Canadian products are just the beginning of a downward spiral.

It is our belief that the single biggest factor at play is the exchange rate. We have a situation that puts Canadian prices out of line with those of our major trading partner. Cross-border shopping is only one manifestation of the problem, the bigger issue is probably the erosion of Canada's ability to export and the attendant loss of jobs. Monetary policies, monetary in particular, aimed at fighting inflation may have been effective, but they have also had a devastating impact on the economy. Is this another example of the cure being worse than the disease?

Changing exchange rates is something only the federal government can do. Right now, the Americans are the main beneficiaries of Canadian largesse.

As a country, we have allowed our citizens to gain the perception of an open border and nobody wants to tell them it is not so or that if we want to maintain the integrity of the country, it cannot be so.

Exporting jobs instead of goods and a declining tax base can only move Canada in the direction of what some analysts describe as the process of becoming a third-world country.

There are those who would trivialize this issue. They are wrong. I do not envy you your task. Cross-border shopping is a very complex problem without obvious or easy solutions. While the exchange rate is a major underlying factor, all appropriate taxes and duties must be collected and existing laws on stays outside the country must be adhered to.

I cannot comment whether or not it is realistic to expect an education program to work, but legislators, bureaucrats and taxpayers need a better understanding of how public finance works. And journalists as well.

Let me conclude by remarking that cross-border shopping has already had a serious impact on Canada's dairy sector at both the producer and processor level. Unless the real problem is addressed, I have concerns about the potential for a dairy-specific solution. Let me assure you the dairy and dairy farmers will assist and co-operate in every way possible. Thank you for your attention and for creating the opportunity to express our concerns.

Just in closing, Claude Chartrand representing northern Ontario has some particular concerns about the Sault Ste Marie marketplace and he will just make a few comments in addition to mine.

Mr Chartrand: Representing northern Ontario poses some particular problems. I am sure your confrères have talked about distances in northern Ontario. To put that in perspective, I live some 350 miles from the closest border point on my own farm. That is roughly the same whether I am talking about Cornwall, Kingston, Niagara Falls or Sault Ste Marie and I am part of northern Ontario, 100 miles north of North Bay.

In Sault Ste Marie there has been a polarization of opinion as you are probably well aware between retailers, producers and consumers to some extent, to where we see a loss of between 30% and 40% of our milk sales there, and it is not just milk. You can imagine the effects on myself, for instance; I expect my gross income to decrease by 3% in the next year. You can imagine, as a resident of northern Ontario, this kind of effect. We know that you are going to have some very hard decisions to make about Sault Ste Marie, whether to pour in billions of dollars maybe to keep a seal plant, or the same amount of dollars will have to be there in welfare or some sort of social easing of the situation if unemployment gets worse. But it means that between 30% and 40% of Sault Ste Marie is not really part of the economy in northern Ontario. It is more part of the economy in the States because that is where they do their shopping, that is where they are paying their taxes in the major part. Whether we are talking about beer, liquor or cigarettes, provincial sales tax is not paid at the border and this is causing quite a polarizing of opinion. That is where the major part of discussion has been with producers at meetings in northern Ontario in the past week: about cross-border shopping and our decreased income and what we can do about it. I sure appreciate the opportunity to make these comments here, Mr Chairman.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. We fully agree with your statements, and that is why this committee was one of the first agenda items after setting up our preliminary budget report. We felt this was the most urgent matter that the province of Ontario had to be looking at next. We appreciate your input. Going through your brief, it is very informative. You are actually the first group that got here, one of the particular areas of milk.

We do have some questions from the committee and we have approximately 18 minutes until 11. We have another brief coming in and the bells will be ringing around 12 o'clock so we are going to have to cut that one short. We have to move on. If Mr Kwinter would ask one question; if he has another question, put up his hand again and we will try to rotate so that everybody has a chance.

Mr Kwinter: I have got a half-dozen questions.

The Vice-Chair: Oh, no, not section a, b, c and d, if you do not mind.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, seeing the constraints that you are putting on my questions, I have to pick out the one that I really want to talk about. I just have to take a second to see which. Let's talk about article XI.

When we talk about the import control act or the list, one of the problems, of course, is that the Canadian milk producers asked to have ice cream and yogurt put on the list. The Canadian government agreed, they put it on, it was challenged by the United States. It is my feeling that if that challenge succeeds we are really on the slippery slope to getting rid of supply management.

Regrettably—when I say this I am not trying to be partisan or political—after the Canadian delegation went to the GATT talks in Belgium and came back, I asked the minister in the House, given the fact that these talks had collapsed and article XI was not even addressed—he did not seem to know that—I said to him, “What are you going to do about it?” He said: “Well, we are happy with it. We are happy with article XI as it is. We have no real interest in strengthening it.” And that was that.

The question I have is what would you suggest should be done to try to make sure that we have a strong enough article XI to allow the milk producers to put products like ice cream and yogurt on it?

Mr Core: Dairy Farmers of Canada made a presentation to the federal minister a number of months ago. He said to us, “If we have to do something about article XI, what is it that needs to be done to it?”

We submitted a major presentation to him with the support of other supply management groups across Canada which became the fundamental position of the Canadian government in the current GATT discussions. The federal ministry has assured us, and our ongoing discussions with the trade negotiators have also shown, that they have been pushing very strongly on getting article XI clarified and strengthened so that it will be functional in the future.

Our position has always been, however, that if that is not achievable, then give us the other rights other countries have under the GATT agreement. We would be quite happy to have a waiver like the United States has, to be able to protect our borders with a waiver for dairy products or eggs or poultry or whatever. The Europeans have chosen to use variable import levies. Even though they are not allowed under GATT, they have been allowed to use them and if they become legitimate under the new GATT agreement, then we will use variable import levies.

The question is, with our trade agreement with the US, what impact might that have? We have simply said that if this GATT discussion is going to be about creating new rules of trade, we think that one of the new rules of trade should be article XI.

I had some representatives of Korean agriculture in my office recently and they commented that their government is very interested in pursuing article XI now. Some of the nordic countries are, and there is a line through the new emerging European position suggesting that they are giving more serious consideration to how article XI could be used for the kinds of programs that they want to use.

Mr Kwinter: In closing, may I make a suggestion that you meet with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. Explain it to him and take along some pictures and try to inform him as to the issues so that at least—

Mr Stockwell: Diagrams.

Mr Kwinter: —if he goes to a meeting he will know what he is talking about.

Mr B. Ward: I am a little bit troubled by some of your comments and I have a number of questions, but I will just ask one which troubles me the most.

In the discussion we have had not only on this issue but other issues on government involvement, etc, primarily from Conservatives, we have been led to believe that America is a free-enterprise system with as little government involvement as possible. According to some of your comments, the fact may not be true when it comes to the dairy industry.

I would like you to expand a little bit. I will not worry too much about the European Community because this is a cross-border shopping issue. Could you elaborate a little bit on the internal policies of the American government when it comes to the dairy industry? In fact, is it a free enterprise or is it government-supported, and to what degree?

Mr Core: Through Dairy Farmers of Canada, we conducted a major study through the firm of Grey, Clark, Shih & Associates in Ottawa on the level of hidden subsidization to the US dairy industry. The Americans have put in place a very, very expensive agricultural policy that is aimed at supporting their domestic agricultural industry. We went through, I cannot remember the number of programs that are documented, but it was well over 100 different programs that indirectly give support to the US farmer, be it dairy farmer or grain farmer, it does not matter. We went through them and then proportioned that against the dairy industry.

There are programs such as the export enhancement program, which the government uses to subsidize the export of surplus products out of the United States; the food stamp program, where they subsidize the use of food products to their domestic population that require food stamps; the grain program that we mentioned, feed grain set-aside program—they have a massive conservation set-aside program where farmers are being paid to take land out of production for conservation purposes. The federal irrigation water scheme in the United States is a federal program which highly subsidizes the value of irrigated water for farmers throughout the southern United States.

When you take all of those programs, the closest you could come in proportioning those out to the dairy sector in the United States was that it represents a value of 12 to 13 cents a litre to the US farmer in hidden support. It is not money that may directly appear on his income statement but it has lowered his costs or given him other sources of income. So that is 12 to 13 cents, which is about 30% of the price they receive for milk at the farm gate in the United States.

In Canada we are not clean in this situation. There are supports to agriculture in Canada as well. The only direct one is the national dairy subsidy program in Canada which accounts for about 6% to 7% of our producer income, nowhere near the high level of subsidization in the United States.

The United States is not a free trader in agricultural commodities, it never has been and it never will be. They have no intention of being that. However, they have the intention of creating rules which they hope may give them some advantage in trading with other parts of the world.

I was in Washington a year and a half ago at the Outlook conference and heard Clayton Yeutter say: “I don’t know why our domestic producers are so concerned that we are going to dismantle our domestic support for agriculture. We have no intention of doing that. We are simply going to lower the export enhancement program of ours and other countries.”

It is not a level playing field. You can take away export subsidies and that does not create a level playing field. The ted States has a very protectionist dairy industry. In , right now the organization that represents dairy producers in the United States is lobbying intensely against President Bush's request to extend the trade negotiations another two years because they do not want to lose the protection they now have under their waiver, and they are afraid that a positive GATT round would eliminate that waiver and then they would have to use something like article XI, which they do not want to do.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you. I am shocked, Mr Chairman, that America is not the bastion of free enterprise I thought it was.

The Vice-Chair: I can see that on your face.

Mr B. Ward: All these years I have been misled by Conservatives.

The Vice-Chair: That was a very good answer, really. It is going in Hansard so that we have a copy so that we can exchange it with other members.

Mr Sutherland: You talked a little bit about a drop in market share quota, what it would result in, the number of farmers being lost and the number of dollars being lost. I said you first highlighted the problem in 1986. Do you have an estimate since 1986 of how many dairy farmers have gone out of business and how much money that has meant in losses to the Ontario economy?

Mr Core: Not specifically, because part of our frustration has been that the federal government's studies on the St. Lawrence cross-border issue have never been released. The numbers for other border crossings, as I say, the minister has not released them. So we have not been able to quantify specifically what the impact was, but I have no reason to believe the numbers from BC, for instance, are not reflective of that province. I know the border crossings in the city of Sarnia, where I reside; my father recently talked to the supervisor of customs there. The number of declarations at the border has just risen far more dramatically even than some of the numbers appear in this document.

The Vice-Chair: If the rest of the committee does not mind, to get to the third party—Mr Stockwell is two more minutes—but is it all right if I skip ahead so we get the viewpoints from the third party also?

Mr Stockwell: Thank you, Mr Chairman. You talked at great length and made a lot of emphasis about the exchange rate. You know I have always had a difficult time understanding or at least accepting the exchange rate argument. You have a 15-cent break now. What do you want, 25 cents?

Mr Core: If you do not mind, Mr Chairman, I will ask Mr Gould to respond to the question. Peter?

Mr Gould: I guess we are trying to suggest that the exchange rate should find a level that makes goods produced in Canada competitive with its main trading partner.

Mr Stockwell: What is that rate? That is what I am asking.

Mr Gould: I would suspect something in the order of 75 cents Canadian relative to the US dollar would be adequate. What we are doing through our various policies is inflating the value of the Canadian dollar which, all other things considered, makes goods produced in Canada uncompetitive with those in the United States. It is as simple as that.

Mr Stockwell: But the argument is made that you have a 15-cent break now, and you are saying that to be competitive you need a 25-cent break?

Mr Gould: It is not a break. Exchange rates take all the factors given in the economy irrespective of what they are, you know, health care, different tax structures, all those sorts of things. If you are going to produce steel or forest products or high technology products, this is the exchange rate that allows you to compete. If you allow that exchange rate to drift upwards for what I would argue are non-economic reasons or for artificial reasons, you are putting your economy out of line with that of your major trading partners. As we tried to illustrate in the presentation, if you go back not too many years—and it is even true today, we still are competitive—if you have a positive trade balance you are competitive, but by losing that competitiveness your relative position deteriorates and that is the process we are in right now.

Mr Jamison: You mentioned access a little earlier on and how under some GATT decisions made back in the 1950s certain commodities—we became restricted in our ability to have even that so-called free trade situation developed, especially for certain areas. I wonder if you could expand on that a little further for me so that the committee here would have an understanding of that particular concern.

Mr Core: That reference was to a special waiver the United States achieved under the GATT rules which allowed it to practise certain protectionist policies. They are allowed to address that to the dairy industry, the sugar industry, I believe, as well as some very restrictive import restrictions in the US because GATT is all about opening up trade. The Americans said they were going to pull out of the system unless they achieved this waiver after substantial lobbying within the US and they were given this temporary waiver which is still in place today.

That is just an example of the kinds of things that have happened under GATT that we hoped this Uruguay round would sort out. We have been supportive of GATT discussions, of trying to get the same fair rules of trade for all the partners in GATT and do away with special exemptions. That is what the GATT negotiations are about. They are creating the rules of trade. We simply feel that article XI, for example, is that if a country does want to practise a domestically oriented policy towards particular agricultural commodities—and all countries have particular commodities they want to do that with—then we should all play by the same rules. We feel with a rule like article XI, for example, it may evolve.

Just as an example, you may not realize it but the total imports of products into the Canadian dairy industry, if you take our total marketplace, somewhat slightly over 3% of our total dairy consumption is imported product, be it cheese, yoghurt, ice cream or whatever. The total imported product into the United States is below that and the total imported product into the EC is even less than the Americans'.

So we are practising supply management, domestically oriented policy, but because we are obeying the rules, we are allowing more access to our market than other countries which accuse us of being too protectionist. That is what really infuriates us. Canada is pointed at in dairy and supply management as being protectionist and something that has to be changed, whereas those other countries, the Europeans and the Americans, are even more protectionist than we are. We think if we all played by the same rules, all of us would be further ahead in a more stable dairy industry.

The dairy industry around the world is a domestically oriented industry only if you take all the global trade and dairy products. The last figures I saw would indicate that between 7% and 9% of dairy products trade globally, which is a very small percentage of the total marketplace. Most dairy industries in most countries are domestically oriented because they are fresh products, they are perishable and countries view dairy industries as being a fundamental part of their food policies in most cases.

Mrs Sullivan: I was very interested in your remarks earlier on subsidies. I wanted to ask another question which relates to some of the information that is being put before the committee from other groups in different industries and sectors, and that relates to the role of the distributor or the processor in the pricing of the product. You have alluded in your statement to the retail prices being quite different from the farm-gate price. I wonder if you would comment on what the difference in the add-ons through the processing and distribution would be in Ontario in comparison to comparable areas in the States.

Mr Core: In the National Dairy Task Force, which I am a member of, we try to quantify those. It was almost impossible to do it at the retail level. They did some studies at the processing level and found that the margins—I do not mean profit margins, I mean cost margins—the cost margins of Ontario processors were somewhat higher in the United States. They identified two main causes of that, one being the fact that plants in the US have rationalized to a large extent, and their through-put or utilization is significantly higher than that of Canadian plants because we are still going through some consolidation and rationalization of processing plants. The other factor is the size of the plants. Just the physical size of processing plants lends some efficiencies. The US market is 10 times bigger than ours and it is logical that they are just going to be bigger.

So the indication was that there are some marginally higher costs on the processing margin, but they are explainable. It is hard to quantify retail prices because retail prices, so much in some products, are loss leaders: 2% milk in Ontario is a loss leader and it fluctuates all the time depending on what the pricing practices of the retail stores are. As well, butter falls into that category quite frequently. So we do not have evidence of information on retail markups.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Smith, I believe you want to make a comment on Mr Jamison's question. I sort of cut off and went on to the next question.

Mr Smith: Thank you, Mr Chairman. It was just a further clarification on waiver 22. This was given to the US to have it agree to join in the current round. It covers dairy products, cotton products, sugar products and edible oil products including peanuts, so it was a very widespread exemption from the GATT rules in that area. I just thought the committee should be aware of the magnitude of waiver 22.

The Vice-Chair: I want to thank you for appearing before us. It was very informative. This is what we need in order to come to some conclusions to end this problem with cross-border shopping.

Mr Core: If there is anything further that people would like to have information from us on, we encourage you to call us and we would be happy to co-operate with you. Thank you very much for this opportunity.

ONTARIO BORDER COMMUNITIES TASK FORCE ON CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

The Vice-Chair: Welcome again to the standing committee on finance and economics. I am glad to see you back again. You appeared before this committee on pre-budget consultation. It was very informative. This is one of the areas that we feel is very important to Ontario right now, cross-border shopping. I see by the families that everybody seems to be coming from the border towns there.

Would you please identify yourselves from the left so that we can get the right so we all know who you are.

Mr Commisso: Tony Commisso. I am from St Catharines, and I am representing the St Catharines chamber of Commerce and Shop Ontario.

Ms Logan: Gail Logan, general manager with Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce.

Mr McCartney: I am Gerry McCartney with Sarnia-Lambton Chamber of Commerce.

Mr Jacques: I am Mark Jacques, the executive director of the Windsor Chamber of Commerce.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. If you could present your brief here now to us.

Ms Logan: Thank you. The Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping is very pleased to meet with your committee regarding the complex issue of cross-border shopping and its impact on government, business and residents of Ontario.

The task force has representation from Cornwall, Frontenac, Erie, Niagara Falls, Kingston, Port Colborne, St Catharines, Sarnia, Sault Ste Marie, Thunder Bay, Welland and Windsor.

As you will recall, our task force presented a brief to the finance committee at the end of January and provided background information on the issue and recommendations for the provincial government to consider relative to taxation policy. The recommendations are as follows: that the Ontario government immediately reduce the provincial on gasoline, based on a zoning formula; that the Ontario government negotiate with the federal government to reduce the federal tax on gasoline, based on a zoning formula; that the Ontario government negotiate with the federal government the implementation of a cost-effective system to collect provincial sales tax on declared goods entering Ontario at border entry points.

Our purpose in meeting with you today is to provide you with an up-to-date situation analysis regarding the facts of this issue. We will also provide information on programs and activities currently being implemented in border communities throughout the province as well as recommendations for action. A number of representatives from our task force are in attendance today, and we are very eager to share our thoughts and concerns with you. We would also be happy to explain in greater detail specific programs that are under way in each of our communities.

Regarding the facts, the traffic count of same-day visits from Ontario has gone from a net inflow in the second quarter of 1987 of 1.4 million people to a net outflow of 1.5 million people in the second quarter of 1990. The number of people making same-day trips to the United States from Ontario continued to increase by 30% in 1990, and it is anticipated that 1991 will show the same or an even greater increase.

Estimates of lost retail sales for 1991 in Ontario are expected to be in excess of $1 billion, which represents an approximate loss of $80 million in sales tax revenue to the province. An economic impact model used by Ernst & Young in their study of the economic impact of cross-border shopping on the city of Sault Ste Marie determined that for every $1 million in expenditure leakage to the United States from Sault Ste Marie, Ontario, 7.2 jobs are lost in the community. This results in lost income taxes, lost municipal taxes, and increased burden on municipally, provincially and federally sponsored social programs.

Ontario consumers are making significant purchases in the United States of gasoline, groceries, liquor, beer and cigarettes, along with the big ticket items such as automobiles and boats, building supplies, clothing, linens—the list goes on.

Ontario border communities are showing severe signs of depression as retail and service sector businesses are closing at an alarming rate. There has also been a sharp decline in US tourists visiting Ontario during the past two years. Many reasons have been cited; however, the most frequent reason given is the high cost of gasoline, meals and beverages, all items which are subject to considerable increases.

Ontario businesses are currently on an 8% price disadvantage with their US counterparts as provincial sales taxes are not collected on goods entering Canada at border crossing points. Retail pricing differences on gasoline in border cities throughout Ontario appear to vary only by a few pennies per litre; however, the difference in price between Ontario and the US is approximately 17 cents per litre, the majority of which is provincial and federal taxes. Border communities in Ontario have lost gasoline sales in excess of 295 million litres annually and as a result the province of Ontario has lost almost $34 million in tax revenue.

It is estimated that the province of Ontario will lose in excess of $114 million in tax revenue for 1991 as a direct result of cross-border shopping, a problem which will continue to increase unless government immediately addresses this issue. Mayors of Ontario border communities met recently to discuss this issue and have formed a task force to address the problem.

Regarding situation analysis, the following information has been provided by the communities of Kingston, the Niagara region, Sarnia and Sault Ste Marie. You will also find, attached to the brief, information from Windsor, which Mr Jacques from Windsor will present.

For Kingston, available evidence is largely anecdotal to date. However, there have been well-publicized stories of long lineups of cars full of Canadian shoppers at the Lansdown border crossing returning from the Salmon Run Mall in Watertown, New York. As well, a large percentage of Canadian cars has been observed in the parking lot at this US mall. The recession and international competition have had a negative impact on local retail sales, causing a number of store closures.

What is Kingston doing and what are the results? The Kingston District Chamber of Commerce, with the assistance and support of the downtown Kingston business improvement area, the Kingston Area Economic Development Commission and area businesses, has engaged the national consulting firm of Ernst & Young to conduct a study to assess the impact of cross-border shopping on the local economy. The study will be completed at the end of April and an action plan that will consist of program and policy initiatives will follow.

Kingston is recommending the following:

Awareness campaigns calling for consumer patriotism are an inappropriate measure that only serve to publicize the perception that all things are cheaper in the United States. Canadian consumers deserve competitive prices. We must learn if indeed prices are lower in the US, or on what types of goods prices are lower. Then we must learn why, get competitive and change things. We must deliver lower prices or lose our retail industry.

At this point I would like to turn it over to the various individuals who are represented here today and ask them to comment on each of their areas.

Mr Commisso: Mr Chairman, members of the committee, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to make our presentation this morning. Once again, I would like to restate the estimates of over $1 billion in purchases by Canadian consumers across the border in the US. Niagara region's share of this we estimate to be about $150 million. It appears there has been about a 20% increase over the previous year. The statistics on same-day visits to US from Ontario since 1986 have increased: 1986-87 by 12%; 1987-88 by 22%; 1988-89 by 27%; and 1989-90 by 26%. The alarming part of this whole thing is that there is a steady increase. There is absolutely no sign of reduction in this phenomenon, and unless something is done about it, we feel these figures will continue to increase.

The impact of this on local retailers has been quite staggering. The tax structure at all levels is very much higher in Ontario than in the United States. This creates increased costs for retailers to their consumers and lessens their competitiveness. Introduction of market value assessment will only escalate this problem, as the retail sector will be hardest hit by increases in real estate taxes. Taxes on beer, alcohol and cigarettes in Ontario have had an effect of doubling the costs of these products to Ontario consumers.

Many people in border communities are buying these products in the US and importing them without paying duties and taxes. In cases where taxes are paid, only federal taxes are collected at the border. Gas taxes in Ontario are double those in the US; consequently, many motorists fill up their tanks in the US at a much lower cost.

Supply management of many agricultural products also adds to costs of products in Canada; for example, eggs, which carry a marketing board fee of 17 cents a dozen. Also poultry, where quotas are set at much lower levels than we can consume in Ontario, thereby forcing us to import poultry from Manitoba and Quebec, not allowing us to take advantage of economies of mass production. Dairy products are also controlled by dairy boards. I do not want to go too deeply into that because the Ontario Milk Marketing Board was here just before me and I am sure they have explained the dilemma of US subsidies and other factors that impact on the cost of milk in Ontario.

Much of the media coverage of cross-border shopping is based on sensationalism, not fact. Many items have been compared by various retailers, and although some items are cheaper in the US, there are a similar number of goods that are cheaper in Canada. Several grocery surveys showed a similar number of products being lower in Ontario than in the US. An average shopping basket of grocery and drug products showed total costs as being lower in Ontario.

Recent television coverage showed people purchasing video games in the US, and claimed that they were half the price of those in Canada. There have been many reports to the contrary. In recent promotions, many Canadian retailers have been selling these same video games lower than they are in the US.

Good marketing practices by businesses in the US have helped to draw Canadians across the border to buy their products. Ontario border communities have been flooded with advertising of all kinds. There have been no co-ordinated efforts on the Canadian side to increase the number of Americans who shop in Ontario, or try to counter some of the American advertising to keep Canadians at home.

My recommendations are as follows:

First, a comprehensive study is required. The first thing that should be done about this problem is to gather all the necessary information in order to make proper government policy and marketing decisions. All major product categories should be compared and the cost structures analysed. Also, what are the reasons that people shop in the US? If we can gather this information we can start to address the problem on a more comprehensive manner.

The second recommendation is that a retail support mechanism is required. The retail sector in Canada has no formal support mechanism as do the tourism industry and the manufacturing industry. New York state has a business development office that works with the retail industry to develop this economic sector. Such a mechanism should be structured in Ontario to co-ordinate the efforts of government and business in dealing with international trade issues.

My third recommendation: a reduction in the gasoline taxes at border cities is required.

Fourth, Canada Customs must increase their workforce to ensure adequate inspection of vehicles returning to Canada.

Fifth, provincial sales taxes must be collected on goods entering Canada at all Ontario border country points.

Sixth, government should develop a subtle awareness program to inform consumers about the reasons for differences in price between Canada and United States and the distribution of taxes that are applied; eg health benefits, workers' compensation and unemployment insurance.

I would just like to outline a few things that we have been working on in our community. We have been trying to gather together all the retail organizations in the Niagara region to put on a co-ordinated marketing effort to counter the US advertising that is inundating our area every week. We have a lot of good plans, although it takes time to develop them without the assistance of the various agencies which I have recommended be put in place to help co-ordinate all these actions. So I guess in order for our community to continue to fight this struggle we need the support of the government agencies to assist us in any way possible.

I would like to turn this over to Samia to give the portion.

Mr McCartney: Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I again thank you for allowing us this opportunity today. I am not going to give you a bunch of statistics. I am sure you have had a million of them already. What I would like to try and convince you of is the problem that we have because we are on the front line. It hurts and it hurts a lot. We are losing jobs. You can read the numbers. We have a really odd traffic-flow situation where we were up 30% one time and now we are down 35%. That represents a multimillion transfer of bodies going out of the country instead of coming in and you know what the impact is economically.

We think—and please correct me if we are wrong—that the governments, both federal and provincial, obviously are having a difficult time with this because it is not an easy problem to address and it is very complex. The shopping buggy comparison thing that we see in every newspaper in the country is so easy it is almost elementary but it does not serve, it does not really get to the root of the problem.

What I would suggest to you and what I would hope you would listen to today is that the problem in border communities is not unique to border communities. The simple math that I know tells me that 80% of us, of Canadians, live on or near the border of the United States of America.

ronto—I think your own papers delivered some information a couple of weeks ago that indicates that the city of Toronto itself lost $240 million in retail sales to Buffalo, New York, unless the Niagara Escarpment had a sudden shift in the last couple of weeks, Toronto, as I remember, was not at the border. That is the most vivid example I can give you. It hurts all of us, so please try not to look at us as if we are isolated, as if it is only going to be a problem for Windsor, Sault Ste Marie, etc.

Currently, the bigger part of the problem in my view—and I am saying this only because I am in front of you today; if I were in front of a federal commission, I would name the provincial government—but we think the larger problem is the feds, quite frankly. The collection at border crossings is under their jurisdiction and we understand that. As we sit here and remind you that you are losing your 8% PST by not collecting it, clearly the feds are losing their 7% GST plus the various duties by not collecting at the border crossings.

So we have this huge problem and you are the losers along with us. I think the point that we could make most emphatically is that we are all in this together. It is not the retailers, it is not the chambers of commerce or the mayors, it is you and I and the province of Ontario that are losing this money in big gobs, and it hurts.

We have had examples, and, yes, we have a number of initiatives in our community and we think we have a responsibility, as do the mayors, as do the federal government and yourselves, to put programs on the table that educate and make people aware. But it is this euphoria that is growing by leaps and bounds every day that suggests to the average consumer—and you had some marketing people in front of you a moment ago. A year ago, the problem was only gas and eggs and milk and chicken and dairy products and so forth; and by and large that was true, and every once in a while, there would be an incidental purchase of a pair of shoes, a T-shirt or an appliance. It is not like that today.

I can tell you, and I invite any of you to come down to a border crossing and look at the enormous quantity of goods that come back that are far beyond those parameters now. In fact, the whole field has opened up and the common perception is that if those things are cheaper and I can buy my booze and cigarettes and gas etc, it must be that everything is cheaper over there. You heard about some US leader advertising that the Americans are very good at serving their consumers, with no disrespect, are a little bit naïve in that regard, and they assume that if milk is 99 cents in Port Huron or Sault Ste Marie or Windsor, because of their loss leader approach, it must be that way every day of the week. In fact it is not, and we all know that.

Where we need your help is (a) to understand what the problem is and (b) to recognize that it is your problem too and that we are losing millions and millions of dollars in our tax revenues. I am afraid the situation is going to get worse before it gets better. If you have studied the American marketplace and know who the big kings are as far as retail is concerned, I can tell you without exception that at one border community in Ontario will not have a Wal-Mart in it within the next year. Wal-Mart is the king. They knocked off Sears, they knocked off K mart and they are going to knock us off too.

Have any of you—and I know probably few of you have ever tripped to the United States for your vacation—noticed the propensity for growth in the area of factory outlet malls? You know what they are. It is big business. I will also guarantee you that there will not be one border community in this room or any other in Ontario that will not have a significant factory outlet mall across the border.

If you want to talk countervail and dumping, I have been told by the vice-president of the second-largest retail firm in the United States that they now, in their marketing plans, through their buying offices, are targeting border communities. God bless these guys. They are really good merchants, you know. They are targeting the border communities for dumping all their second-class, lower-end, scratch-and-dent type goods because those dumb Canadians are going to come over and buy them in spades every day. That hurts, that really hurts. But you are hurting too.

I would ask for some help. We will do our part. I think we can educate our retailers, I think we will try to educate the consumers and Lord knows we are all trying to educate our mayors. If we can do that effectively, then you need to help us in some regard as well, because it is partly your responsibility. I will remind Mr Kwinter, whom I had as a guest for lunch a year and a half ago, that the very restaurant we dined in, which was on the border, which we are very close to, is no longer there. Five gas stations that were in our community a week and one half ago are not there, and two tire companies, very significant, large ones which used to do a lot of international business, are not there.

One of the things, if I could ask you to transfer this message to the Minister of the Environment, is it would be so much easier for the tire companies in Ontario to swallow the $5 in-out tax on used and new tires if they could say to the consumer, "I know it hurts, and I know you've got this price to pay, but look at the effect it is having on our environment, look at the positive things that are happening as a result of this tire tax." But they cannot say that and we all know it.

So if we are going to have these taxes that are unusual and extraordinary, let us for God's sake please do something with them so that they are creatively and constructively handled and we can then say to our consumer, "At least you're getting this benefit out of it." Right now they say, "Where's the benefit?" Accordingly, the people who want to buy tires, which is a multibillion-dollar industry in this country are going guess where? Thank you very much for your attention.

Mr Jacques: I am going to describe the Windsor situation, which probably is a unique community because of the size of the border community which it borders on, but I am not going to describe also my presentation. Unfortunately, it did not get included in the rest, due to some time constraints, and I am not going to read it. What we have developed, and I think has developed in every community, is more than a one-stage strategy in terms of lobbying for government support. We have also always taken the initiative that there are some things that businesses have to do, that our communities have to get involved in, and each one of us here today, and all the other border communities which we represent, I would suggest, have taken an initiative, are working very diligently within their communities. In fact, I know that you have a piece that was just passed around here. That is the type of thing that is happening in every community across the country—at least across the province—some more advanced than others.

What I do want to stress is that it is not just a border region problem, that it is not a business problem, that it is all our problem. We have described for you—the last page of my presentation talks about focus of government contacts—the need to create a more level playing field. We are going to have to do some things as chambers to help our businesses become better marketers or to find their product at a reduced price so that they can merchandise it properly.

But generally, we have not distinguished our approach to you from that which we are making to any other group which has a vested interest in this. What we are saying specifically is that there are some issues that are related to the federal government, there are issues that are related—and some of these things are described here—to the provincial government, they are related to municipalities, they are also related to businesses as a whole. There are some, I might add, that have to be addressed at the consumer level.

One of the things that I have to do, and we were talking about it briefly before the meeting here, is get across the understanding that it is more than the economic impact directly related to retail sales, job losses, the tax collection and associated duties. What it affects is deeper than that. It is things like our charitable organizations because there are organizations that give significant contributions from a corporate level, their employees do. If we have job losses there, we have also a significant reduction in those charitable contributions that go to communities, that help communities thrive and support the mechanisms that are provided to them by the provincial, federal and municipal governments.

Things like amateur sport sponsorships within communities—if you do an estimate, and I think one of the communities here did a quick survey of people around the retail task force committee. What was that Gerry?

Mr McCartney: It was $475,000.

Mr Jacques: It was $475,000 that just their group had contributed to amateur sport sponsorships within the community. When those go down the drain, the burden comes back somewhere. Somebody has to fund it or we lose those services. If I could add anything, because I really do not want to read the reports—you can do that yourself—the statistics are staggering. What we have to do is recognize that it is a national, provincial and municipal—and it goes down to the individual level—concern. Anything that we can provide you with to help you in your assessment and developing plans to address it, I would be most pleased to share with you.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. We have got just until 12 o'clock. When the bells ring we will be leaving. It is a point that we have all got to vote in the House. So if you see us all taking off when the bells ring, that is the end of the question period.

I appreciate your comments. I had brought that up earlier, that a lot of people do not realize the charitable work that goes on. It could be, say, Tim Horton's baseball team etc. The handout that just came around is something I just put together. "To Shop Ontario" does not come on the editorial page with the letters to the editor.

But the one thing I have seen now is that people in the Niagara area are taking a look at the problem that is creating with stores closing. The store down the street where someone was used to shopping at is no longer there. They either have to drive a little bit farther or they just do not have the selection any longer. Representing a rural area like Lincoln, I can see if the small hardware store in the country closes up, then somebody has got to drive to town. If they do not have the selection there, they have to go to another store. It is very important. The business community is part of the community and we cannot lose any part of that particular community.

Okay, I am the Chairman. I am not supposed to be making all these comments and we have got quite a few questions here. Mr Ward.

Mr B. Ward: Just one question each again, Mr Chairman?

The Vice-Chair: Yes, one question each and then we will put your name back on the list if—

Mr B. Ward: If we have time.

The Vice-Chair: —if we have time, yes.

Mr B. Ward: The one I would like you to expand on and I really do not think it has been looked at in great detail that I can find yet, is the concept of an easing of the gasoline tax and a phased system or a zoned system. What I cannot rationalize in my mind is how do you justify a lower gas tax and where do you draw the line. Have you given some thought as a group on how these lines should be drawn, how these zones should be formulated? As an example of my concern for this system—and perhaps you could even elaborate on this as well—if you take Brantford as a zone that would have less gasoline tax, Burford is just outside Brantford. Would they be included, and if they are what about Cathcart, which is just beyond? And if they are not, how do you justify to the people in Burford that gasoline is cheaper in Brantford than it is in Burford, which is just outside the community?

Mr McCartney: The short answer is you do not know. These lines are very arbitrary no matter who selects them and no one is going to be 100% correct. Follow the theory though, if you will, that regardless of the increment whether it is 10 kilometres, 20 kilometres, that really is irrelevant; the point is that if one goes from zone 5—and let's say, for argument's sake, there were five zones created, each one with a 1-cent difference—is it going to be that much of a problem for the individual who lives, say, in a fictitious zone 6, is he or she going to make the trip to zone 5 for 1 cent a litre? Will 5 go to 4 for 1 cent per litre?

Mr B. Ward: Is that what you are suggesting, that the zones be 1 cent?

Mr McCartney: Exactly. Now in a perfect world what we would like to see is 1 cent per litre from the fed-cent per litre from the province. If you had 5 cents that the federal government was forgiving in the border communities, and 5 cents that the provincial government was forgiving, you end up with a dime per litre. A dime per litre is fairly significant. I can tell you that most people in my community, and I think it would be true in most, if you took 10 cents a litre off their cost—and that is at the heart of the border; it is only 9 cents at 40 kilometres out and 8 cents and so forth—you would probably prevent about 50% of the people who use gas as the trigger mechanism for going across the border from going over there because it turns out to be about a buck and a half a tank savings at yesterday's prices. No, it went down two. At last week's prices you would save a buck and a half. Big deal. I tell you, I will not sit on that bridge or anybody's bridge for a buck and a half. To save that is not worth my time, and I do not think it is worth most people's time.

So you follow the theory? And no line is going to be correct.

Mr B. Ward: Yes, I understand the theory. So you are suggesting 40 kilometres, is that what you said?

Ms Logan: In our last recommendation, if you recall, we looked at 10-kilometre increments and I believe the recommendation was for a 50-kilometre maximum. We were looking at a 2-cent graduated reduction.

Mr B. Ward: A penny from the province and a penny from the feds.

Ms Logan: Matching contributions.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, can I ask your indulgence to get a clarification?

The Vice-Chair: Supplementary.

Mr Kwinter: No, not a sup; I just want to get a clarification, but I do not want to consider it as my question.

The Vice-Chair: Is this your first question, to me? Next. Sorry, Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: There is something here that puzzles me, and it is totally contrary to what you are talking about and what you are trying to do. On page 12 it says that, "Sault Ste Marie, Michigan residents who traditionally have lived in friendly harmony with their Ontario counterparts are currently expressing strong anti-Canadian sentiment as a result of the increased shopping in their community," which I just cannot understand. Your whole argument is you want people to shop in your community, you want to get Americans shopping here. Why are they unhappy because we are going there? You would think they would be ecstatic.

Mr McCartney: That depends, I would think, whom you ask. I would suggest that if you asked American retailers, they are ecstatic. The other consumers—you see, with access comes problems—volume, parking, all those good things. I will take that problem any day of the week, frankly, but they are experiencing problems in the smaller communities. Pine Grove Street in Port Huron used to be a quiet, sleepy little street that sort of went nowhere. It was the way to go downtown and another way to follow the lake. It now has 37 gas stations in about six blocks and 82% of their volume comes from good old Canada. It becomes Gasoline Alley. Socially, the people of those communities are experiencing these things that come along with success, and to that, I say, "Gee, that's too bad."

Mr Kwinter: Okay, now, if I can ask my real question.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, we will allow this one.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to hear from any of the members as to just how much in-depth analysis has been done about this issue of gasoline. I have a feeling that gasoline is a problem, a highly visible problem, because everybody can identify it. As I have said before, I know that at times when I was the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations people would drive five miles to save a penny, because that is the way they are. But generally speaking, and I would like to get your comment, I would submit that if gas prices were equal and everything else was not equal, you would have the same problem.

If you take a look at the recommendations that came out of Kingston, on page 6, I think that is the problem: "We must learn if indeed prices are lower in the US, or on what types of goods are prices lower. Then we must learn why, get competitive and change things. We must deliver lower prices or lose our retail industry." I submit to you that other than the problem of your absolute border communities—and Gerry, I am talking about the core of Windsor—yes, it may make sense to go across the border.

The people from Oakville, Burlington and Hamilton are not going to drive across the border to save money on gas, but we have seen statistics to show that people are going from Thunder Bay. Surely it is not gasoline that is attracting them from Thunder Bay. It is 200 miles from the border, so there are no benefits other than the very short term of that one tank that you are going to get. There is no one crazy enough to drive 200 miles to save some money on gasoline, and yet it is a problem. I understand it is a problem, but I am a little disturbed that the main emphasis seems to be on gasoline, that if we can only deal with the gasoline problem we have gone a long way to solving our problem. I think the problem is a lot deeper than that, a lot broader than that.

Mr Jacques: If I might respond, the concern in Thunder Bay is a little bit different than those communities where it is a very short trip. There are more one-day trips, where you go and make the major purchase of gasoline, where you save significantly, and then make the other associated retail purchases. What we are expressing, though, is still consistent with what Kingston is saying: that we have to find the prices that are different and then make some changes. What we are suggesting is that is one of those prices that makes it so different, makes us uncompetitive on that one issue alone, and then people start to assume.

One of the campaigns we are suggesting is that people have to start thinking twice about what they are doing. They do not always compare prices properly. If they look at the gasoline difference and then they assume that they have saved $8 or $10 a tank on their gas, they will say: "I have a net savings now. I'll just do a few more things while I am over here." Because in many cases—and the union president stated this in the media the other day—they wave through consistently at least 60% of the cars that go through with goods. There is the net saving. That is when you start resulting in some saving. The gasoline is the trigger.

One of the communities I know along our borders has done a study. A couple of them also have found out that gasoline was the number one trigger mechanism for people going across the border; and that is why we are so adamant on this one thing. It does create a significant savings factor. Nobody is going to deny that. When you are in Windsor, when you are in Sarnia and you only have to drive 10 or 15 minutes at the most to save yourself $10, $12, $15, whatever it is on a tank of gas, you may make that trip because you are going to do the rest of your shopping somewhere in the States, assuming that you think everything else is cheaper on the other side. So if we can get them not to make the initial step to cross the border, then perhaps they will investigate other opportunities locally in their retail bargains.

Mr Sutherland: When I look through the report, I see what Kingston says, that it is solely prices. Then I look and see what came out of the study in Niagara Falls, which says a basket of groceries—not milk, but a basket of groceries—actually was cheaper here. Then I look and see what Sault Ste Marie has done with a specialized advertising campaign that indicates that it had some success in terms of—

Ms Logan: Very moderate success, very limited success.

Mr Sutherland: Limited success at its Christmas sales. It leads me to wonder, though. Then the real question is: We are not always getting the message out to the people that in many ways it is not cheaper to go across the border for everything. In areas where we can help the situation, we need to be doing a little more in terms of advertising and promotion.

None of you is from Kingston, but it is interesting, the thing about the prices. What do you do when you look at agricultural products? Quite frankly, South Carolina, in the southern states, has a warmer climate. They do not have the energy and heating costs. How are you ever going to balance out those costs?

Mr McCartney: You are not. There are some real simple mathematics at work here. We have this climate problem, we know that. The old studies that were done by the former government indicated that the main commodities that were being declared—that is the operative word, “declared”—coming across the borders, were all things that had that common denominator, such as marketing boards. Whether it was the milk, the cheese, the chicken, the eggs, the beer, the cigarettes, etc, they all had a board attached to them.

I do not think we are going to solve those things. I think we understand who we are as a country. The very simplest mathematical equation that we all need to understand is they have got 300 million people, we have got 27 million people, who the heck is going to manufacture goods cheaper? Of course, they are.

Mr Sutherland: So what you are saying then is we really have to be willing to pay the price to be Canadians?

Mr McCartney: You are going to have to pay it some degree, but I do not suggest that we are ever going to get a level playing field. I mean, here we sit, and we do this every day of our lives, on the border of the largest economic jurisdiction in the world, and we think we are going to be even and competitive with them? That is not realistic, but there are ways that we can be a little better than we are. But everybody has got to play the game. We cannot be just the retailer, just the consumer, just the chambers of commerce; it needs to be you too, as well as the federal government, if we are going to give ourselves a chance. Otherwise the little holes in the sieve are getting larger and larger. What will you do—I challenge you to this question—to recoup the $80 million from your lost revenue that you did not collect?

The argument about the gas thing is really moot, because you have not got it to start with, and we forget that. You have not got it; it is over there. Now, how can we work together to get it back, or get some of it back? But we create a level playing field in a perfect world so that we are competitive with them, nose to nose, item for item, never going to happen.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the thoughtful presentation. The earlier presentation I thought had a really good line it from the marketing board people. It was talking about cross-border shopping and said: “It is the current issue. It is the most obvious manifestation of some very fundamental problems in the country.”

I guess the best analogy I can draw for us all is that we think we are into a major, major battle, and you people are kind of fighting the first of the skirmishes, kind of hand-to-hand combat almost, and you have got relatively little to fight with right now. But the battle that I think we see at the border cities is going to spread up through the rest of the country. So I appreciate you are taking some very heavy casualties, frankly, in the border cities. I think we are seeing those same casualties elsewhere, but it is more obvious there. I think you have outlined some requests for some more ammunition to fight, and some of them I think will be helpful over the short term. I suspect that the marketing board was right when they said we were dealing with some very fundamental issues.

Having said all that, I still accept that all of us have a responsibility to help, particularly our border communities that, as I say, are fighting I think the first and the most devastating battles. I think among many recommendations here, particularly the comprehensive study is one that I think will be very useful, because we are all kind of groping for the facts. That is really an observation.

My question, if I get only one question, is: There is no mention in here or in any of the briefs, I think in terms of Sunday shopping. Is that a tool—and I think many of these tools, as I say, are rather kind of short-term things to minimize the damage while we try and deal with the long-term problems—is Sunday shopping of any merit to any of our communities?

Mr McCartney: Yes. I think most emphatically. I will not do as we have been doing in our communities for the last two weeks, debating this subject with all the local liticians and so forth. It is really not a debatable item. The fact is that we had it. I will tell you, and I can speak for three of us anyway from the chambers of commerce, that we have a position in the provincial chamber that says we oppose Sunday shopping. You know that, because we have met with your various committees, etc. That was in 1989. That was in 1989—

Interjections: This is now.

Mr Phillips: I have heard this one before.

Mr McCartney: But is it not different when you are in power?

The things that have changed I think we all understand. At that point there was no free trade. We did not have a free trade. Cross-border shopping was an everyday event that has been going on since the 1940s, but it was not this phoric cross-border shopping that we have now. Interest rates were lower, and on and on; so things were different. That was then and this is now.

And of course, experience makes you a great learner. Since you have had Sunday shopping, which we have had since June 1990, your experience changes, and suddenly those people—I say all; a great majority of those people—who now enjoyed Sunday shopping said: “Hey, you know, it’s not so bad. I objected to it in the first instance, but it’s not so bad. Actually, we made some money.”

Now, is the argument for Sunday shopping attached to cross-border? Yes. And it is not the sole reason. I mean, anyone who would suggest to you that Sunday shopping is now the major reason why people are going to go to the United States is crazy, but it is just another one of those little bullets to put in their gun, and I think it gives them the seventh bullet.

Mr Phillips: On Sunday shopping, just in terms of where we should be thinking, the cross-border community for Sunday shopping?

Mr McCartney: The question is, where should the government be thinking?

Mr Phillips: Yes. Well, we are not the government, it’s the Legislature.

Mr McCartney: I think the government should consult, remember one. I think you need to talk to the border communities, as you are doing in these kinds of experiences, etc.

Mr Stockwell: We will consult, I will guarantee you that.

Mr McCartney: That is good. We have been recommending that a lot lately, to find out what the impacts are. I know the mayors were here and the mayors met, and was 10 out of 13 of them suggested that we should have Sunday shopping? Well, that is nice. Let’s talk to the border communities. Let’s find out what they really need and whether it is going to impact them or not.

At the very least, if it is all we can get—and I do not agree with this morally because you get into your problem with where do you draw the line—border communities could have some kind of an exemption, and it need not be that stringent, because they are the ones paying the price.

You suggested we are on the front line, sort of like those Kuwaiti guys that went down from Iraq. You are right. They did not have a lot of tools to work with, and that is what we are feeling like. You are taking another tool away from us, and it hurts. It is just going to add to the problem. So maybe we need to make a unique exception in this regard and look at border communities in this instance as an isolated situation and give them a tool to play with.

Ms Logan: Just to add to that, if I might, Sault Ste Marie has had Sunday shopping for some two and a half years now, and I can assure you if that is taken away from our residents—we are already suffering tremendously as a result of cross-border shopping—it will just exacerbate the problem.

As an example, on Good Friday—and I am not suggesting that stores should be open on Good Friday—the American side was open. The lineups on the bridge were unbelievable. There was a restaurant open in one of our malls and that was the only facility that was open, and the restaurateur was standing at the window almost crying because she can see the bridge from where she is, and the steady stream of traffic going across.

Mr Jacques: Can I just add one more quick response? Gerry mentioned consultation with the communities. I think it takes some leadership, more than the consultative process, because we are aware of the concerns. As he mentioned, it is the last bullet. I think it is going to have to take some hard-line stand and to show the leadership that is required within this province and suggest that this is what has to happen in order for us, this province and this country, to survive. It needs some strong leadership shown, and give the benefits straight out.

Mr McCartney: We have a proposal, actually, and one of the things—I will leave you with this curiosity. I have never understood why this government or others before it have always looked at the retail sector as this great sacred cow. Why is it so bad, the retail sector? I mean, is it any worse to buy a shirt in the local Zellers or K-Mart store than it is to have a beer in McGuinness Landing, which is open on Sunday, or to go to the Blue Jay game or to ride a cab or to go to the theatre? All these things are open on Sunday, and yet the gun comes around to the retail sector and says: “Well, but listen, Ontario. You can do all those things, but don’t you dare buy a pair of socks or a pair of pantyhose.” Why is that unique? I never understood that and I still do not know if I am going to get a good explanation or not.

Mr Stockwell: I think the biggest problem facing us is going to be cross-border shopping. The waters run deep on this issue, and I do not think there is a simple answer, frankly. I do not think there is a very clear, concise piece of legislation that the government could pass and poof, our problems will go away.

I also think that to a degree you are a problem as well. People who come forward and tell us that, “Gee, it’s gas that’s the big hook,” and so on and so forth, and, “Let’s mount a campaign to tell people that it’s not cheaper to shop in the States.” I have not seen a study yet that does not tell you it is cheaper to shop in the States, whether you are buying a turkey or whether you are buying gas or whether you are buying a ham, etc. In fact, the studies we have seen here have all indicated it is cheaper to shop in the States, case closed.

The biggest dilemma I think we are facing is, before you can solve a problem, you better deal with it, and the problem is it is cheaper.

Maybe it is more a comment than a question, but I would love to see those studies as well, and I think what we need to do is undertake a full-blown study; but what I believe your study is going to say is, "Your consumers aren't stupid." The people I have talked to are not stupid. They are not driving from Toronto to Buffalo to save a couple of cents on gas. They are driving there because prices are significantly different on major purchases.

I guess what I would like some response to, maybe at a later date and when you have done this study, is, what are the fundamental changes that we have to make to get competitive again, because we are not competitive. I think as long as we bury our head in the sand and pretend that we are competitive and tell ourselves every night before we go to bed it is gasoline or it is cigarettes or it is alcohol, we are never going to become competitive. That is the greatest fear I have, that we continue—

Mr Fletcher: Is this a question?

Mr Stockwell: No, it is not. It is not a question. It is a comment and may come to a question.

The biggest fear I have is that we are going to continue burying our heads in the sand and having people, particularly on the other side, saying, "Well, really it's not prices. We've got to just inform the public that you're going over there but there's no real savings." Baloney, there are savings; significant savings. Maybe you could comment.

Mr Commisso: Mr Chairman, may I answer Mr Stockwell's question?

Mr Stockwell: You can comment on my answer.

The Vice-Chair: Comments, I guess it would be, rather than answer his question.

Mr Commisso: I raised the issue that a study should be done, and I have been trying to raise this issue for the last two years. You have turned it around and said we should do the study.

Mr Stockwell: Not—

Mr Commisso: My proposal is that this committee recommend that a major study be undertaken by the government of Ontario to find the answers to some of your questions. We believe we know some of them, but we are not professional researchers. We all have different jobs and we cannot abandon those jobs to undertake this research. We need some real professional research to find out what the differences are and why they are and what we can do to address them. I think that is where we have to start. That is the very beginning point, and unless we do that, we can all sit around and talk for years; we are not going to solve it.

The Vice-Chair: I am just going to make a comment on this. Three months or six months ago when we first started talking about this, a lot of the figures have changed all the way along. In our subcommittee we discussed this, that if we study it to death we will never solve the problems. It is ongoing thing. It is increasing, it is not decreasing.

Mr Christopherson: First of all, my thanks to presenters. It was excellent and very high-calibre, high quality, and I think you have added a lot to our deliberations. Again, I do thank you for coming down and making your case.

A quick observation, if I might: The gas issue keeps bouncing back and forth between members as to whether this is something that we need to address and will it be a panacea that changes everything or not. From where I am sitting and listening throughout all our deliberations, what I hear very clearly, and I think my colleague across the room Mr Stockwell has acknowledged it, there is no single action that any level of government or any sector in the economy can take that will reverse this crisis. There seem to be a number of key pieces, however, that are the large chunks that perhaps we ought to be tackling first. Gas, as I am hearing, is one of them.

I do not have the answer right off the top of my head either. We have heard different variations of different formulas, different approaches. Mr Winter was here last week and talked to us about the idea of a test marketing station right at the border; There is your idea of a zoned system. There have been suggestions that we just plain arbitrarily slash the price of gas across the province—many different things.

I think, though, that it is important that we address the issue, because it does seem to be the catalyst for a number of other purchases. Before you, as you acknowledged, had the dairy producers, the marketing board representatives, and a lot of their leakage is coming from the fact that people are already across the border. I agree with some of the comments by others. No one is going to go across the border to travel for an hour from Hamilton, to save $1.50 on a tank of gas. Likewise, they are not going to go over there to save 50 cents on a dozen eggs or to pick up a few litres of milk. However, if they are already across the border and they know that by adding up those purchases they can save $50 or more, then it starts to carry a little more enticement. So I think as one key component in all of this, we need as a government to be addressing that particular issue and others.

I have a question, Mr Chair, and it would be, there has been a suggestion by the mayor's task force for a trilevel government task force to look at this issue, made up of municipal, provincial and federal representatives. I would like to hear your comment. I have a sense that without the co-ordinated approach—certainly we have acknowledged that on key issues there has to be co-ordination. My sense at this stage of the game is that really, to deal with all the complexities and all of the issue, we need a comprehensive approach, and if there needs to be a great deal of studying done, large studies, they should be done in conjunction with the feds and with the municipalities playing a role because they are the front-line fighters in this case.

It seems to me that is what we ought to do. I would like your opinion as to whether you would perceive that to be a valid, necessary approach to tackling the economic problem of cross-border shopping, or would you perceive that as more government wheel-spinning?

Mr McCartney: We would concur that a task force of that size and nature may be beneficial, but we would add one ingredient in order to expedite the results much quicker. If you would have as one of the key components the business community somewhere—Retail Council of Canada, chambers of commerce, whatever it may be—as part of that guiding process, I think we could get at the answers a little quicker.

When it came to effecting change, whether it is taxation or otherwise on the gas issues, that could be more cumbersome and certainly more onerous. I do not know where that would lead, but I think the problem is large enough. You have identified, as almost every study has, that gas is one of the trigger mechanisms, and I concur with Mr Kwinter, they are not going to go just for that; but I guarantee you, Mr Kwinter, that when they are there anyway, absolutely they are going to buy a tank on the way back. So it does have an effect, no matter where you are from.

I guess if you look at numbers like London and Kitchener, where their accommodations sector is down 26% to the year-end of 1990, you know why? There has got to be a reason, and I will tell you, their American cash deposits are down by a like amount. So they are not getting them across.

A task force would be something I think we would encourage and would almost suggest to you in very strong terms that consultation with business would almost be mandatory at that point, because they are the ones, as the chairman has pointed out, that are right on the front line experiencing the problem every day.

Ms Logan: We would support the concept of a task force, but with a time frame, because we are looking at hemorrhaging in these communities and some of the businesses that you are depending on to provide tax revenue now will no longer be in existence. If we do not deal with this now, immediately, we just cannot deal with it.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Fletcher, better make it short, the bells are about to begin.

Mr Fletcher: I will be very short, Mr Chair. I was just following this scenario: Suppose both levels of governments cut the tax on gasoline and we say that yes, you can do this. Let's follow that along from where I live—and you were talking about Kitchener-Waterloo area, I am from Guelph—the enticement is for the gasoline and once we get the people there they buy. That is going to hurt the businesses in Guelph, and people are already going across the border to do the shopping, and it may be the gas that is enticing them. Your area now, being in a border town, is going to entice the people from my area. Now my business people are going to want an incentive to keep them there. It is along the same lines of what Mr Ward was saying. If you do it, why can my area not do it?

Mr McCartney: Actually, we looked at Guelph as sort of an incidental casualty at that point.

Mr Fletcher: Thanks a lot. That is what the voters said.

Mr McCartney: Our target market was really Toronto at that time. We did not care whether Toronto lost out on the advantage or not.

Mr Fletcher: Well, we are losing people to Toronto.

Mr McCartney: I understand. I think if you look at the real math involved, though, the average tank these days is about 50 litres. So if the total discount was a nickel per litre, are you going to go that far for that little money? Is it going to hurt your retailers? I do not know, maybe a little, but I would go back to Mr Kwinter's point. It is probably the people who are leaving Guelph to go down to Port Huron or Windsor or Buffalo to do other shopping who would then also take advantage of the cheaper gas on either side of the bridge then. But the point I make is that at least it stays there.

It is not Sarnia that is trying to gain by this, it is not Sault Ste Marie, it is bloody Canada, and that is what we have used in our community, the subliminal message of a maple leaf with an envelope slot and a loonie coin going into it. Let's keep it at home. That is the message.

The Vice-Chair: We are running over 5 after 12, and I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

The committee recessed at 1206.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1539.

RETAIL COUNCIL OF CANADA

The Chair: If the Retail Council of Canada could come forward, please. It is Alisdair McKitchan, president; Peter Woolford, vice-president. Welcome.

Mr McKitchan: Thank you. I am Alisdair McKitchan and my colleague Peter Woolford is on my right. We represent the Retail Council of Canada and we value the opportunity to appear before the committee. With your permission, Mr Chairman, I will not attempt to regurgitate verbatim the content of our submission but would rather give you a summary of it so that more time is available for discussion.

I should first say that the constituency the retail council represents constitutes, within our direct membership, retailers who, across Canada, perform something in the order of 65% of total retail store volume. That excludes automobile dealers, gas and accessories and restaurant dealers, but is about 65% of the store trade. That is drawn from virtually every sector of the industry, but of course with the predominance of our members being independent. We represent something over 6,000 actual businesses and we have affiliated with us many regional and specialist associations. In particular I would single out the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors, which is the organization speaking for a large proportion of the grocery trade. So we are here speaking both on behalf of the general merchandise and the grocery sectors.

Let me touch on what we perceive as the dimensions of the problem. We have not commissioned or seen an accurate computation of the volume of Ontario business lost to cross-border shopping. However, individual cities have run measures based on a count of cross-border same-day shopping trips and correlated that with interviews with returning residents. Matching the results of these tests to the numbers of cross-border trips makes it reasonably certain that the volume lost from Ontario must exceed $1 billion per annum. The rate of growth of the problem can be derived directly from the Canada Customs figures of same-day trips counted on a year-by-year basis. As the table on page 4 of our submission demonstrates, and you have probably seen it before, there is a very steep increase in that figure, rising from 11.7 million visits from Ontario in 1987 to 22.4 million last year, a rate of growth somewhat ahead of the national results where the 31 million visits in 1987 had grown to 58.1 million in 1990. As you will see, figures for the Niagara Peninsula area are even more significant. The economic loss and in many cases the hardship caused by the loss of business is well known to the committee and I do not think I need to expand on it.

Let me touch, however, on our perception of the nature of the problem. We do believe there is a considerable misunderstanding of the problem's actual nature. In our view and that of our members, the cross-border shopping issue is not primarily a question of inappropriate or ineffective border controls, although, as I shall mention later, we should get the border situation right and we are aggravated by the problem by not dealing with it promptly and decisively. But even when we fix the border issue we shall still, I believe, have a huge problem on our hands.

Some of the factors influencing Canadians to shop in the United States we can correct. Others we have to accept but to some extent we can compensate for. Obviously geography plays its part. Our cold climate, long distances and the sparseness of our population make for diseconomies. These are built-in handicaps that we have to accept and somehow work around.

Second, consumer markets are in a state of flux and change, but that is a condition which affects retailers both south and north of the border. The effects, however, tend to be more severe in a smaller market. Domestic suppliers face some of the same impediments as retailers and indeed we also have a handicap in relation to imported goods because Canadian tariffs tend to be just about double those that apply in the US to goods that are imported from overseas or from Central and South America.

Another disadvantage is the relatively heavier public sector burden—taxes and government-mandated expenses—which weigh more heavily on Ontario firms than those in the US. There have been suggestions that a couple of high-profile measures could cure our problem. One is the suggestion that most of the problems stem from the Canada-US trade agreement, and abolishing that would solve the problem. That, in our view, is a myth. In point of fact the tariff concessions granted by Canada and the US apply only to goods which are certified through a source-of-origin certificate as being, in fact, manufactured in one or the other country and so entitled to the modified rate of duty now applicable under the agreement; or duty-free in the case of the relatively few categories of merchandise that have achieved that status at this point.

Consumers, of course, cannot readily obtain source-of-origin certificates. On the other hand, there is no doubt that consumers construed the description of free trade quite literally, and assumed that it meant what it said. Of course they could not have been more wrong. In any event, the conclusion of the agreement seems to have piqued the interest of Canadians in what might be available advantageously, as they believed, in the United States.

Nor do we believe a forced devaluation of the Canadian dollar a solution. Such a devaluation would mean a substantial impoverishment of Canadians, because many of the goods they buy would become proportionately more expensive, and inflation would again be stimulated.

So let's talk of some of our notions on solutions. We believe solutions will be assisted if we have better facts and an overall better understanding of the facts which are already available. It was to achieve these ends that we, as an organization, convened a meeting last October of all the principally involved Canadian parties, including representatives of the federal, provincial and municipal governments, the community groups and individual trade representatives to review the issue and see what might be done, either parately or jointly, and what further research was required. Out of that meeting came a decision to embark on study on competitiveness. A pilot study has been undertaken by the federal Department of Industry, Science and Technology, and the results of that study are to be presented at a second meeting of the group on 22 April in Niagara Falls.

The meeting also reviewed the various initiatives which have been taken by local communities and heard Revenue Canada's views on the situation. The department is encouraged to embark on actions which would result in collecting a higher proportion of moneys due without, it is hoped, creating situations that would deter visitors from coming to Canada. Out of this, presumably, came the C experiment, which we are watching with interest but, of course, we do not yet know whether it will work or not.

At the April meeting we shall be determining what further research would be useful and helpful. We also believe that there are some constructive things that the private sector can do on a joint basis within the sector. Merchants and local groups in some communities have attempted to fight back through a variety of measures, including public communication programs, stressing the benefits of keeping economic activity in the community, through special promotional events, co-operative advertising, improvements in service and adopting, where possible, more aggressive pricing policies.

Some of these initiatives have been undertaken with the assistance of the Ontario Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology which has provided advice and help, especially with respect to marketing. Obviously that kind of help is welcomed but neither the initiatives nor the help are, in our view, the long-term solutions.

Another response of the private sector will be in the form of accelerating improvements and achieving even greater efficiency and competitiveness, but however heroic Canadian efforts are in this area, they will not be able to amount or compensate for the cost disadvantage that I all mention in a moment.

Let's turn now to the public sector initiatives. We believe, in fact, that it is within the public sector that more can be done than in any other to help solve the problem. The first section is relatively simple and easy of achievement. We believe that the federal and provincial governments should come to an agreement whereby federal customs inspectors collect not only federal duty and the federal goods and services tax but also the provincial sales tax. That action would be much more practicable if the provincial sales tax regime were harmonized with the federal goods and services tax. We have recommended that harmonization for other reasons, and in any event the border problem, we believe, is the most powerful argument of all for bringing about that harmonization as quickly as possible, and we commend it to your committee.

The other actions required of governments are neither easily defined nor as capable of immediate application. However, because the twin problems of significantly higher taxes and explicit or implicit costs from regulatory action are of much higher dimension than those bearing on our US competitors, we believe that the provincial government must start reappraising virtually all existing or planned significant activities and programs affecting business, with a view to weighing their design and utility against the competitive criteria. We shall certainly be making a case for this with the Fair Tax Commission, but the mandate of that commission is not sufficiently wide, in our view, to embrace all the forms of costs to which we allude. We must also look at government programs already in force or now being contemplated in areas of marketing practices, employee protection and benefit legislation, and other policies which bear on all employers, manufacturing as well as distribution.

1550

We are not necessarily suggesting that any of the objectives of the particular pieces of legislation are undesirable, but we believe that the government should study whether there are not other less expensive, less burdensome ways of achieving the same or similar objectives which would not carry the penalty of reducing sales in Canada with the consequent loss of jobs, of income, of tax base and so on. Some programs, we suggest, will just not represent a good bargain in terms of their side effects on our competitiveness and thus jobs.

We know that we are proposing a formidable and challenging program for the government. We believe, however, that the project is better attacked now than two or three years hence from a position of even greater comparative disadvantage and more economic weakness. We shall look forward to a period of discussion with you.

That is our submission, which we submit with respect.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for the presentation. We have heard a couple of presentations. We had John Winter in last week and he gave a very thorough analysis of the situation. We also heard this morning from the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping, indicating concern that Ontario border communities are now becoming the discount capitals for American retailers in terms of their scratch and dent and second-level clothing and that type of stuff.

I am just wondering, in terms of the measures that you talked about in your presentation, even if they are carried out, how are we still going to be able to counter this type of discounting and major dumping in the border communities by American retailers?

Mr McKichan: Obviously, as far as competitiveness is concerned, you have to be comparing like with like. We will never be able to compare a full-line type of service with a discounted minimal-service type of operation. That is as true within Canada as it is within the United States.

However, there are many customers who do not want to buy ends-of-lines and less than full-service types of merchandise, just as there are in the United States. I think one of our obligations there as merchants is to differentiate in our marketing what we are offering, and how sometimes the comparisons are made erroneously. But we are still not competitive with full-service US firms on the other side of the border. In essence, retailing has become an internationally traded commodity, and the damage which now is most apparent in the border communities is not confined there.

The proportion of Toronto residents who make shopping expeditions to the US is large and growing, and when you consider that within Canada 90% of the population lives within 100 miles of the US border, virtually the great mass of our population is within access and I think we have to take account of that in our policies.

Mr Sutherland: The other studies have indicated that the higher the income the more likely you are to participate in cross-border shopping. What would you say to those people who seem to be reaping the many benefits of our social programs in terms of some of the extra costs they are putting on to retailers and some of the things that you have mentioned? What would you say to those people who want to have it both ways? They want to have all the benefits yet they want to be able to have low prices when they are purchasing their goods.

Mr McKichan: I think we share a perplexity in relation to that situation. I think some attempts have been made through public service advertising to illustrate to consumers that when they buy a piece of Canadian merchandise they are also helping support employment in Canada and paying part of the social costs of running our system. Unfortunately, a great many people do not make a correlation between long-term and short-term benefits and they give precedence to what they perceive as their short-term economic advantage. I wish I could provide you with a magic solution to cure that attitude.

We have contemplated an advertising campaign designed to bring out that question, but it is very much a two-edged type of initiative. On the one hand, you are saying: "There are bargains there, folks. We don't think you should have anything to do with them." It tends to emphasize the fact that if they are really smart and not particularly scrupulous, they can benefit. I have some difficulty accepting that as a good strategy.

Mr Sterling: Thank you for coming. I really do appreciate the thoughtfulness behind your presentation, because Mr Winter had some suggestions that I found difficult to justify, such as putting artificial barriers at the border and saying, "We're going to charge you $5 to come in," or they are going to have long lineups in order to discourage people and that kind of thing. I do not believe that in the end it answers any of the real questions.

I really do feel that an aggressive approach by the provincial government—and that is whom we are dealing with here—to collect its provincial sales tax would in some ways discourage perhaps, I do not know, maybe 10%, maybe 40%, who knows, from crossing the border.

When we had the Minister of Revenue in front of this committee a week ago, it appeared to me that she was not being very aggressive about taking this issue in hand. In fact, when I asked the question of how much had been declared through customs, she or her three officials who were with her could not answer that question, which I thought was amazing in terms of the Minister of Revenue having no idea of how much revenue she might be losing a year.

First of all, I have no trouble with sales tax harmonization. I think that makes economic good sense within our boundaries as well. I think it will allow you as a retailer and the whole operation probably to do business cheaper, as well as make the situation easier at the border. The problem that I find with the suggestion, is that the provincial government has to say, "We want you to collect it, but we're willing to do something positive about this." Now, that can be either an offer of cash or a couple of points on the scale or it can be an offer of going to actually helping collect the money at the border.

I would like you to comment on what you see as the provincial government's responsibility in doing this. I am not popular for a politician to collect tax. I am certain Otto Jelinek does not want to be the fall guy for collecting provincial sales tax at the border. Therefore, in fairness, I think the province should have some responsibility in this and some visibility.

Mr McKichan: I agree with you. Mind you, I think the federal government is very keen to achieve harmonization, because it is well aware of the potential economies on the scale in the collection of the tax generally, not just the border tax but the tax overall. I guess they worked with some diligence to attempt to achieve that during the planning of the GST but were not able to get provincial support. I think, even without any encouragement they would probably be prepared to take on some collection duties, but even if they wanted to make that a shared-cost operation, it seems to me it would still be a great bargain for the province. One could conceive of the feds getting a percentage of tax collected or some such arrangement, and 97% of the tax collected is a better bargain for the province than 0%.

Mr Sterling: I agree.

Mr McKichan: It seems to me not only would both sides win, but it would have a significant effect in maintaining more business within Ontario because there is no doubt about it, the ambition of the customer to avoid tax is a particularly cherished one. People like to save money, especially they like to save tax moneys. That is just the nature of the human soul.

Mr Sterling: I think Frank Miller proved that back in what was it, 1983 or 1984 when he gave a tax holiday on automobiles. It was probably the most responsive provincial government program that had ever taken place.

Mr McKichan: Yes. If a merchant announces a 10% discount sale all you get from the public is a big yawn but if the government says it is going to remove a 7% tax for a while the public reaction is instantaneous.

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr McKichan: It is a curious element of psychology.

Mr Sterling: Can I ask one other question? Not only for the retail business but other businesses, one of the most shocking parts that I found about these hearings in dealing with cross-border shopping—as Terence Corcoran wrote in the Globe and Mail the day after John Winter was here—was that the cross-border shopping issue is just a very small indication of how uncompetitive we are in just about everything we do. Are there some specific tax areas in which the retail trade would like some relief from or which uld affect them perhaps more than other business interests, because they are the ones that are facing the onus of this threat?

Mr McKichan: I think when you compare the costs of a US retailer with a Canadian retailer the most significant statistic that stares out at you is the differential in the cost of occupancy. That covers rents and real estate-related costs, business taxes and of course in the Toronto area the concentration tax. It is a fairly common occurrence that the cost of occupancy, which in Ontario will tend to run a merchant 11%, 12%, 13% of overall costs, will probably be just half that across the line.

I guess the second most important element of tax is all payroll taxes, because retailing is a labour-intensive industry so anything that attaches to the cost of labour is significant. Again, the differential between Canada and the US is very significant except, I guess, in the case of the larger companies, the cost of health care which curiously tends to be higher in the United States than in Canada because of the inherent high cost of the US health care system.

Mr Sterling: They have the argument about us having a social conscience, but we should really discount that in terms of this phenomenon, because you are saying that cost is already included in the retail price over there in a lot of cases.

Mr McKichan: Yes, but their payroll-related taxes, rather than health, are substantially less than ours. All their occupancy costs are very significantly less. That is compounded with the differential on the cost of land, which, if you look through that, of course, also leads back eventually to a lot of tax reasons. There is a huge and, under the present regime, insuperable cost differential.

Mr Mammoliti: I am somewhat concerned about one-day trips. On page 4 you have given us some examples that go back to 1987. These are statistics that you got where?

Mr McKichan: Customs Canada.

Mr Mammoliti: Customs Canada. These statistics are compiled, I take it, by people who tell the truth at the border?

Mr McKichan: No, these are just people counted going across the border. You do not know whether—

Mr Mammoliti: And when they are stopped, they say, "Yes, I did some shopping."

Mr McKichan: Not necessarily. These are just the raw number of crossings. The estimates made of volume are derived partially from these raw figures, but also looking at the surveys which have been done by particular agencies and towns in border situations where they have done turning-as-resident interviews asking: "Did you shop in the United States? If so, how much did you buy?" They have compiled figures for their areas.

Mr Mammoliti: That is what I am getting at. These are the people who have said, "Yes, I have shopped in the States."

Mr McKichan: Not these figures in the tables. That is just the raw crossings.

Mr Mammoliti: Okay, so how accurate could they be then?

Mr McKichan: Very accurate; completely accurate. Customs count the number of people who pass the border.

Mr Mammoliti: Yes, but how do they know they are shopping?

Mr McKichan: They do not. We are not saying these people are shopping; we are saying this is just an indicator of the rate of growth of the phenomenon because we assume that probably about the same proportion of people who went to shop in 1987 went to shop in 1990. We do not know, but we assume, and we assume most of these people who are crossing the border are crossing the border for the purposes of shopping.

Mr Mammoliti: Are there any statistics on how many people are actually shopping?

Mr Woolford: Can I pick up on that just a little bit? Talking with the Revenue Canada officials as well, they have made clear that the basis of their judgement on these numbers is that most of these people going across for a single day are in fact going for shopping. There are a small number of people who go across for job-related matters, workers who live perhaps in Windsor and go across to Detroit to work. There are some locations in Canada, for example, where schoolchildren will cross the border daily.

What they do say, though, is that the vast increase they have seen since 1987 is primarily for shopping purposes and they get a feel of that from talking with their field staff, from looking at the number of the collections and the number of seizures and so on that they make. They report that the number of people looking to pay duty on purchases in the States is going up very rapidly as well, but they do not have as good and clear numbers and as consistent numbers as they had on this side, so we put these in.

Mr Hansen: When we got into the auto free trade pact, individual citizens were not allowed to participate in that; that was between companies. I believe this free trade also was mainly between companies in Canada-United States, but people interpreted it as private free trade, so that you could bring things back into Canada. As you see from the figures 1987-1990, everything just about doubled since free trade came in.

I know we are trying to fast-track this to get down to some solutions. I had brought up one suggestion. It is now law that when you come back into Ontario, it is the obligation of the returning person purchasing merchandise in the United States to voluntarily remit the 8% Ontario sales tax. If we could just get the federal government to hand out envelopes at the border people could send them in. If you do not have an envelope, when you get home, you forget to send in that 8%, whereas a form you could fill out. But maybe one step further to get things moving is that little bit of co-operation with the federal government. That slip that you make on declaration: If it is not sent in, we would have a service charge for actually billing the person to send in that particular money. I would just like to hear your opinion. Do you think something along this line would work and help the retail trade here in Ontario?

Mr McKichan: The point you make is well taken and it is a curious anomaly that probably 95% of the population of Ontario are not aware that they have an obligation to pay Ontario tax on merchandise that they purchase outside Ontario, including the other Canadian provinces.

It is also a surprise, I think, to many Ontario residents, when they buy something in another Canadian province and they buy it from a retail company which has national outlets or outlets in several provinces and they find several months later they get a bill from the Ontario sales tax collection department for the tax due on the amount of their purchase. That is achievable by the department because they can oblige a company operating transprovincially to supply them with records of purchases made outside Ontario by Ontario residents. The company is obliged to do that and does it.

It is anomalous that the sales tax collection authorities should enforce that right for purchases made in Canada and not make any effort to collect tax from purchases made in the United States. Certainly anything that can be done to encourage collection would be welcome from the point of view of the retail trade. The suggestion you make, while I think it would improve the situation, would be not nearly as effective as mandatory sales tax collection along with the federal tax and duty at the border. You might get 30% of the duty through the method you suggest. With federal collection you would get the same proportion as the federal duty.

Mind you, we are not satisfied with the percentage of duty due actually collected by the feds, but they say they are conscious of that and are working at some ways of improving that ratio. Of course, we encourage them. You are probably aware of the experiment they are undertaking in British Columbia whereby people who cross regularly will get a permit and will have a basis for paying, their theory being that some people now smuggle because they are discouraged from paying the duty because of the long lineups required to make the payment. They believe if they can facilitate that process they will get a higher proportion of duty. I do not know if that is right or not, but that is what they hope to demonstrate from this experiment.

Mr Hansen: I think the one big problem is with the congestion at the borders. We have seen in other studies that we have lost the American tourist up here in Canada. It is a fear that I have found—I have been visiting relatives down in the States—that you come to Canada and it takes you two or three hours to get across the bridge. It discouraged their trip to visit us up in Ontario. The word is spreading, and I guess it is publicized in other papers throughout the States, about the problem we have at the borders. I think that express lanes should be opened up to American tourists coming to Canada before we open them up in other ways.

Mr McKichan: We are very sensitive to that and we certainly believe that whatever we do, we should not impede the US visitor coming to Canada. Nothing could be more counterproductive than discouraging visitors who are going to come to spend US dollars here. I certainly agree with that.

Mrs Sullivan: I just have kind of a throwaway question to ask you in the beginning, but it is not the important one. I had not realized that the retail council had in the past taken a position opposing supply management programs which you appear to have done in this brief. It is not a major thing that I want to ask you about, but if there is a time you may want to comment on that.

Mr McKichan: Let me just say we are looking at effects and not methods of organization. If this is demonstrated to be a severe impediment to the maximization of the sale of the product in Canada, then probably it is the best way to organize the help to the agricultural community.

Mrs Sullivan: We will not debate that right now, but I did want to pursue further with you the whole question of the distribution system in Canada as it compares to the United States. My impression is that the manufacturer-wholesale-retail chain in fact brings in far higher costs in Canada than are found in the United States. The margins are higher at each step of the way. That is leading to retailers and merchants in Canada themselves turning to the United States for supply of their product rather than dealing through the distribution system in Ontario.

I certainly have spoken with people in the white goods industry, for example, who are able to buy product for resale in Canada that meets CSA and energy-efficiency standards and are buying that product through American distributors rather than in Canada and are still able to make a reasonable margin putting them into their stores here. Have you seen that trend? Is it unique to a certain sector of the retail industry and do you see it growing?

Mr McKichan: I guess heretofore, most sectors of Canadian manufacturing, and I will concentrate on manufacturing for the moment, have been higher-cost operations than US; not universally, but mostly. It is not surprising when you consider that mostly we have been dealing with smaller volumes, with many more different types of products per plant and usually with higher costs of operation and higher costs of labour inputs and so on. I guess one of the intentions of the Canada-US trade agreement was to attempt to redress that by allowing Canadian manufacturers to have bigger production runs and more specialized production. I guess that will be achieved, or else the companies will be wiped out because within the lifetime of the phase-in of the free trade agreement all the Canadian companies will be competing in price with the US operation. So in terms of the cost of deliveries of continentally produced goods, we are in essence looking at a transitional problem which lasts only as long as the free trade agreement phase-in period lasts. It will persist, however, for imported goods because, as we say in our submission, Canadian tariffs, on average, tend to be about twice those of US tariffs. So on imported goods the US will continue to have an advantage.

Turning to the issue of retail margins, again you find that usually the Canadian margins are slightly higher, comparing like type of distribution with like type of distribu-n in the States, traditional department stores with traditional department stores, discount stores with discount stores. But of course, the Canadian margin tends to be based on a higher initial buying price, so in effect the dollar margin is greater. It is not surprising that it should be for all the reasons that we have mentioned, because we have much higher occupancy costs, about double those in the US, we have higher labour costs, higher fringe benefits. Many of the other services which retailers buy, like advertising and so on, tend to be proportionately higher and these are the difficult and intractable problems we have to deal with.

I conclude by saying there is one other phenomenon: there have recently been developed in the US novel types of distribution stores which we have not yet in all cases replicated in Canada. For instance, there is no one in Canada to my knowledge providing the kind of service that a company like Wal-Mart provides at the margins that Wal-Mart is able to hold them down at, and that is very largely a question of scale on the one hand and style of merchandising on another. But these store types are developing. Some of them are US owned in Canada and I would think it would not be many months or years before virtually all of them are replicated to some degree in Canada.

Mrs Sullivan: I would just like to follow up on your response, if I could. We have looked at and heard about some of the innovations that are being made in the retail industry to come to terms with some of these competitive factors, and we see price clubs emerging, we see integrated manufacturing-retailing operations, such as Ikea. Habitat, I understand, may be moving into this market. One of the effects, however, of those kinds of retail operations may be that the downtown retailer finds a new kind of competition that he is unable to meet on our own national turf. I wonder if the retail council has looked at that kind of an issue and the ultimate economic effect of that.

20

Mr McKichan: Retailing is a highly dynamic type of business, and I guess most of the changes in the style of retailing have worked to the benefit of the consumer. I guess the classic example is the supermarket which, 50 or 60 years ago, delivered groceries at significant cost advantage compared to the previous system of distribution. These novel forms of retailing are achieving the same thing. You are getting companies able to deliver a wide range of general merchandise with margins of something like 24% in some of the US chains, compared with figures in the high 30s for more traditional types of distribution. And you, you get a different kind of service. The customer has to choose what they are willing to trade in respect of price, but it is good for the customer, and it gives the customer choice. I think these kinds of innovations do produce higher standards of living. When one compares the situation in a dynamic, North American distribution sector with, say, Russia, you realize the tremendous value that is delivered to the consumer through an efficient and competitive distribution system.

Mrs Sullivan: Why is it that a retailer in Canada buys an imported piece of merchandise from a distributor, say Japanese electronic equipment, and an American retailer buying identical equipment, also imported—why does the Canadian retailer have to charge a significantly higher price to make any profit on the sale?

Mr McKichan: I guess the most obvious cost differential is that of duty which, as I say, is roughly double in Canada what it is in the United States. Apart from that, there are obviously questions of scale, of the US market being 10 times the size of the Canadian market, presumably the US importer is able to get the volume discount substantially better than the Canadian importer. There would also be economies of scale in distribution. I would assume, if the merchandise flows through a professional importer in the United States, that importer's operation is probably significantly bigger than the equivalent in Canada, and the market may be more competitive in the United States at the wholesale level. I think these are all factors in the situation.

The Chair: Ms Ward, then Mr Sorbara.

Ms M. Ward: You are a national organization. I understand this is a problem across Canada from, we have heard, St Stephen, New Brunswick, to places in British Columbia and so on. I wonder if you could comment on the degree of the problem in other parts of the country, if there is any action they have taken you can tell us about, or anything we could learn from them, and are there any different circumstances?

Mr McKichan: It is very significant in the lower mainland of British Columbia. The lineups at the border crossings are comparable to those at the Niagara area in Ontario. There is also the similar phenomenon of US firms establishing virtually in green pasture, with no concentrations of US population round about, and obviously designed to cater to the Canadian business.

Ms M. Ward: That is BC, is it?

Mr McKichan: Yes, and they have a particular problem there, I guess, with the daily sale of dairy products and gasoline to people who are resident in the southern part of the lower mainland, who would not think of shopping for these necessities anywhere else but across the line. Of course, it also affects general merchandise and other food products. It is not so much of a problem in Alberta, because the large concentrations of population are just that much further from the border, and there are no sizeable US cities to the immediate south. That is somewhat the situation in Saskatchewan as well, and to a lesser extent, in Manitoba. In Manitoba there is Fargo, and one or two other midsize cities.

In Quebec, it is becoming more of a problem, but Montreal is somewhat further removed from Plattsburgh than is the case in the border cities here. As you say, it is a significant problem in New Brunswick, particularly the St Stephen crossing. It is not much of a problem in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland, because they are insulated by distance.

Ms M. Ward: Is any action being taken in those areas?

Mr McKichan: Everyone is wrestling with exactly the same questions that we are here. As you know, Saskatchewan has integrated its provincial tax with the federal tax. We believe that Manitoba is contemplating that, largely for the reasons of collection. Alberta, of course, does not have a sales tax so that is to their advantage in the comparative pricing of products; and, of course, Quebec has integrated their sales tax again with the notion that the feds will collect it. We are encouraging all the provinces, incidentally, to move ahead with integration.

Ms M. Ward: Did they not do that originally, Quebec and the others?

Mr McKichan: They did it before. Yes.

Mr Sorbara: In your brief, in describing the dimensions of the problem, you stated that the very short notice given for submissions to the legislature means that it has not been possible to do much research in this regard. Anecdotally and in a word, how serious is this problem?

Mr McKichan: I would say that for many of our members it is the single most important public issue or competitive issue that they are facing. It is very important for the grocery trade. It is important for anybody selling clothing or footwear. It is somewhat important for people selling small appliances. It is not so much the major appliances just because of the difficulty of moving them and of servicing them; and all the other trades, to a greater or lesser extent, whether it is jewellery or housewares or whatever. But the big areas are clothing, footwear, groceries and household linens.

Mr Sorbara: The council has always done good research, I believe. That has been my experience over my period in government. Politicians have a different approach to measuring the severity of the problem and my own estimation is that you are absolutely right. It is an extremely serious problem.

Let me give you my political experiences: an encounter with someone in Windsor who said to me: "I don't spend any money in Canada any more, like milk, bread, gasoline, new tires, nothing. If I am going out for milk, I cross the bridge and I get milk and cigarettes and bread and do a little shopping and maybe even my dry-cleaning. I do not spend any money in Canada."

Someone on my own staff, a couple of Christmases ago, went for a Christmas vacation to the Ramada Inn in Buffalo on a shopping excursion; $59 a night for a family of four in marvellous accommodation and a guide to where all the best bargains were for Canadian shoppers.

A third and final anecdote is that I live in Richmond Hill and I represent the people of Richmond Hill. There is a great new shopping mall there called The Promenade. One day about two weeks ago I went there and when I came out, on my windshield was a flyer advertising, I think the lead was, "Buffalo Direct. Write to us and we will show you how to shop in Buffalo." That seems to me to mean now that the market penetration is well into the greater Toronto area.

Mr McKichan: Absolutely. It is well into the hinterland.

Mr Sorbara: I put all that before you because I am going to ask you what three or four things you think the provincial government should be doing. But what I want to concentrate on is the question of Sunday retailing. By way, what is the council's position on Sunday retailing?

Mr McKichan: We are neutral, Mr Sorbara, because we have members on both sides of the fence and we find it impossible to get a consensus.

Mr Sorbara: As I understand it, the government in wisdom is considering a general law to close stores on Sunday but it is proposing to make an exception for border communities. Could you tell the committee where the council would suggest drawing the line for those border communities? Would it be through Hamilton or Burlington or up Yonge Street, or where would that be?

1630

Mr McKichan: I find it difficult to respond in the area simply because of our neutral position. I think most people acknowledge that there is a correlation between Sunday opening, the availability of shopping opportunities in Canada, and the damming of some outflow of business but opinion differs as to how serious or how much of a cure Sunday opening would represent. I really do not feel equipped to give you a response on that.

In terms of where you draw the line, it seems to me that the instant you draw the line, the more will be the pressure on the other side of the line to move it another five or 10 miles or whatever.

Mr Sorbara: Well, if, for example, you said stores in Hamilton and then southward throughout the Niagara Peninsula can open, but the stores east and north of that, through Oakville and through Halton and then Peel and Metro Toronto, could not open, would that be fair? Would that be fair for retailers?

Mr McKichan: I can tell you what the effects will be. If the line is drawn immediately east of Hamilton, the merchants of Oakville will be rising up in wrath. I do not have the answers. It is an intensely difficult problem.

Mr Woolford: Can I pick up on that for a minute? As a former federal civil servant, I was involved in the exercise of drawing lines across Canada for some of their financial support programs for companies. Great efforts were made to draw these lines through unpopulated parts of Canada and they caused excruciating pain for the government. They could draw a line through the middle of prairie farmland, and inevitably it went down the middle of a factory somewhere that they did not know about. Drawing lines through densely populated southern Ontario is going to be a difficult job.

Mr Sorbara: Is the appropriate conclusion then that the marketplace, the market forces, ought to be used to determine who ought to be able to stay open on Sunday and who not if the issue is cross-border shopping?

Mr McKichan: Unfortunately, I regret that we are hobbled in our inability—

Mr Sorbara: Well, you should not be hobbled any longer. You need to take a position on this. It is time for courage.

Mr McKichan: Our general philosophy is that we do not need unanimity to take a position, but we do require sonable consensus, and in this area we just do not have reasonable consensus.

Mr Sorbara: No, but there is no doubt that the flow shoppers across the border on Sunday is particularly significant, is it not?

Mr McKichan: Absolutely.

Mr Sorbara: Well, okay. The provincial government controls the regulation of retailing and shopping on Sunday. It controls a variety of taxes, it controls workplace issues, it controls highways. I guess it could close the highways to the US on Sunday; that would be interesting. Somebody has suggested while they go about Sunday closings they might also prohibit Sunday crossings, which would be typical. What three or four things would you suggest that the provincial government do quickly in order to at least stop the haemorrhaging?

Mr McKichan: Number one, harmonize the provincial sales tax with the goods and services tax and have them collect it at the border. That, in our mind, would be the most significant thing they could do.

Second, work with the federal government in encouraging the highest possible level of collection of duty and taxes at the border.

Number three, embark on an instant study of the major additional tax components which Ontario businesses have to bear vis-à-vis their US competition and see if there are ways of minimizing these or other ways of accomplishing the objective which the obligation on the business requires.

Mr Sorbara: Just to interrupt, that would be a study of competitiveness as between the two jurisdictions?

Mr McKichan: Precisely, right.

Mr Sorbara: Just one final point, if I might. There are no differentials in the price of gasoline as well.

Mr McKichan: Yes, very substantial.

Mr Sorbara: Is that, in your view, a significant factor?

Mr McKichan: Very substantial. Things like gasoline, cigarettes and milk are the very basic commodities which give people an initial excuse for going, and once they are there, of course, they buy other things, but the differential—and there are very significant differentials in the price of these commodities—are a spur to people in the border communities. To the extent that you can do something about that, that is going to be helpful.

Mr Sorbara: Just a final comment, not a question, is that I really do encourage at least the Ontario section of the rail council to come up with a policy on Sunday shopping. If you do not, the risk you run is that we will get very bad public policy in this area.

Mr McKichan: We have offered our services as a technical resource, if you like, but without offering an opinion on policy.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon.

Mr McKichan: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, Linda Ganong, director, provincial affairs; Catherine Swift, vice-president, research; and Pierre Clérout, senior economist.

The Acting Chair: It is not a coup. I would ask the representatives from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business to introduce yourselves individually and then commence with your presentation.

Ms Ganong: Thank you, Acting Chairman. We had asked for some audio-visual support for an overhead projector. I notice there is one here. I do not know if it is plugged in and ready to go.

In the meantime, I am Linda Ganong. I am the director of provincial affairs for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Ontario branch. This is our vice-president, research, and chief economist, Catherine Swift; and setting up the AV equipment is our senior economist, Pierre Clérout. Thank you very much for inviting us here today. I will turn it over to Catherine.

Mr Sorbara: So that is what senior economists look like.

Ms Swift: We are very versatile at the CFIB. We do everything, of necessity.

Mr Sorbara: It is always good to see you again.

Ms Ganong: It is good to see you too.

Ms Swift: We would like to present some of the research work we have been doing on cross-border shopping. It has been going on for, I would say, almost a year now. This is not a particularly new issue, as you probably know. In fact it is probably decades old, but of course what has brought everyone's attention to it over the last 18 months to two years is the incredible growth rate we have seen and the incredible loss to our economy that has resulted from the expansion in cross-border shopping by Canadians.

Most of the work we have done has focused on tax-related issues. There are a number of ways you can go at this one, and that has been our focus so far. Mind you, we are continuing work on it, so it will not be our exclusive focus. That is not to say, of course, that there are not many, many factors underlying the problems in the growth in cross-border shopping. Indeed, we believe it is very much a composite of factors, such as our high dollar, high interest rates, high taxes we have seen at all levels of government, higher wage rates in Canada, lower productivity levels; basically, overall higher costs of doing business in Canada. One thing I have heard recently from a number of members of ours is that such things as higher tariff rates in Canada for offshore manufactured goods get built into a price factor in Canada that is not found in the US. So obviously there is a wide range of factors underlying this. Naturally, the recent imposition of the GST has done nothing but exacerbate a problem that was already very serious.

As a result of the complexity of the issue there are no simple solutions. A lot of people have talked about devaluing the dollar. That is what Third World countries do basically, and although I agree that there is a need for a more logical level of the dollar than we have now, people who are looking to that as a solution are just postponing a true solution to this issue; and indeed the longer you postpone it, as we know, the worse it gets and the more draconian the solution has to be. So although I have a bit of sympathy with that as a part of the answer to this problem, I do not think we can look for any quick fixes on this front.

We put together a study pertaining to Ontario last October, and Pierre Cl  roux is going to go through the highlights. He is also going to add some other information that has come out of another study and some more recent data that we have.

Mr Cl  roux: The first thing I would like to talk about is the extent of the problem. This graph shows the people crossing the border at the six most important border points in southern Ontario. That is including Niagara Falls, Windsor—the six most important ones.

Revenue Canada registers people crossing the border in three different ways. The first way is verbal declaration: As you cross the border you say, "I bought less than $100 worth of goods and I have been there for at least 48 hours." If you declare yourself like that you will be in the first category. Between 1987 and 1990 the increase of the number of people who make this kind of declaration was 285%, so in three years it almost tripled. The second category is the written declaration. It is for people who declare less than $300 worth of goods for a trip of at least seven days. Again, the increase is very significant. The last one, what they call the B-15 form, is actually people crossing the border and paying the duty on the products they bought in the US.

The first conclusion from this graph is, of course, that the cross-border problem is very important. When you see a 300% increase up to a 500% increase, that is significant. The second conclusion is, more and more people are ready to pay the duty on the product they buy in the US. They consider that, even by paying the duty, it is still worth it to cross the border, pay the duty and come back home. So the most important increase is actually in people paying the duty.

The second issue I would like to talk about is a report of a study by Ernst and Young. The study was done for the city of Sault Ste Marie. We know the cross-border shopping problem is very extensive there.

They asked people what they like about shopping in the US. As you can see from the graph, the most important one was the price. People are crossing the border because it is cheaper. They like the selection, they like the service in the store, they like friendly people, but the most important and distinct one is really the price. At the same time, people see some advantage to shopping in Canada. They find the quality of the merchandise better, it is cleaner here, it is safer here, but still they are crossing the border and the bottom line is the price. So it is really an argument against people who believe that better marketing strategy will really help our retailers in Ontario, because even if you have better marketing strategy, people are still looking at the price, and if the Sony Walkman is $50 cheaper in the US, they will just cross the border and go to the US.

To better understand why the prices are so different between the two countries—there are different factors, but we believe that taxation is one of the most important ones—we built a model which includes 12 different retailers in Ontario and the tax burden they bear compared to same retailers in Buffalo. Those data are based on what we call an average firm designed by Statistics Canada and calculated for each of those firms the total tax they have to pay every year, which includes payroll tax, municipal sales tax and income tax.

You can see that the people located in Toronto have a higher tax burden than those in Buffalo. Actually, the difference is pretty wide. If we take the example of a small store, if you are located in Buffalo you will bear half the tax burden you will support in Toronto. For the large firms the difference is smaller.

Mr Sterling: Can I just ask how old that slide is? How old is that information?

Mr Cl  roux: This was completed in October 1990. It is about six months old.

In this graph we distribute the total tax burden in different components. We can see that the killer here is really the municipal tax. If you are located in Toronto, you have to pay four or five times the municipal tax that you would pay in Buffalo. We understand that the cost of land in Toronto is greater than in Buffalo because of the specific situation in Toronto, but still, if you are a retailer in the Eaton Centre, you have to compete with the retailer in the Galleria in Buffalo to attract customers. So for the small firm the difference is very important, and there is one reason why the difference is larger for small firms than large firms.

There are two very bad taxes for small businesses, municipal tax and the payroll tax, two taxes which are independent of profit but are based on your intensity of labour and the intensity of the space you rent or you have. I think this graph is pretty clear. The income tax is pretty comparable if we look at the income tax of the two countries. The sales tax is a little lower in Buffalo, although the payroll tax is a little bit higher in Buffalo, but really the municipal tax made the difference.

We also compared another region of Ontario, Thunder Bay with Duluth. We were wondering why people in Thunder Bay are ready to drive four hours to shop in Minnesota, so we did this tax comparison, and although there are differences between the US and Canadian firms are not as important as Toronto and Buffalo, they are still pretty significant in some sectors. In only one of the 12 sectors is our tax burden competitive with the US.

Finally, if we combine the 12 sectors, we see that especially for small firms, if you are located in Thunder Bay or in Ontario, you will bear a higher tax burden than in Minnesota, and again, if the sales tax is a little bit lower in the US, but the income taxes are pretty comparable, the payroll tax is pretty much the same, the municipal taxes are definitely higher than in the US.

The last point I would like to make here is, you really have to see the impact of the fiscal structure of Ontario on small firms, because here almost 55% of the total tax burden is the payroll tax and the municipal tax for a small firm, which are really independent of profit. It is only about

% for the large firms, so we see this tax structure really hurts large firms compared to the small firms.

Ms Swift: Thank you very much, Pierre.

I would like to sum up and leave a lot of time for questions. There is further detail to this research that we would be happy to answer to.

I am sure a lot of the testimony you have been hearing indicates that the damage to our provincial economy that is being sustained because of this cross-border flow of dollars is of significant magnitude. It has the potential and indeed it is in the process of doing long-term damage to the economy.

Cross-border shopping is really only a symptom of a larger problem of uncompetitiveness that we are facing fairly widely in this province right now. I think as lobbyists we are hearing an awful lot from our retailer members, and it is even getting beyond the retail sector. Of course, that is at the front line and this will trickle back into wholesale, manufacturing, service, communities, where the base for the community collapses and on and on.

I think we have heard a lot of rhetoric from politicians. There has been a lot of taking of potshots at free trade, monetary policy, whatever basically is not their particular responsibility, pointing the finger at another level of government, "It's their problem." Well, naturally, it is all of one problem, and this type of rhetoric is not particularly helpful. It is also inaccurate, because on the basis of our research and others it is policies that are being pursued by all levels of government that are causing the problems for businesses. As a result, the solutions require co-operation among levels of government as well as a little more responsibility-taking by each level as to what it can do in its own bailiwick.

I have divided up our recommendations, if you will, into action into long term and short term. Some of them I expect you may have heard before.

The short-term possibilities, which naturally to some extent are things we can see some result from in a reasonably short period of time—the first thing in Ontario right now is not to increase the cost of business. The problem we have is a cumulative effect of taxes, interventionist government policies, payroll measures, legislation which imposes costs on business, higher wage costs, etc right down the line. The best thing to do in the short term is not to make it any worse than it already is. It is terrible right now, and I think this is showing very clearly that this is an awful situation.

I think too that a lot of seemingly well-meaning policies by governments are believed to be aimed at the large corporate community. Inevitably what we find is that the whole business community ends up paying for them. It could not be believed there is this wealth of ability to go over the corporate community or the business community. The differential effects between large and small are significant. Of course, the interesting thing about small firms is that they do not have the options that large firms do. As we know, large firms have a tendency to move out of the province, move their profits elsewhere or whatever. Small firms do not have that option. They more frequently just go out of business and I do not think any of that is particularly desirable for anyone.

As I heard Alisdair McKichan mention in the previous presentation, we sure do not like the GST. You probably know we fought it pretty vociferously as an organization. On the other hand, we have it now and it is causing all kinds of grief. So we would say that although we prefer not to have it at all, we feel that since we are stuck with this thing, at least for the next little while, harmonization of the GST with the PST has to be a main priority of all governments across Canada.

It is interesting to note that in Quebec, where they have sort of harmonized it, and in Saskatchewan, where they have also harmonized their provincial tax, there are discussions under way right now on the collecting of the harmonized tax at the border. Again, this is really putting a Band-Aid on the haemorrhage, but to try to discuss short-term solutions, I think we do have to look at the odd Band-Aid.

I think there is another thing that Ontario can do. In Ontario, we have over 40% of the national economy. To pretend that Ontario does not have an impact on monetary fiscal policy at the federal level is just folly. Of course it does. As a result, keeping our finances under control in Ontario, and as a result not pushing inflation or not pushing interest rates federally—I do not like what John Crow is doing, I do not think anybody does, but we do not have to make it any worse than it already is. Naturally Ontario, with such a large chunk of the national economy, is a major player. That is another positive thing to consider in the next little while.

I think in the long term there is no question that we need to look at a major review of all our tax policies in this country at all levels. I know Ontario is undertaking a partial look along those lines. We are sorry they are not looking at the whole range of taxes. We feel if you are going to undertake that major an undertaking then we should be looking across the board.

Certainly, when we talk about competitiveness and business competitiveness we are looking at governments having to be competitive as well. The government sector is not a particularly productive sector of the economy. We do not export government services. As a result, when we are looking at productivity as a nation and competitiveness, and basically our own standard of living down the road is what this all translates into, government competitiveness has to be looked at. Our current constitutional discussions may well result in a downsizing of government, maybe not quite in the way we all would have chosen, but less of our productive capital going to finance government is a desirable outcome in all jurisdictions.

I think too, as Pierre's data clearly showed, the pushing of costs off to the local level might seem expedient in the short term. The impact of it tends to hit the small business community disproportionately. We saw that pretty clearly with the market value reassessment activity in the Toronto area last year. The people hit most quickly and in such a large measure were the small firms; we find that regularly with these local tax issues.

In summary, the cross-border problem is really just proof positive of the kinds of conflicts that arise when policymakers try to pretend they can ignore market forces. Canadians are voting with their feet right now. We view what they are doing really as a form of tax protest. They cannot take it any more. The system is stretched to the limit and obviously it is a vicious cycle because the more money that leaves the country, the less we can afford those programs we would like to retain in Canada—better social networks and so on and so forth.

So if all governments would stop pointing the finger and blaming the other guy, whether it be the other level of government or whatever, and start to look co-operatively for some solutions, both within our own jurisdiction and with other levels of government, business, labour etc, I think we could start to address some of these problems we have discussed today.

I would be happy to take any questions or discussion you have at this time.

Ms M. Ward: I have a simple question, or I think it is. I would just like to ask you to explain that table, either table 1 or table 2. I saw this in another presentation and I do not understand the varying percentages. If you look at table 1, Toronto is shown as 100%. But why is there the variation between the other businesses in Buffalo? Variety stores show 55%, drugstores 70%. What is the basis of that? I did not understand that chart.

Mr Cl  roux: It is based on a statistical firm, an average firm that we took from Statistics Canada. For example, if in one sector there are more people because it is more intensive, like a shoe store—they have more people selling shoes than in a clothing store, for example—the payroll tax will affect them more. That is why in each sector you could have a different impact from the different taxes. If their profit in that sector is higher, the income tax will be more important for them than for another sector, so it is really because they represent a typical firm. You have a typical firm of 12 sectors. That is why it is different.

Ms Swift: Also, 100 was the index.

Ms Ganong: Comparable to the Canadian, then.

Mr Cl  roux: Yes.

1700

Ms Swift: I was just going to say that it is random. You can choose Buffalo as the index too. It is just an index measure, so you are really saying it is sort of in percentage terms. You would of course find differences if you compared the Toronto shoe store to the Toronto hardware store, but just for simplicity's sake we set that at 100 to regularize it, that was all.

Ms M. Ward: Okay, that answers my question.

Mr Sorbara: Just as a preliminary matter, I was interested in your comment about government services not being something that we export. Some of us are willing to trade the member for Guelph for your 25th draft choice, if you could just let us know what it is. We could make a deal perhaps after—

Ms Swift: Probably get an antidumping ruling or something on that.

Mr Sorbara: Ruth Grier will tell you where to do it too—my riding.

The Chair: That is a sore point here. Let's just forget the dumps.

Mr Sorbara: One other collateral matter: You mentioned your top priority was for governments to stop loading things on to the sector that you represent, because even if you just did that, it would be viewed as some relief. On that point, the government today announced a program to guarantee all wages where businesses go into bankruptcy or are in receivership or are abandoned. I am wondering if the Canadian Federation of Independent Business was broadly consulted on the preparation of that proposal.

Ms Ganong: Yes, we were. This government has been consulting us to death. I have never sat in so many consultations as I have this past winter with this government. Yes, we were consulted.

Mr Sorbara: Are you happy with the product?

Ms Ganong: As we said in the consultations, we really felt where the solution should have been addressed was at the federal government level. When you are talking about bankruptcy issues, the federal government has been dragging a large portion of its anatomy for the last 20 years in this area. If the federal government had gone with it, the provincial government would not have needed to move.

Mr Sorbara: One of the reasons why this committee is holding these hearings is, believe it or not, as a result of the court decision which recently upheld the provincial government's bill to regulate Sunday shopping. I do not want to go through the convoluted method by which it goes from a court decision to a committee hearing on a certain topic, but all I can say is, welcome to politics.

Does the Canadian Federation of Independent Business have a position on Sunday retailing?

Ms Swift: There is no question the things are interrelated. They do not have to be and the cross-border issue is by far the larger issue, if we want to measure it from an economic perspective. However, it is being looked at in a high time. If it happened to Sunday shopping, so be it.

We are as split as the retail council, typically. We have a lot of membership similar to the retail council. Also, just for your information, we are doing some updating of our own research work and our own data. As you know, we poll our members to death on everything under the sun and we are doing an update because we wonder if the Sunday shopping situation has thrown a new wrinkle. We are just in the process of doing it, so we do not have hard numbers but we will, probably, in two to three weeks.

I think we are going to see a softening of opposition to Sunday shopping, but it is like the lesser of two evils. That is really the only way to look at it. The large proportion of small retailers are not in favour; they are often family businesses. I am sure you have heard all those arguments. They are not in favour of open Sunday shopping. They tend to find it increases their costs and their revenues do not change. They maybe just grasp on to a bit of market share that they would lose otherwise, so there is really no incremental advantage to that.

However, right now we have the case where if your market share is moving across the border, it is a different ball game. Again, I should have some better information on this about three weeks down the road. We think it might be softening in terms of opposition, not because they like Sunday shopping but because they feel that loss of business to them, and ultimately perhaps the loss of their own business as a result, is a worse outcome.

Mr Sorbara: Without having polled your members on this subject, and I appreciate how important polling is to the CFIB, the government, in its wisdom or lack thereof, is considering the designing of sort of fictitious borders to identify border communities and grant them an exemption to a law which would otherwise close all stores on Sunday.

My first question is, how do you think your members would feel about that? And notwithstanding how they might feel about that, where would you recommend the border be drawn to identify border communities that would be exempt from a Sunday closing law and communities that would not be exempt?

Ms Swift: There is that type of policy. It has absolutely no foundation in economics or any kind of justification in our view. We have not specifically gone to our members on it because we have not had reason to, but all that kind of thing does is move the border. It just shifts the border from a Canada-US border to a Hamilton-Toronto, I do not know, whatever you want to talk about.

I would suspect—and I never like to second-guess our members, they do surprise us from time to time so we have to be careful, of course—that measure is just a non-starter and the maldistributive effects it will have even within the Canadian retailing community are enough reason not to contemplate it.

Mr Sorbara: Is there any other way your members would distinguish between those businesses which could open with the permission of the state and those businesses which the state could keep closed on Sunday?

Ms Swift: Given that those types of regulations which discriminate in one way or another are ones that our membership tends to oppose on principle in every other area, I really cannot see the principle behind it being a workable one for our constituency.

Mr Sterling: Thank you very much for coming here. I guess I have difficulty with all of our reluctance, including business, to criticize government spending regardless of what good or social benefit it might have to one group or another at this time in our recession. I have seen this government make two steps in the last week which have spent over $200 million of additional taxpayers' money. One was the unilateral decision by the Ministry of Education to move into integrated education without any consultation with the teaching profession, by withdrawing from a lawsuit in the Ottawa area. This means that in the future, handicapped students are going to have the opportunity to go to their local schools and incur all of the costs associated with providing that social service, a very difficult thing to argue against as a politician and as a caring human being.

Notwithstanding that, it is going to cost a significant amount of money. I do not think anybody believes the provincial government is going to pick up all of that tab for that kind of expenditure, and you can continue to expect to see your municipal taxes go higher as a result of it.

The second one was the announcement today about the wage protection fund, which is $175 million.

Mr Sorbara: Much more than that.

Mr Sterling: That is what their figure is. Notwithstanding my concern about the protection of wage earners, etc, we have not seen the details of it so it is very early to try to judge it. It concerns me that we continue to create social expectations at a time when we are seeing in this committee that we are not competitive with the social expectations we have already provided. I would like to hear them say, "We're going to cut $175 million from some other social program." Then it would be acceptable to me.

Interjection.

Mr Sterling: No, that is your job. You are spending the money, you have to cut the money. I am referring to the government. If it wants to spend more money, then I think it has the obligation to do the other end of it.

I found table 2 on the Thunder Bay-Duluth tax comparison interesting because the differences were not nearly as great, of course, as the Buffalo-Toronto. We have had in front of our committee, and I had met with, the Northwestern Ontario Associated Chambers of Commerce, I think, two weeks ago. They were talking very much about the cross-border shopping between Duluth and Thunder Bay. The border is 65 miles, but Duluth is 200 miles away, so in effect the border is 200 miles away in that whole area. When I look at the comparison in table 2, the tax comparisons do not seem that great, yet they seem to have a significant problem there. What are the other causes that are making people go? Why is the price cheaper in Duluth than it is in Thunder Bay?

Ms Swift: The other thing I should mention, by the way, is that what we are looking at is the tax cost to the firm—what gets built into their prices, in other words. So it would not include sales taxes, it would not include GST or PST, just as part of an answer to that question.

The other factors, naturally, are the ones that we did touch on very briefly earlier. There is no doubt that the relatively high value of our dollar and high value of interest rates in Canada versus the US are two biggies in terms of affecting all businesses, both their cost of doing business and the inducement for consumers to go across the border. They are not unique to Thunder Bay there. They are everywhere, naturally. The tax part is the part that we wanted to point out as one actionable area by all levels of government. I think we have less control, really, in our current environment, over interest rates and our exchange rate.

Mr Sterling: There was a suggestion made to me by some members of the Northwestern Chamber of Commerce in private discussion that the retailers in Thunder Bay were really just not competitive enough, were not sharp enough in their business practices.

Ms Swift: We have heard a lot of this, and frankly, I do not see too many people who say that, running businesses.

Our members really do not have a whole lot of sympathy for that kind of remark.

Mr Sterling: I do not imagine they would.

Ms Swift: Because a lot of them are scrabbling, have cut things to the bone, and they are finding a lot of the problem is what is imposed on them by various levels of government. They find they have got two hands tied behind their backs.

I am sure you could always find a firm that is not an effective marketer in Canada; and you could find very, very good retailers who are very competitive and sharp, etc, in Canada and the US. So I find that a real copout, frankly, because although there is a little fiddling around the edges—we can do with things like marketing sharpness, whatever you want to call it, as the data that Pierre presented showed pretty clearly, when your price is so significantly different; and I have seen some of the other testimony you have heard from John Winter and other people, where you have got massive differences, the wholesale price in Canada is incredibly higher than the retail price in the US—that really does not hold a lot of water in the big picture. That may be 1% of the problem.

Mr Cléroux: Taxation does not only affect retailers, it affects all levels of industrial sectors. We did another study which compared the tax burden of Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and BC, and you can see that manufacturers in Ontario support the highest tax burden in Canada. So if you manufacture something here you pay more tax, and you sell it to the wholesaler, who pays more tax, who sells it to the retailer, who pays more tax. At the end, it makes a big difference in the price.

Mr Sterling: Yes, so the retailer is going to get hit almost three times. You have focused on tax comparisons in your presentation. How much of the cost of business does that represent? Have you got any estimate of that? Even with the layering?

Mr Cléroux: No, it is difficult to know. It varies across different sectors, and we do not have any data on that. I look around and it is really difficult to assess, but it could be significant, especially for the small guy.

Mr Sterling: It really makes a difference—

Ms Swift: I would say between a third and a half again, depending, because there are all kinds of sensitivities to payroll taxes and so on. I am sure those data are available. It is just that we have not crunched them lately.

Mr Sterling: Pierre, I would like to see that other study if you would give me a copy of the one comparing the taxation rate across Quebec, BC and Ontario. Thank you.

Mr Sutherland: Your comment about how people are protesting with their feet against high taxes was interesting. I was wondering, if you told all these people who are shopping across the border, "Look, okay, we can cut down on the taxes, but then you have to pay for the health care yourself, you have to pay for the other benefits, the environmental standards, the occupational health and safety standards." And in terms of that, "Oh, by the way, if you decide to continue shopping, you can forget about your local businesses supporting your son's and daughter's hockey team and baseball team and you can forget about raising the money in the community for the community complex or the hospital campaign"—

Mr Sorbara: You are talking about giving them a lecture.

Mr Sutherland: No, the fact is that I do not believe a lot of people are realizing the impact...

Mr Sorbara: You should legislate a little lecture before everyone crosses the border.

Mr Sutherland: I will let you comment.

Ms Swift: Out of curiosity, I have done a fair bit of media on this issue and have been on some national shows. And I have never got so many letters from angry people asking me what right I have to say to them—mind you, it has been a little exaggerated by them perhaps, but people are very defensive about this issue. So I think a lot of people, more than you might think, make that connection. They know in the final analysis it is hurting their economy. You would really have to be a fool not to—to think that you can spend millions and billions of dollars. So I think that connection is being made. It is being made more and more and more of course as this problem gets more public profile.

But in the final analysis, if you are out of a job, if you are trying to get by on a low income—I was just listening to somebody who was unemployed in Vancouver and they were saying, "Boy, I am so glad I live close to the border because I can really save money." And you know that is the circularity of this problem.

You can do all the moral suasion you want, which is really what you are talking about. And most people might not want to admit it, but I think deep down they make those connections. But that short term advantage of pay less and what not overcomes that. That has not happened to them yet. Right now they are enjoying low prices for free health care, so in their current reality that is not a factor and it is not changing their behaviour. Quite the contrary. As this gets more publicity, more of it seems to happen. So I do not know. I wish it were that easy, but I do not think it is.

Mr Sutherland: You talked about the issue of competitiveness. I guess your view would be then, based on the information you provided here, that in retailing—necessarily manufacturing but in retailing—price is the key difference?

Ms Swift: Sorry, in terms of price of the final product or—

Mr Sutherland: Yes, in terms of price as the key factor—

Ms Swift: Certainly these slides seem to have indicated that it is the compelling factor in the cross-border shopping issue. That implies the price differential is so great that it overcomes any other benefits people may seek. You may buy something at a 50% reduction in price if the quality is a little bit less, say 10%, if your service is 10% less and so on, but you would not buy something that was only 10% less in price. I think what that indicates is price is the only factor but that the price differences in instance are so enormous they overcome the fact.

We saw that in Canada they feel they get better quality. They get better safety and better cleanliness and all these things. It is not enough though. Obviously price is different enough to drive them across the border. So maybe if the price differential was 10% we would not have a problem. But given that in some cases it is 100 to 200%, we have got a major problem.

Mr Sutherland: It is interesting to note in this survey about how people feel they are friendlier in the United States. That goes against the general thought that Canadians are friendlier than Americans.

Ms Swift: I do not think that is a general thought, is it? A lot of polls have shown that they think Canadians are nice.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. One other question, in the area of taxes and particularly municipal taxes—I am not familiar with how much education taxes the businesses in the United States are paying. Is there any comparison and do you have any of that information?

Mr Clérout: On the graph we show that we see the difference. I think what you want to know is, how much there is at the municipal level here compared to—

Mr Sutherland: Yes, for businesses paying education in comparison to businesses here.

Mr Clérout: It is very difficult because it really depends on the city. In Ontario and generally in Canada the province will structure the tax that the city can charge, but in the US it is more free. At the city level you can have a sales tax, school tax, garbage tax, property tax. But generally what we saw from this study is that the level of property tax is a lot lower because the contribution they have from the central government is more important.

What we see in Ontario and also in Quebec and British Columbia and other parts of the country is that the federal government cuts its transfers to the provincial government and the provincial government cuts its transfers to the municipal government. What I would like to say is that it increases the tax by the back door. That is really what they are doing and why we are seeing more and more difference between the municipal tax here and in the US.

Mr Fletcher: Just a few comments and a few questions. As far as cross-border shopping is concerned, this is not new. It did not just start yesterday. It has been going on for quite a while. In fact, I remember when I was younger, which is not that long ago, a lot of people I knew were skipping over to the United States, just across the border, to grab—usually it was beer, but other things. That was 18 or 19 years ago.

Ms Swift: It is just the volume.

Mr Fletcher: It has started to overflow now.

Ms Swift: And frankly vice versa.

Mr Fletcher: When did it really start picking up? About what year?

Ms Swift: Two and one half years ago, roughly. If you want to track in a time-trend type of thing, it really did move a lot with the exchange-rate changes, because we had an 82-cent dollar, for example. I think that is the interesting point. You know that the exchange rate and interest rates and those kinds of things fluctuate; they are very cyclical. They will come back down again and this problem will to some extent abate. But I think the important thing to think of from a policy perspective is the underlying structural burden that we are putting on our economy, on businesses—on consumers, for that matter. They are getting hit pretty hard with taxes at all levels too and have less to spend. So all of this is cumulative.

You have these fluctuations of exchange rates happening while your overall trend is a sort of creeping growth in the cost burden to your economy. As a result, over time, you get more and more vulnerable. Now we have a relatively high exchange rate, we are a lot more vulnerable than we were back in the mid-1970s when we had an exchange rate over $1. We did not see the same haemorrhage then as we are seeing now, because we are just that much more vulnerable. We are also right in the middle of a recession. So we have absolutely everything working against us at the same time right now.

Mr Fletcher: About two or three years ago, the actions that were being taken by the provincial government, in combination with what was going on, have now come to a point where there is a—

Ms Swift: That is true. All levels of government over the 1980s—it was not that the 1980s were unique in this respect; I think we just saw more of it in the 1980s. We had a period of economic growth as a province and even as a country through most of the 1980s, since about 1983. What we saw was that governments, instead of using that period to get our fiscal house in order, to pay down debts and so on, used it to expand government, to increase expenditures, to make forays into areas of the economy they did not make forays into before. Then the economy turned down and we still have a fixed cost burden attached to all those programs as well as high taxes to pay off those debts that did not get taken care of in the good times and so on.

So there is no question, we are paying now in spades for policies that have been pursued by governments at all levels through the past decade and, for that matter, the past 30 years.

Mr Fletcher: So if we did nothing—and some people say that is what we are doing—if we did not do anything when it came to raising taxes or anything else, that would not alleviate the problem? That would not fix anything?

Ms Swift: It would not alleviate the problem. We need some serious tax reform. I would certainly rather do it in an environment before our economy has collapsed. You see the federal government's most recent budget, and you wish they had scope to give some fiscal stimulus to the economy. They do not have it because they are just up to their eyeballs in debt. And provincial governments are not exactly exempt from that either. So you see how hamstrung we become. You are forced to take solutions at the times you do not want to take them, and in more extreme ways than you would like to take them.

So I am saying the do-nothing approach is a short-term minimum. Do not make it worse. It is already severely bad. Of course, making it better is the ideal solution, but we are not neophytes in this ball game. We do not think we are going to see tax decreases in the next six to eight months. By tax, I do not just mean income tax or sales tax. I mean payroll taxes, things that cost business money, and that can be any kind of interventionist policies right across the board. So no, doing nothing is not enough, but it is better than doing something negative.

Mr Fletcher: As far as cross-border shopping is concerned, if I were to go across the border to buy groceries, the store I am buying them from in Detroit—I cannot remember the name; I know they are affiliates or subsidiaries of companies here in Canada. The money is going to the company. The company is not suffering. I am still spending my money with the company that owns the store.

Ms Swift: Is it a Canadian-owned company?

Mr Fletcher: No, it is part of the US conglomerate that owns most of our stores anyway.

Ms Swift: Not in our constituency.

Mr Fletcher: I know what you mean, but when I am saying "groceries," I know that Zehr's has branches in the United States.

Ms Swift: A Canadian sub or whatever.

Mr Fletcher: Right. And so if I am doing that—and I was talking to a person who is setting up shop in the United States and he said that his startup costs are 150th of what it would cost to start up here. That is why they are setting up shop down there, and yet they are going to continue to live in Canada and just operate their store across the border.

Ms Swift: There are some firms doing that. For your information, we have a survey out right now on trade issues generally, and we are actually asking our members—we know we have heard anecdotal stuff, but we want to be able to quantify it—"Are you considering setting up an operation in the US or elsewhere?" The US is the most likely venue. And yes, that does happen. Let's face it, we hear from our members that they are willing to pay a premium to stay in Canada, but it is like the price issue for the consumer: Once that premium gets beyond a certain breaking point, they either have to go or not stay in business any more. It becomes a crunch issue. We are starting to hear that the crunch is being reached now; it is no longer that 20% differential they are willing to pay because they want to stay in Canada. They just cannot stay in Canada and continue in business any more. When you get to that point, you know, we are in big trouble.

Mrs Sullivan: I am very interested, as we go through these hearings, in the discussions relating to the competitive factors attached to decisions that ultimately purchasers make in going across to the States to buy merchandise. I have looked at several studies and I note that your study concentrates particularly on tax competitiveness. There are other factors that other economists have looked at, adding them to the tax factors, including the cost of health, the cost of workers' compensation, the cost of hydro, for example. What they show is that, on a cost-comparison basis for the basic economic facts, there is more of a competitive factor than you would believe by just examining tax.

There are several major economists, not the least of which is the Toronto-Dominion Bank, which have looked at that issue. I think Coopers & Lybrand have done a study that is comparable, and I believe the feds have as well. The Ministry of Treasury and Economics has been making a study of a kind of a study for a period of time.

We understand the argument of the CFIB and that one particular sector of input that CFIB members are concerned about. I think the Toronto-Dominion Bank said that tax structure is verging on being uncompetitive part of the full component of costs and that any additional steps would put the tax factor right over the edge. You are saying it is already over the edge and there is still a discussion there.

If we look at all those factors, I would like to have comments on what studies CFIB has done in relation to other costs. If your conclusion is that the other costs imposed by governments do indeed add up to a competitive factor, then what other areas provide the problems? I hear from retailers that one is the extremely high cost charged by wholesalers for goods supplied to them, partly because of Canadian standards, whether it is an energy efficiency standard in white goods or CSA standards on electrical products, or whatever. There is a sense among retailers in my community that a lot of the distributors and wholesalers are gouging. I just wonder if you would like to go from there.

Ms Swift: I am aware of the other studies that have been done. We never would presume to say that tax is the only stretch the only factor. It is one, and it is one that we chose to hive off in this particular study. We will certainly be doing more work to look at the wider factors. It happens to be one, though, where you can say, "Okay, that is actionable in this way," whereas things like the exchange rate and interest rates are driven not only by domestic factors but by international ones. We have control over that point, but we certainly do not have the control we have over our own tax levels. That was one reason we decided to focus on it.

Also, I think you should keep in mind that studies by the Toronto-Dominion Bank's and others look at the macro-picture. We purposely divided out small and large firms because in the macro sense you may find X is competitive, but it is the differential between small and large firms that is very interesting, and without exception small firms bear a proportionately higher burden. There are a lot of reasons for that.

Part of it is simply the same reason that the middle class pays the brunt of personal income taxes, because that is where all the numbers are and they have less mobility. As you probably well know, if you tax a large corporation more, especially if it is a multinational, especially if it is foreign-owned multinational, it just cooks its books and shifts its profits somewhere else and you end up actuing less revenue for government as a result. The small business community is a much more captive, vulnerable market for taxers to get at.

In terms of wholesale prices, I was quite intrigued by data that Winter came up with recently where he just used a few product categories and tracked their evolution. There are a lot of things that affect what a Canadian retailer pays. We have members in the wholesale industry, too, of course. We have members right across the board and none of them is exactly rolling in dough these days either. I would be interested to see if American wholesalers are really gouging Canadian wholesalers.

I think we have to realize too that we do have a smaller economy. We do not have the same economies of scale; we never will. We never have, either, so that is not a new argument; that has been around for ever. That is not a causal factor, but it is a contributing factor and it is part of the reason why we usually tend to have a dollar that is valued lower than the US dollar. We do have certain cost advantages in this country—low population, large geography and all that kind of thing—which we are probably always going to have.

I do think there is undoubtedly some gouging going on here or there. I suspect there is never a time where there is not. I do not really have particularly good data on it, but I am pursuing some of the Winter analysis; it just intrigued me, because I do not know the answer. I know part of it is the third-country tariff. I know there is a difference in many areas, the tariff we pay in Canada versus the American competitor's much lower rate, so naturally our dollar is at a disadvantage right off the bat. And the chain of distribution issues and so on are all important contributing components, no question, but I do not have an answer as to where the gouging is most predominant right now. I just know that all businesses and all sectors are struggling here desperately in Canada right now, so I cannot imagine anybody is really raking it in in a big way.

Mrs Sullivan: Probably this issue has been exacerbated by the recession and may be seen as an easy out, as well, in terms of the identification of an issue that retailers can point to. Clearly the evidence is that the increase in cross-border shopping has had an enormous impact, but one of the decline in the retail sector may be related to the recession as much as to cross-border shopping.

Ms Swift: No question. It is the worst possible time for everything to be going in the same direction. There is no doubt it is a cumulative impact.

The Chair: Just while you are talking about economies of scale, one of the big selling points of the free trade deal was that Canadian businesses were going to be able to take advantage of economies of scale. In my riding, I met a manufacturer. He has been told that the parent company will not allow his branch plant to compete in the American market with the product that it makes there. So he has no economies of scale. He is confined to the Canadian market by a dictate from the parent company. Have you seen any kind of studying or matched any of that kind of—

Ms Swift: Not really. Naturally, we do not have any foreign-owned multinationals in our membership. One of our membership criteria is the firm has to be Canadian-owned. I have heard that, talking with people in other business associations who do represent some of these larger firms. I do not think that is typical. In most instances, business is business. I know of some instances where it has turned out, for whatever reason—maybe there is a plant already there or whatever—a US plant has been shut down in favour of the Canadian location. So I do not think it is universal.

There is no doubt, however, that free trade and then cranking the dollar up to 87 cents was just unbelievably ludicrous policy-making, because all businesses were predicated on how they would deal with the free trade agreement on roughly the value of the dollar that prevailed at the time, which was around 82 cents; ideally, maybe even an 80-cent dollar, a little bit less.

The Chair: Sorry, the dollar in 1987, when the free trade deal was signed, was 72.5 cents.

Mr Sorbara: That's right.

Ms Swift: Was it that low?

The Chair: Yes, it was 72.5 cents. And what is interesting is that the central bank rate went up the Thursday after the free trade deal was signed. It started to climb and it has stayed climbing ever since then.

Ms Swift: Except for the last six to eight months or so. I do not subscribe to that kind of paranoia.

The Chair: I think I have one question left with Mr Mammoliti.

Mr Mammoliti: You mentioned earlier that in your opinion 95% of the public—I believe it was—know the damage they are doing to the economy by shopping across the border. Do you believe that we can work on their guilt perhaps, somehow? Perhaps advertising of some sort may be a solution. I do not know.

Ms Swift: I do not think it is a bad idea to expand that awareness as reasonably as possible, but still and all, knowing human nature, you know the big picture but what you do is what you do. As I said, I have been amazed at the very negative mail and phone calls from consumers who have heard me say—not necessarily that they are doing the wrong thing. You know what is motivating them and in many instances you have a lot of sympathy, because these are people who are out of jobs, who are operating on a fixed income if they are elderly, and so on. So you understand what is driving them to do it, but like I say, they get very mad at you for suggesting they are unpatriotic and that kind of thing, if that is the way they read it, and some have.

This sense of protest, "I'm not going to take it any more," is definitely out there in the consumer community. Our retailers are hearing it, post-GST in particular. That was a real sort of lightning rod. Things were bad before then, things have been worse since and they are hearing: "I'm not paying the GST. I'm going across the border."

So I do not think increasing awareness is a bad idea at all, but I think people are aware, and the more you try to work on that guilt, I think they will just resent you, to be honest, rather than change their behaviour.

Mr Mammoliti: Thank you for answering that. Has it increased substantially since 1 January, since the GST has come in?

Ms Swift: We do not really know, because some of the data are a little slow to come. Interestingly enough, coming down here today I just took off the wire at the office, "Sales at department stores tumbled in February after falling sharply in January, Statistics Canada said." These are national figures.

Mr Mammoliti: I personally think it has.

Ms Swift: Gotten worse?

Mr Mammoliti: Gotten worse.

Ms Swift: I think it has too, on the basis of anecdotal evidence. I just do not have a nice neat figure that it has gotten X% more.

Mr Mammoliti: That brings me to my next point. You mentioned earlier that we should not be pointing the finger, and I really believe that we should.

Ms Swift: Okay, let's say, not exclusively point the finger.

Mr Mammoliti: Let me finish. I believe that we should be pointing the finger. I believe that we have touched on three or four different areas that pertain to the federal government and what it has done to make this problem worse. Interest rates, the federal cuts and taxes are just examples of what we talked about.

Ms Swift: That is fine. We know you are going to point fingers because you are politicians and that is what you do.

Mr Mammoliti: But at the same time—

Ms Swift: Exactly.

Mr Mammoliti: —we do have to work together, and I am not convinced that the federal government wants to work with us. I am not convinced of that.

Ms Swift: In what respect? How do you mean? In harmonizing the GST with the PST?

Mr Mammoliti: No, in anything. Let's take the federal budget, for instance, and all the cuts that they have made. That proves to me they do not want to work together with us.

1740

Ms Swift: We do not say the political challenge is a small one, and we are very critical of what the federal government is doing too, as you probably know. That is fine. I guess what we see, and what our members certainly see—because they are the ones who are losing their homes and their businesses and something they have worked on for 20 or 30 or whatever years—is a lot of politicians pointing fingers with a lot of political rhetoric. No one is without sin in this particular area and in the whole broad area of economic policy. So pointing fingers is fine, but let us not do that exclusively.

Mr Mammoliti: It is just a comment, that is all. You mentioned it and I just threw that out because I feel guilty not pointing fingers.

Ms Swift: We would never want that to happen and we would never expect people not to point fingers.

Mr Sorbara: Just one final comment, Mr Chairman, because I am just sitting in on this committee. If our guests and our witnesses care to comment after, I would appreciate that. I have appreciated their testimony so far.

It arises from the comments that you were making, Chairman, about that manufacturer who is a subsidiary. I think you are right, and increasingly with the free trade agreement there is, among trans-nationals, going to be a dramatic rationalization of one North American market. It may be that a Canadian branch of that trans-national company has an opportunity to bid on supplying an identified portion of that North American market, but it may well be that the subsidiary or component of the company does not have the opportunity to bid. I think the unfortunate reality of the free trade agreement that we are saddled with now is that it takes away the opportunity to bid and to participate in supplying the North American market will be based on competitiveness and in a market that has in one jurisdiction 26 million people and in another market 250 million people, we are going to have to look at issues on competitiveness.

That comes right down to the question of cross-border shopping, to the extent that the indicia of competitiveness are way out of whack. The problem of having to stop and talk to a customs official is not going to be a significant impediment to the decisions that consumers make. Cleanliness and security are going to be minor issues. The harmonization of hours, the harmonization of standards are things that we are going to have to be confronted with.

It was, I think, central to the free trade debate what was going on in Ontario and Canada that our social standards would be threatened, and we are going to see that happening; and our safety nets were going to be threatened, and we are going to see that happen, because in some respects there is a growing concern and growing belief that we cannot afford them any more because the very economy is threatened. I do not have any answer other than, on the issue of cross-border shopping, I think it is crucial that we start looking at reasonable standards, given the marketplace that we really are in.

Ms M. Ward: In terms of taxation, I am looking at your charts here and I think one of the things that the Tax Commission will be looking at is different types of taxation and what is funding what. It seems to me that a shift from local municipal taxes to income—you know, a buck is a buck—would certainly be very beneficial to small business. Overall, you cannot expect to change the picture as a whole, because you cannot reduce the amount of money, but would you agree that it would be beneficial to small businesses?

Ms Swift: Yes, that is the main point we found in our research, that really the main reason small businesses ended up paying a higher dollar overall in taxes was that they had this higher component of income-sensitive taxes, in both local property taxes and payroll taxes. It does not matter if you are not making money. You do not pay income taxes but you sure pay all those other taxes. There is this stable chunk. Now, mind you, that is not true for governments like them, because you can forecast the tax income stream. Why do you think the GST has so much deal? It is hard to escape paying it. That is the same g with payroll taxes. So from a government perspective, rally, the downside is that in a downturn you get much e of a hit on your revenues. Mind you, in the final ysis, do you want businesses around? Presumably, in long term, it is more desirable to have a functioning conomy than the dips in the recession of tax revenues.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon and your comments. The committee is adjourned till next Thursday.

The committee adjourned at 1746.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 18 April 1991

The committee met at 1008 in committee room 1.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

UNITED FOOD AND COMMERCIAL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION

The Chair: We will begin with the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union. Tom Kukovica, Tim Catherwood, if you would begin please.

Mr Kukovica: Thank you very much. You have a kit in front of you where on one side is our presentation and on the other side you have a photocopy of John Winter's survey which was done in May 1990. And there are some clippings from newspapers. At the same time, we have given you a copy of a campaign which our union is doing right now with companies in British Columbia.

The United Food and Commercial Workers International Union is pleased to have an opportunity to appear before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to present our union's views on cross-border shopping. UFCW Canada is Canada's largest private-sector union, representing some 180,000 members in this country. UFCW members are employed in more than 20 sectors of the economy, including the retail, service, meatpacking, food processing, brewing and beverage production, fish, general merchandising, health care, shoe and leather, banking industries. UFCW presents more than 70,000 men and women in Ontario.

Our union is very concerned about the dramatic increase in cross-border shopping that has occurred in recent months; not just in Ontario, but all across Canada. We are concerned about the damage this is causing to the economy and the long-term harm that will be caused if this tide is not stemmed.

Cross-border shopping is causing the loss of billions of dollars of economic activity for Canadian businesses—losses for retailers, orders for manufacturers and business service companies coming from both consumers and service companies. Many thousands of Canadian jobs have been lost in the retail, manufacturing and service sectors and countless other jobs are threatened. Buying in the United States is reducing the revenues of governments at all levels, placing new pressures on the already strained fiscal condition of these governments.

There are several reasons for the increase in cross-border shopping:

The recession that has hit this country and is forcing Canadians to seek the lowest possible price for the goods they consume;

The high level of the Canadian dollar, particularly against the US dollar;

High taxes in Canada, especially federal taxes;

The introduction of the GST;

The promise of cheaper goods and easy border transit that was put forward by the federal government to boost the Canada-US free trade agreement, particularly during the 1988 election campaign;

Reduced duties on US-made goods under the FTA;

Lower prices in the US resulting from economies of scale, razor-thin profit margins, currency advantages, lower taxes, restricted social programs and the absence of regulations, lower labour costs and lower energy costs;

Lower gasoline prices;

Reduced enforcement of Canadian laws and collection of duties and taxes at the border;

Reduced confidence in Canada by many Canadians and US investment and advertising designed to attract Canadian shoppers.

The increase in the number of Canadians shopping in the US has been monumental. This has occurred all across Canada at border points from east to west.

In December 1990 alone, 5.5 million Canadians crossed the US border, an increase of 24% or one million people over the same month a year previously. Of these crossings, 4.5 million were one-day trips.

At the Ambassador Bridge and Windsor-Detroit Tunnel, the number of persons paying duty on goods coming into Canada has increased 500% over the past three years from April 1988 to March 1991. Fifteen thousand vehicles now cross the border in the Niagara region daily.

In British Columbia, cross-border shopping trips increased 400% between 1987 and 1991. Statistics Canada reports a 15.2% increase in shopping in the US in January 1991 over the same month in 1990. Sources in US border towns are reporting an 8% to 10% increase in sales per month. And to see the effect that this is having on Canadian sales, one could look at January 1991 when a snowstorm hit the lower mainland, all but stopping cross-border shopping. During this shutdown, Canadian milk sales jumped 15% to 20%.

It is hard to calculate how many Canadian jobs have been lost because of cross-border shopping. In trying to measure these losses, the recession, the FTA and the many other causes of job loss in Canada must be considered. Losses must be also measured in terms of direct losses and indirect losses which occur in related or service companies and sectors.

In January 1991, the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors estimated that Ontario alone was losing $3 million per week to the US in grocery sales, and this is translated to 1,000 full-time and part-time jobs lost.

UFCW knows that between June and November 1990, 202 full-time jobs disappeared at A&P in Ontario. At Loblaw's, the total number of hours worked decreased by 3.14% in the period June to December 1990. In both cases, these losses occurred in spite of the brief advent of Sunday shopping.

To these job losses can be added many hundreds of workers who have suffered and will yet suffer from lost hours of work. In many retail food stores and throughout the service sector, workers, often part-time and largely female, are seeing the number of hours of work available to them lowered by 50% to 75%.

You have to understand that in the service sector, 75% of all the jobs are held by part-time people. So it is very hard to measure how many layoffs there are because part-timers do not get laid off. The part-timers lose hours of work, from 20 to 18 to 15 to 10 and finally to a minimum of maybe 4 a week. So it is not necessarily layoffs, but it is hours lost.

Beer sales in Ontario have been hard hit, particularly in border towns, where there has been a sales decline of up to 50%. We represent all the Brewers Retail stores in the province of Ontario. The brewing industry is, however, an important one to Canada. It provides good employment and strong benefits to a number of other sectors, as well as significant revenues to government.

The job losses and reduced hours are causing lost business and employment in related and service sectors. For every job lost in the retail sector, at least one other job will be lost in manufacturing, wholesaling, farming etc. For example, the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors has reported that in addition to 1,000 grocery industry jobs being lost, another 1,000 jobs have been lost as of January 1991 in the distribution and farming sectors.

We must all be concerned that the job losses that have occurred so far will increase and multiply as the GST's full impact is felt, the recession continues, unemployment rises and the lost business works its way through the economy into the manufacturing and service sectors. More job losses and many plant closures can, unfortunately, be expected unless action is taken to stem the flow of Canadian dollars to the US.

In terms of volume of sales lost, the story is a disaster and getting worse. In British Columbia, the loss of business due to cross-border shopping is expected to exceed $1 billion in 1991. The figures for Ontario will be far greater, perhaps more than $2 billion.

The major areas of loss are in food, gasoline, liquor, beer, shoes, clothing and electronics, with food appearing to be about half of the total spent in the US.

In terms of gasoline, figures from the Niagara region show that sales fell from 400 million litres in 1988 to 300 million litres in 1990. It is estimated that more than 50% of the 100 million litres of gas used yearly in Sault Ste Marie is now purchased in the States.

The major causes of cross-border shopping have been created by the federal government. The federal government's policies have destroyed Canadian industry and caused the loss of thousands of Canadian jobs. Throughout, the government in Ottawa has worked to shift the burden for the changes they are forcing upon the economy squarely on to working men and women and their families. Canadians today are facing enormous pressures because of unemployment, uncertainty over their financial security, reduced incomes, increased taxes, the GST, continued high interest rates.

Canadian businesses have also suffered from federal government policies. A combination of policies served to reduce their competitiveness and make them vulnerable. These policies include high interest rates, the value of the Canadian dollar, the lack of any form of industrial strategy, the lack of Canadian research and development, problems created by the imposition of trade policies, notably the GST, reduced tariffs under the trade agreement and the removal of federal assistance subsidies with no new programs to allow Canadian businesses to gear up to compete in the global marketplace.

The economic policies of the federal government have been a disaster for business, for workers, for the country.

1020

Many Canadians have, unfortunately, lost confidence in Canada. Many Canadians now feel that they must look out for themselves and they are displaying less concern for their neighbours, their community, and the state of the country. They are being led to abandon what has been true in this country and to look away from the bright future that once was ours. In the process, Canadian jobs and industry and the tax base at all levels are being damaged. In the long term, Canadian social programs and services and indeed our standard of living are threatened.

The uncertainty and loss of confidence that have been created have served to push consumers towards lower prices or at least what they perceive to be lower prices. In particular, older consumers, families with restricted incomes, and persons who have become unemployed, are under pressure to buy where the prices seem lowest.

Where it could once be said that the propensity to shop across the border could be related to distance, many people in Ontario now appear willing to travel further and more frequently in search of better bargains. This has made much of Ontario, in fact, a border community.

The federal government's 1988 free trade campaign and particularly the promise of lower prices resulting from the agreement, served to raise the awareness and expectations of Canadians with regard to prices. It served to highlight the possibility of lower prices in the US and remove Canadian consumers' guilt about cross-border shopping.

The new psychology was, to an extent, reinforced by the appreciation of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the US dollar that occurred in 1988 to 1990. The appreciation effect gave Canadian consumers a new discount for shopping in the US. In the recent months, the continued high value of the Canadian dollar has led many consumers to treat the dollar as being at parity with the American dollar. This viewpoint would not exist with a more realistic Canadian dollar value.

Sunday shopping has nothing to do with cross-border shopping. Canadians are going to the United States in record numbers and these numbers continued to grow even during the period when stores were open in Ontario on Sundays. In British Columbia, where Sunday shopping existed for a number of years, the existence of open Canadian stores has not slowed traffic to the US. Canadian tended to make their trips to the US on Friday to day—the traditional weekend—or on one of these days, all in search of better prices, not Sunday shopping. To illustrate this point, in a Windsor telephone survey in May of 1990, John Winter Associates Ltd, asked the following question: "In the near future, do you think your shopping in the United States will likely increase, decrease or remain the same? Why?" Not one person responded that Sunday day openings or closings would increase or decrease shopping in the US.

Under these circumstances, Sunday store openings in Ontario have no value and merely serve to increase Ontario retailers' costs and disrupt and erode the lives of workers and their families.

The pricing systems for retailers in Ontario and the United States are very different and seriously impact on the ability of Canadian stores to compete with many prices in the US. It is difficult to understand why suppliers charge Ontario retailers more than American retailers for the same product, including identical brand-name products. It is, however, easy to see that such a differential, which can be up to three times the US price, has an effect on the ability of Canadian retail firms to compete. This differential represents a bigger problem than higher taxes which are in turn used to support valued social programs and government services.

In the area of agricultural pricing, American support for farmers comes through taxpayer subsidies, while the Canadian system works on the basis of supply management programs. The result is that the American approach does not tend to affect the shelf price of products, while Canadian prices are directly affected by marketing board decisions. This differential is a major reason why turkeys in the US, for example, can cost as little as one third of the price of Canadian turkeys.

Canadians are proud of the standard of living that has been achieved in this country and wish to see it maintained. We are proud that many serious social problems that exist south of the border have not become serious concerns in Canada. We are also anxious to see important valued Canadian social programs and government services, municipal, provincial and federal, maintained.

Canadians who shop in the United States should consider the kind of society that exists south of the border and ask themselves, "Is this what I want in Canada?" Do Canadians favour a society where one in four children under the age of 12, or some 17 million children, go hungry; 32 million people live below the poverty line, which is set at $200 per year for a single person and $12,675 for a family of four; and three million people are homeless, including some one million children?

Canada is a country with admirable and desirable strengths in municipal, provincial and federal services, health care, social programs and standards of living. These strengths do not, unfortunately, count in the price of the product, but without them, the enjoyment Canadians get from using products will not be the same. We do not believe Canadians want to give up these benefits, but at the same time, they must realize that it is not possible to have the cake and eat it too.

Every dollar spent in the US represents one less dollar to be spent in Canada, one less dollar to employ a Canadian worker, keep a Canadian business operating, pay for a service and keep a community strong and vibrant. While we understand what has caused cross-border shopping, we none the less say it cannot continue. If it does, Canadians must realize what the price will be in terms of employment, services and programs and our standard of living.

While it is essential to stop or at least slow the flow of cross-border shopping as quickly as possible, it is also important not to develop Band-Aid solutions or quick fixes that will not last. In this regard, UFCW Canada is prepared to work with the government of Ontario to develop and implement lasting workable solutions to this problem which will strengthen the economy of this province and benefit all the people of Ontario. We believe there are a number of solutions to the problem of cross-border shopping that should be examined.

In our view, most of the solutions required to address the cross-border shopping problem only the federal government can bring about. This includes reduced interest rates, a realistic dollar value, elimination of the GST, policies that promote fair taxation for Canadian workers and policies that promote full employment and development of the economic potential of Canada's regions.

In addition, only the federal government can take steps to ensure that Canadian laws are enforced and taxes and duties are collected at border crossings. Clearly, the resources committed to this tax are woefully inadequate, and in spite of the best efforts of customs employees only a portion of the duty and taxes due are being collected.

UFCW Canada supports the efforts of the customs and excise union of the Public Service Alliance of Canada that are aimed at securing more border personnel and enforcing better collection of duties and taxes. It is estimated that 1,000 new personnel are needed to adequately deal with the flow of cross-border traffic. Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, has in fact acknowledged this by requesting resources along these lines from Treasury Board.

Unfortunately, the resources needed are not likely to be committed by the federal government. The Minister of National Revenue appears to be more interested in smooth traffic flow than in addressing the problems of lost revenue and smuggling, let alone the loss of Canadians jobs and industry.

Consideration should be given to developing a new border levy for shoppers crossing the border. Just as persons involved in airline travel and commercial traffic to the US pay for customs service, so too should cross-border shoppers.

It is important that tourists coming to Canada not be impeded by cross-border traffic nor be charged any fee for border transit. We should do everything possible to encourage Americans to visit Canada through express lanes at the border and special promotions or advertising.

1030

The government of Ontario has recognized the seriousness of cross-border shopping and is anxious to work with labour and business to find solutions to this problem. Given the province's limited jurisdiction in this area and the difficult economic and fiscal conditions in Ontario, the provincial government has limited room to manoeuvre.

The provincial sales tax must be collected on all goods bought by Ontarians in the US. The province should also explore the feasibility of applying special charges on goods brought over the border, especially by same-day shoppers. If we are to lose revenue to cross-border shopping that will impact on Ontario jobs, business and government programs, this revenue should be largely recovered.

The best answer to cross-border shopping may be to have the province join with labour and business to convince shoppers to stay home and put their money to work in Ontario to create Ontario jobs, Ontario industry and a strong economy in the province.

A strong campaign should be launched that will explain in clear terms what is at stake and what is lost when Canadians shop in the US. This campaign should reach every worker and every household to explain that while cross-border shopping may produce short-term savings, it is irreparably damaging the province's economy, causing the loss of jobs and threatening our ability to provide valued, quality social services and programs.

The labour movement has a key role to play in such a campaign. Unions should communicate with their members to encourage them to stay home and buy in Ontario. Employers and business should use their resources to promote a "Buy Ontario—Stay at Home" campaign. Companies could advertise, tie their involvement in the campaign to promotions and discounts and do what they can to set fair and stable prices.

The provincial government can be the catalyst for this joint venture campaign. The province can provide leadership and work to draw labour, business, the municipalities and community and social groups together. The government could commit resources to advertising and to developing information materials for distribution.

Together, the partners in this campaign, who must also be partners in building a better future for the province, must pressure the federal government to join with them in the campaign and to take the immediate steps required to reduce the pressures that are behind cross-border shopping. We must stem the flow of goods across the border.

Cross-border shopping is a critical problem that must be addressed quickly for the benefit of everyone. A great deal is at stake: jobs, economic activity, the ability of governments to sustain programs and services and, in the end, our standard of living.

UFCW Canada stands prepared to work with the provincial government, business, the municipalities and community and social groups. Together we can beat this problem, and in the process build a stronger future for Ontario and Canada.

Let me just make two other comments. One is that yesterday Statistics Canada reported that same-day trips to the US went up by 27.3%, and 3.9 million people went over the border in February 1991, which was an increase from 3.1 million a year ago.

The other thing I want to add is that there is a perception by consumers, by everybody, I guess, that going on one-day trips and shopping in the US is legal, which is a very false perception because it is totally illegal unless you pay duties and taxes. There are a lot of consumers who they are allowed to buy milk and meat in the State; bring it across. It is totally illegal. You are not allowed to bring meat across the border. It is against customs regulations. But what is the federal government doing? Absolutely nothing. There is no campaign to tell customers they are not allowed to buy some of the products, that it is illegal.

I had never been across the border in Niagara Falls in my life. I went there two weeks ago. Let me tell you my experience: I went over the border, and when I came back the same day at 6 o'clock, I got a slip of paper saying, "What did you buy?" I bought exactly $202 worth. So I said, "Go to customs, and please pay." I went to customs and had to wait an hour and a half to get a number, and I had to wait another half-hour to pay; I paid $56.25 duty and tax. What I saw amazed me. I saw customs people asking customers with the same slip as me, "How much did you have on your slip?" Anybody who had below $105 was told: "Don't bother. Please don't go inside and get a number. Don't pay, just go on." That is what is happening in cross-border shopping.

Mr Jamison: I have a couple of questions, but the first one is if you could expand on your proposed levy for cross-border shoppers.

Mr Catherwood: I am not exactly sure of the details, but the idea would be that, just as your airplane ticket has a customs charge built in or truckers are charged as they go across the border, some sort of fee should be put on same-day shoppers, $5 or $10, just to make the point that when you go across and back there is a cost involved, just to act as somewhat of a deterrent.

Mr Kukovica: I guess the other point is that if you know the law, that you are not allowed to shop in the States the same day without declaring—you have to be outside the country 24 hours to bring in $20 worth.

Mr Kwinter: You have to be outside 24 hours to bring in $100 worth, but you can be out for the day and bring—

Mr Kukovica: Sorry, it is $20 the same day, $100 24 or 48 hours, and $300 once a year, after seven days. The perception is that you are allowed to shop at any time and bring back anything you want.

Mr Jamison: We have been told by other groups that when the GST was actually implemented there was a noticeable jump in cross-border shopping. Some groups have indicated the increase was as high as 15% or 20% with the advent of that tax. Have you any background on that, anything to add?

Mr Catherwood: The numbers we have are probably the same as you have heard. For example, in British Columbia it went up 15% the first month, in January, and sales across the border stayed at that level. I do not think there is any doubt that consumers are more conscious of the price of things they are buying nowadays because of the GST, that sales on this side of the border are down because people are going across there to avoid the GST.

We have seen ads out of American border towns where they flaunt the fact that if you buy down there, there is no GST. Somebody told me a story about being in Florida and eball game, and the world's best salesman was there. When he came up the aisle to sell cold beer, and he knew the place was full of Canadians, he yelled, "Cold beer, no T," and he sold more than he ever had before. People are aware of the fact that the GST exists here and it does not exist down there.

Mr Jamison: You also cite the high level of the Canadian dollar as a major factor—almost a par situation. What are your opinions on that?

Mr Catherwood: The problem has been twofold, in my view. First of all, the Canadian dollar went up quite a bit against the American dollar over the period 1988-90. It went from around 75 cents at one point to about 88 or 89 cents. People saw that as a discount: suddenly you can buy American goods, and our dollar is stronger. That has leveled off. People now view the dollar as nearly being at par because there is only a 13-cent difference, and often if you go across to Buffalo or Detroit they accept the dollar at par. The problem is that you cannot just dramatically drop the value of the Canadian dollar or you will create inflation and a lot of other problems. But certainly the dollar should be at a more reasonable level, and whether or not you do that over time, that is probably the way to go.

We have got ourselves into a situation where we do not have just one or two problems; we have a whole lot of problems that have compounded themselves. We must work our way out of it by lowering interest rates, lowering the dollar to a reasonable level and trying to get rid of the T. It is a monumental mess, we recognize that, but I think unless you start to pinpoint what the problems are I say, "We're all going to work together to find the solutions," we are going to continue on this downward spiral.

Mr Jamison: I have just one final question.

The Chair: I am going to start restricting people to the question, and go through the list again if we get to it.

Mr Jamison: I understand that, Mr Chairman, but I am going on past experience here. I have jotted down four questions, and I have one—

The Chair: I will put you on it to get your questions in.

Mr Jamison: The last one, really, is the one I would like answered.

The Chair: Quickly.

Mr Jamison: There is a reference in your document to a difference in the price for which the retailer can purchase similar or the same products. That has been brought to this committee in other reports. Have you any further background or examples to offer?

Mr Catherwood: Our stuff is largely anecdotal. You hear about these things virtually everywhere you go. Anytime you sit down to have a conversation about the problem of cross-border shopping, somebody comes up with an example. I will use one the Canadian director uses, as he is my boss. He is talking about a coffee filter that is made in Scarborough—I do not know the name of it, but I could find out for you—that can be bought up here for $1.29 in stores. The same thing, apparently, is available in Buffalo for four for a dollar. I do not know how that happens. You have to ask yourself questions about it. Maybe this is one thing the committee should be looking at, doing a study of why we are having these different kinds of problems. For our members, that is a direct problem. People do not buy coffee filters in our stores up here for $1.29 if they know they can get four—

Mr Kwinter: Are you saying that a product that is manufactured in Scarborough is being sold in the United States for four for a dollar and it is sold here for $1.25?

Mr Catherwood: Yes, $1.29.

Mr Kwinter: I would challenge that. I do not know anything about it, but they would be dumping if they did that. You cannot do that. It is one thing to have a comparable product. You cannot sell a product in another market below what you sell it for in your own market. That is called dumping and the people who manufacture it in the United States would be jumping all over them and charging them with dumping.

As I say, I have no information whatsoever, but I would challenge that.

Mr Catherwood: I do not doubt that you are right, it is dumping. I am just telling you this is an example that we have heard of, and if you like I will go back and find out precisely the name of the product and precisely the reference and I could get that information back to you. If that kind of stuff is going on, it is not only hurting Canadians, it is going to hurt us in our relations with the Americans too.

Mr Kukovica: I just wanted to add a comment. I think the problem in pricing is not with the retailer. From our experience, we think that it is the with distribution, and if you want to make a study of it, I think you should check the suppliers.

Let me give you a good example. Why is a Polaroid film from the same US production line, without any import duties, three times more expensive here? Toronto is the fifth largest market in North America. Why are the wholesale prices higher? Why?

We do not understand. We do not know, I do not know why, but that is the question you should be asking yourself. I think it is the suppliers. If you were going to do a study or commission any research, you should look into the suppliers, what they are charging the Ontario retailers versus what they charge US retailers. That is our thinking.

The Chair: Okay, to make sure that everybody gets a chance for their questions in 15 minutes, we will restrict it to one each. Mr Hansen, please?

Mr Hansen: I read on page 4 here, decline of beer sales up to 50% and I think what we have to look at is not just people living in border towns, but people living in Toronto who are employed in the brewery industry. A lot of people say, "Oh, that's a problem down at the border," but it is actually affecting people who live away from the border.

I agree with this report. We do have some problems with the federal government, especially coming to an agreement that a lot of these problems we cannot solve without a partnership between the federal government, the provincial government and the communities along the border.

There was an article here, "Savings Ontario." That was something I brought in a while ago, and I think that it is working to a certain point. We have to educate people on how cross-border shopping affects people here in Canada or in Ontario. As it comes out in the report, it is immediate savings you are getting now, but down the road it is going to be a loss of income to a lot of people here in Ontario.

What do you feel is the one most important thing we should do? What would be your number 1 priority? We have seen your conclusions, we have seen some of your things, but what would you say would be the first thing for the Ontario government to do in this situation?

Mr Kukovica: Let me combine that with enforcement, strict enforcement.

Mr Hansen: That is number 1.

Mr Kukovica: I have seen it with my own eyes. I could not believe it. Strict enforcement and education, a good campaign to educate the whole population about buying in Ontario and what exactly they should be doing. Those are my two things: strict enforcement and educating the people.

Mr Kwinter: I only have one question?

The Chair: And a short preamble too.

Mr Kwinter: Okay, there is one issue I would like to address. In two different places in your presentation you talk about the reasons for cross-border shopping and you say "reduced duties on US-made goods under the FTA." Before the FTA went into effect, 80% of all goods and services in Canada were duty-free. The 20% that were still subject to duty had an average of between 7% and 10% and that is going to be reduced over the next 10 years. We have been two years into the free trade agreement, so, if anything, that 7% to 10% that is still in place has come down at most 2%—at most. Could you give me an example of one product that is bought by Canadians over in the United States that has been reduced because of the free trade agreement?

Mr Kukovica: That has been reduced or thoroughly eliminated, that there is no duty?

Mr Kwinter: That had a duty before and does not have a duty now.

Mr Kukovica: Yes, crystal, the best example. I was in a store in Niagara Falls, NY, and let me tell you how they advertise. They advertise duty-free, "Crystal is duty-free now and you won't pay any duty." It is in the store. It was a crystal store, strictly selling crystal and glass and things like that. It was marked duty-free.

The best example I can tell you, I went to Black and Decker—

Mr Kwinter: Well, let's stick with crystal.

Mr Kukovica: Let me give you the other example. Black and Decker: On each product it said, "This is duty-free. There is no duty on this because it is produced in Canada." Their signs read, "Here is 6%, here is 10%," each product in this Black and Decker warehouse had the exact duty you had to pay: They were advertising it strictly for Canadians, saying, "This is the duty you have to pay but here it is duty-free because it is produced in Canada."

Mr Kwinter: With all due respect, whether you have a free trade agreement or not, if you bought a product in the United States that was made in Canada and brought it back, you could claim back the duty if you had paid it, because there is no duty bringing a product that comes out of the country back into the country.

But what I want to get to is your crystal. You see the concern I have—and I do not want to give you a tough time—is that a lot of your stuff is anecdotal, "I was in a store and I saw this and I feel this and as a result I think this is important." The point I am making is that I do not know if there are, other than Steuben, very many companies in the United States that manufacture crystal.

You have to understand that tariffs are there to protect Canadian producers who, because of economies of scale, cannot compete, so the government puts up a protective tariff.

Now, I do not know of anybody in Canada producing crystal. I just do not know. There may be, but I do not know of any. As a result, I again suggest to you that there is no duty on crystal. Now, some hotshot retailer just says your beer salesman will say, "Buy my beer with no GST." They could put a sign in the window to attract gullible Canadians saying, "Here is your crystal duty-free." "Duty-free shop," but there was no duty on it to begin with.

What I would really like is, give me a product that has changed dramatically as a result of the free trade agreement. Again, I am not trying to give you a tough time, but I think and if I had the time I would go through several of the other things that you have said that I do not agree with that we have to zero in on the root cause of the problem and I think it is your number 1 issue. Prices are cheaper there, period. That is the reason people are going there because they can save some money. I just wanted to see if we can zero in on the basic problems.

Mr Kukovica: Okay. Let me give you a couple of examples of what you are saying is not true. Prices are not cheaper necessarily. I will give you another example, and I can document it. Price Club in Toronto and Price Club across this province sell Nintendo Action for $116 Canadian. In Buffalo, $114. So what the hell is the difference? So they are not cheaper. You know, for $2 you are not going to save and buy Nintendo, because you are going to pay—

Mr Kwinter: Yes, but you are going on the assumption that everybody lives or dies with a Nintendo set.

Mr Kukovica: No, but you are talking about prices being cheaper everywhere. Prices are not necessarily cheaper.

Mr Kwinter: But you made the whole argument about why there are lower prices and now you are saying that it is not true that there are lower prices.

Mr Kukovica: No, what I am saying to you is the problem is with the suppliers and not with the retailers. Look at the suppliers; why are they charging more for the same product, the same line? I give you again Polaroid. Why is Polaroid film—which is manufactured in the same place, comes out of the same line, no duty, nowhere, nothing—why are they selling it two to three times higher in Ontario?

Mr Kwinter: I agree with you, but I am saying in the meantime they are selling it three or four times more extensively and that is why people are going to the States. I think we have to address that.

Interjection.

Mr Kwinter: All right. Sorry.

Mrs Sullivan: I am going to be following the same line questioning as Mr Kwinter, because I have problems with one of the conclusions you have reached in your brief.

For instance, you have indicated that you believe there is far more of a federal responsibility to deal with these issues and less of a provincial responsibility. However, one of the proposals that you put forward relating to provincial responsibilities discounts Sunday shopping. As an issue, I have certainly heard other testimony before the committee and analysis that indicates that the availability of Sunday shopping is in fact a factor.

We have also heard you put forward a proposal suggesting a new provincial levy or tax on products at the border—clearly countervailing, clearly in opposition to arrangements under GATT. There would be very serious problems with this kind of effort. I wonder if you have looked at those things.

Once again, because you have concentrated a lot on the question of duties, I want to go back to the fact your analysis goes all the way through talks about prices. In fact, frequently the prices of goods—and 99% or 98%, whatever the studies tell us, of consumers who are shopping in the United States are shopping because of price—those prices, including duty, are lower than they are in Ontario.

I think I would like to hear more of your views, first of all relating to what I believe would be a countervailing action that you have suggested for the province to take, and second relating to the price factor.

Mr Catherwood: It may well be that something like that, depending on the type of charge that you put on it, could be subject to countervail, but at the same time I think we have to have concern in moving forward like the federal government. They talked about creating evenness on both sides of the border. We have got a lot of people—

Mrs Sullivan: You have mentioned a limited action area for the province. I want you to zero in on the action that you have suggested that the province take. Leave the rest out of it for now and talk about the province.

Mr Catherwood: I am doing that. What I am saying is that we do not have a situation where fair play is being played on either side of the border and that has to be a concern to us.

I am not sure what such a charge would be. The reason we propose a special charge is because I am not an international trade lawyer and we do not happen to have one on staff, but the idea of having some way of recouping the revenue is something that the province, we think, should explore. If it is not possible and it is going to get us into problems with countervail, then that is an idea that has been thrown out and discounted. But if one does not raise ideas, one is not going to come up with solutions. It is that simple. I mean, we are making as many suggestions as we can.

We are also saying, "Hey, listen, we'll pitch in and do everything we can," not only just because we have got retail members but because we have got manufacturing members, we have got service members, we have got people who are taxpayers. We are a responsible labour organization in this province and we want to see a better future. We do not think this game is being played fairly, and the people who have got us into this mess—and maybe we have got to do some things ourselves—we have all got to find a way to work together to get out of it.

I cannot argue with you and Mr Kwinter on international trade law, because I just do not understand it. I cannot be a specialist in those things. But I do know that where there is a problem, we should try to find the solution.

Mr Sutherland: You state that you are the largest private sector union in the country. You also make some comment in terms of educating your own members and you provided some information on British Columbia. I was wondering what you thought about the efforts of the labour movement in the province as a whole, in other sectors outside the retail and service sector, whether you feel that many of their members are aware of this issue and aware of the impact. Some of them are obviously doing some cross-border shopping. I do not think we can exclude them. I was wondering what you see labour movements, both provincially and federally, doing on this issue, and particularly trade union members.

Mr Kukovica: There is no question that the labour movement has to do its part, and we would definitely be willing to run a campaign with the Ontario Federation of Labour in educating our membership, the whole membership of the OFL and in general about cross-border shopping and the problems that it creates. There is no question that some of our members are crossing to the other side, not only UFCW but all the other shoppers. We would work jointly with the Canadian Labour Congress at the same time across the country.

The best example I can give you is what we are doing right now in BC. It is our union. We have taken the initiative. Nobody else wanted to do anything about it. The government did not want to do anything about it there. We went to management, the employers, and asked them to join with us in a campaign to educate the membership, to educate everybody there about the problem of cross-border shopping. We are running a major advertising campaign of education, between UFCW and the employers that are mostly affected, the retailers, some of the suppliers, and all of the others. So I think, yes, the labour movement has a role to play in educating the membership, no question about it, and I still believe that is one of the biggest problems, enforcement and education of the population in general.

Ms Harrington: Just a couple of brief comments. After I heard your discussion, I thought, would you like to come down to our local radio station in Niagara Falls on a talk show.

Mr Kukovica: No problem. Any time.

Ms Harrington: No problem? Okay.

The Chair: Is that your question?

Ms Harrington: Not quite.

The Chair: It is 11 o'clock.

Ms Harrington: I do thank you for your excellent brief. Can I use it back in Niagara Falls?

Mr Kukovica: Sure.

Ms Harrington: I want to dwell on a couple of things. First of all, I believe you are right about strict enforcement. I think we have to do that, and also education. The labour movement and everybody else has to get into this. We as politicians cannot stand up and say, "No, no, no." I think it has to come from the grass roots as to how it is affecting them.

You mentioned that it is people of low income, etc, who really need to get those bargains, and I can understand people—they are in my community—going over there every day to do their shopping. My problem, I think, is that there are a lot of middle-income people, people with good recession-proof jobs, upper-middle-income people, who go over there for big shopping trips, and I have a concern with that. In fact, I just spoke with people from the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation a couple of days ago here at Queen's Park, saying: "Isn't there any way we can work together"—that is, the OSSTF—"and try to educate us? What are we really doing to ourselves?" So I think that is the way to go.

I agree with you that the Sunday shopping issue is a different issue. That is from my perspective in Niagara Falls.

I wanted to get back to a proposal that was made to me last weekend about changing the gas taxes in concentric circles close to the border. Do you think there is any merit in that?

Mr Kukovica: We personally believe not, because where do you stop? What is it, is it 15 miles, is it 20 miles? Where does it stop finally is the problem. I do not know. I come from Quebec and I lived 30 years there. Why do you not look at the experience of Quebec when they introduced the gasoline tax credit and see what that did? I remember, I was there. We had a fight about a month after they introduced it and said it was only a 10-mile radius. The people who were just on the other side said, "Well, we want it too."

Ms Harrington: You do not think it has been effective?

Mr Kukovica: I am not so sure it has been effective. I do not have the stats, but you would have to look at that.

Mr Phillips: You have provided I think some of the most compelling testimony, for me anyway. I think you said two weeks ago you went shopping in the US.

Mr Kukovica: Specifically for that.

Mr Phillips: It struck me as really odd that you were in the US. We have got a really major job; you are coming before the committee; I suspect it is going to be relatively difficult to tell people, "Be a good citizen," and what not, because you yourself head over to the US. I suspect that if you did any study of who is crossing over, it is a pretty broad cross-section of people. But my question really is, have you considered that maybe we have a different way of living here in Canada? As I think you have pointed out in your brief, we have different social values. Maybe we have to accept a different standard of living because we distribute our wealth in a different way. I do not know whether that has occurred to your union or not, what you have looked at it.

Listen, maybe we are going to have to—all of us; not mean just your workers but all of us—accept that we cannot look at our counterparts across the border and we need exactly that standard of living if we are going to do the things you talk about in your brief, to deal with poverty, to deal with housing problems. I am just wondering whether that enters your discussions or not, that maybe in negotiations we are not going to be able to see exactly the same remuneration as our counterparts across the border because a portion of ours will go to looking after people who are less fortunate. That is my basic question: Do you compare yourself to the US, or should we be looking perhaps a little different standard of living here in Canada?

Mr Kukovica: I negotiate. That is my job, to negotiate across the country from coast to coast. Let me tell you, do not compare ourselves to the States at all. In British Columbia—the best example I can give you—in the retail food industry we have the best collective agreement in North America, so we do not follow the trends of the States.

Mr Phillips: Best in North America?

Mr Kukovica: Best in North America. The best collective agreement in North America is in BC.

Mr Phillips: You do not look at the US?

Mr Kukovica: It is with Local 1518 UFCW and Retail Council of Canada, so we do not look at all at the US in that sense, because we create patterns in the retail food industry, at least in the collective agreements. Years ago it used to be the reverse. No question about it, years ago—I mean, we are an international union—when northern and southern California negotiated the retail contracts, 110,000 members, that was the strict North American pattern in the retail food contracts. But now it is the reverse; it is BC that sets the pattern across North America. I have not personally come across any analysis or anybody who has come to us and said, "We have to have a concern in negotiations because of cross-border shopping."

Mr Phillips: Just to follow that up, if I might—

The Chair: No, sorry, because we are way over time and we have two more questioners.

Mr Phillips: That is the best in North America?

Mr Catherwood: I want to add just a tiny bit to that. What we said in the brief, Mr Phillips, is no different than what we will say to our membership. I think people have to seriously look at what we are doing and where we want to go in this country. We have to say:

"Do we want to be like the Americans and what we see on television all the time or do we want to recognize that what we have built in this country is second to none anywhere in the world? And if we want to maintain it, then we're going to have to fight for it, we're going to have to fight together, we're going to have to work together to do it."

It could be that as these changes are occurring in the economy—and you know as well as I do there are all kinds of reasons why the economy is changing, society is changing, the labour market is changing—as these things work their way through, it may be that our standard of living is going to change. But we should be thinking about it and we should be making some conscious decisions. We should not just be jumping across the border to save 10 cents on a pint of milk or something without thinking about what that does to us in the long term.

This is the message that we are going to take to our membership. Maybe we will not send Tom out the first week but we will take this message to our membership. I think it is not just our union that will do it, but through the CLC and the CLC we will do it to all union people and try to reach them in their homes and in the workplaces. We have got some fundamental decisions to make in Canada about where we are going and unless we have some constructive dialogue, the kind that we are suggesting here where you are prepared to throw ideas out and have them run down and try again, I do not think that we are going to solve this problem which, to me, has reached a crisis.

Mr Dadamo: I wonder how many cars have crossed the Ambassador Bridge in Windsor while I waited to ask you these questions. Let me say that I could talk to you about this subject for many hours. I have lived in Windsor most of my life. The Ambassador Bridge is in the riding that I represent and I have heard all the stories, so what you are telling me here today is really nothing new, but I thank you for the brief anyway.

I feel compelled to say that it is not fair for the provincial government to be reacting to a Prime Minister who has put us into this predicament. Now the provincial government has to work out some of the solutions and try to do the best it can. After all, they have given us the GST and free trade, etc.

I also want to say that my wife is a customs officer at the Ambassador Bridge, I have many friends there, I have heard all the stories. You mentioned earlier about the customs workload, that we need many more people to work there, they are not well enough equipped to handle the flow. Yes, you are exactly right when you say that they have people through on $20, $50 and $100 because they cannot keep up. That is exactly right, and that answer has to come from the federal government, not the provincial government. You are right on that point. I also want to say that we should be hiring people there and trying to get them through the best way we can.

But there is also another point in trying to collect the provincial portion of the taxes. It sounds good, everybody has been saying we should be collecting the provincial taxes, but we also have to realize that along the way it is a bureaucracy, it is another bureaucracy that we may not need, and it is going to take a lot of money to set it up. But I think the idea should be explored in the next little while.

I guess I am making more comments questions, but you had mentioned 40 pounds of meat, or a certain number of pounds of meat. You can bring, I think, 40 pounds of meat over at any given time. I have known people who have done that. It is either 40 or 42.

Mr Kukovica: My understanding is that meat is prohibited because of health regulations, not because of pounds or the amount of money. It is a question of health regulations. It is the same thing that you are not allowed to bring some fruit products into the country, and I am trying right now to get a list of exactly the fruit products that you are not allowed to bring in. No matter what the price is, it is a question of health regulations; it has nothing to do with the pricing.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just interject, it is the food and drug administration. I do not know if you have been to Pearson lately, but about two months ago for the first time, as the stuff was coming off the carousels, there was what I thought was a customs officer with a dog, a bloodhound. He was sniffing around. I thought he was sniffing around for drugs and I thought, "Wow, I've never seen that before." He was wearing a little coat, the dog, and it said, "Department of Agriculture, Canada." I said to the officer, "What are you doing?" He says, "Oh, we're looking for food products, meat products and things that are illegal." So it has nothing to do with the duty; it has to do with food and drug banning certain products.

Mr Kukovica: That is my information too, that is exactly what it is.

The Chair: Mr Wilson, last question.

Mr J. Wilson: I guess what disturbs me about your brief—it has a number of good points, but it is the same thing that disturbs me about the government from time to time—is that both the free trade agreement and the GST are in place. As the provincial PC Party we agreed with one, the FTA, and the GST we did not agree with. But none the less, they are in place. This government spends every day blaming those two factors principally for increases in cross-border shopping and loss of productivity in Canada, and yet I never hear other premiers, other leaders of other provinces, complaining about the free trade agreement, for instance, because they have done things to take advantage of that agreement. In fact, in the first 21 months of the free trade agreement, US imports remained static and the net increase in Canadian exports is $4 billion. So there is a success story to be told.

But I would argue that in Ontario, because of politics, you have simply continued to blame that agreement for all kinds of things, whether or not it had anything to do with many of the things that it gets blamed for. And when you say that the federal government has no economic strategy, I would argue that the province of Ontario has no economic strategy, or at least none that we can point to.

Mr Dadamo: Go back to bed, Jim.

Mr J. Wilson: No, I think it is the propagation of myths.

The Chair: Excuse me, do you have a question here?

Mr J. Wilson: Sure do, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Could we get to it? Because we are already overdue with the next presenter.

Mr J. Wilson: Sure, but I think my party deserves a proportionate amount of time, given all the other people here asking questions.

Propagation of myths, I think, hinders my constituents and hinders people who are unemployed. The GST, for instance, because it is in place, you are not going to change it. The federal government is not going to change its mind on these things. Maybe you want to stress that we should be collecting both PST and GST. You say it would be another bureaucracy. I suggest that if you rolled the provincial sales tax collection system into the collection of the GST you would save more than enough bodies to put them on the border to collect that joint tax and you would save a significant amount of money in the sense that we would not have two sets of auditors and two sets of books kept by businesses.

I would argue that taxes are high. I was in Fort Frances last weekend where municipal and business taxes on the Canadian side of the border are five times higher than right across the border at International Falls. Retail rents, for instance—all these things drive up the shelf price of our goods—are 50% higher; just two examples.

My question, I suppose, is, we are trying to get a figure on the exact extent of the problem of cross-border shopping. Your figures are from John Winter's report, in which he says about $1 billion in 1991 and about $2 billion nationally. Have you done any other studies that might give us a better handle on that? I think the problem is far more extensive than that and I think it has a lot to do with taxes in Ontario.

Mr Kukovica: No, we have not done any other study than that. It is very difficult, I think, to get any other handle on those figures. Let me respond to two of your comments. First, when you talk about GST, the Angus Reid Group survey that was done in March—if you think the GST has nothing to do with shopping and everything else in the economy—

Mr J. Wilson: No, I agree it has. I agree it has a psychological effect on people, but if the myths were not propagated we might be able to get over that.

Mr Kukovica: It is not a myth.

Mr J. Wilson: And if we collected the PST at the border with the GST, I think that would be a real deterrent.

Mr Kukovica: It is not a myth. There was a survey done across Canada in March of this year, 1991. The survey shows that 41% of the people in Atlantic Canada cut their spending because of the GST. The question that was asked was: "How has your household reacted to the new 7% GST? Have you cut back purchases, increased purchases, or other?" In this survey, which was done across Canada, Ontario was the highest where they cut, with 48%. It is real; it is not myths.

The second point I want to make is that right now the federal government, your party, has said that it will hold consultations between the federal level, the provincial and the municipalities. If the labour movement were invited, maybe we would have a very positive dialogue about how to stop the cross-border shopping and come up with some ideas. But the labour movement again was ignored, we are not yet invited to those talks. We hope that we will be.

Mr J. Wilson: Great. I just want to make one response to that, on your question of the GST. Let me make it clear. We were not in favour of it either in the Ontario PC Party, but it is in place. When you talk of the "new" GST, it is a myth: It is a replacement tax. Governments across Canada would be helpful—I mean, it is in place, folks, so why keep hammering away at it? We should stress "new tax," which it is not—it is a replacement tax—and Canadians would be better off if we all understood that.

The Chair: I do have an added piece of information the researcher has given me, the Peace Arch Cross-Entry Project Participant's Guide. "Limitations: The following lists the limitations on commodities which are commonly imported. The limits shown are applicable to an individual." This is going out to the people at the border who are enforcing. "Meat, 20 kilograms. Poultry: turkey one whole one; turkey parts, 10 kilograms; chicken, 9 kilograms; fish, 11.3 kilograms. Eggs, two dozen. Dairy products, C$20." So it looks like meat is allowed.

Thank you very much for your presentation. Ladies and gentlemen, if we could move the talk out into the hall I would like to move on with the next presentation.

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: Please come forward. I cannot guarantee anything at this point. If there is a vote in the House, then the bells will ring and we will all have to go. We will do what we can, but thank you very much for coming. I am sorry it is taking a little bit more time.

Mrs Matthews: No, that is quite all right. In fact, it will relieve the members of the committee to know that we have a very short presentation to make and, depending on your questions, we may even be able to get you back on schedule.

The Chair: It is not a question of schedule. It is a question of what is happening in the House with private members' bills.

Mrs Matthews: Yes, I understand that as well, Mr. Chairman.

If I might take a moment and introduce my colleagues and myself to the committee, my name is Linda Matthews. I am chairman of the board of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce. With me today on my left is Mike Cristofaro, member of our economic policy committee, and Elaine Rehor, the assistant general manager of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce.

I would like to take a moment and ensure that the members have an understanding of the Ontario chamber and our membership. We have 165 local chambers of commerce and boards of trade in the province and our combined membership is approximately 65,000 members. We are a very diverse group. We represent not only large businesses but also small owners and medium-size companies, every sector—manufacturing, retailing, financial services—and of course we represent the total province with membership in Thunder Bay and Ottawa, the north, the south, the east, the west. Also, that obviously includes the border communities.

You have already heard from many of our representatives from border chambers and their participation in the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping, so we do not intend to go over the documentation they supplied to the committee. That would be a waste of your time, but certainly a couple of points I think have been raised: In listening to your last discussion, the reference to the $1 billion in potential retail sales that could be t this year, impacting our retailers here in Ontario—and though the gentleman from Windsor is no longer with us, it is a prime example of a border community where in t retailers have had to close shop and there have been ultant job losses in those communities.

We recognize the seriousness of the problem and that it not just a cross-border shopping issue. It is an issue of portance to all of Ontario. Even local members from onto have admitted going across the border. We recog- e, too, that the issue of cross-border shopping is really t a symptom of our larger problem in the province: the ue of competitiveness. The retail sector is on the front e at the moment, but this issue of competitiveness goes our manufacturing sector and other sectors as well and s very long-term serious consequences for all business Ontario.

We are here today to discuss some ideas that the Ontario amber has with respect to short-term and, we hope, nger-term solutions. I would like to ask my colleague m the economic policy committee, Mike Cristofaro, to tline these hopefully constructive solutions to you.

Mr Cristofaro: Thank you, Linda. There are a number proposals that have been put forward to alleviate the blem for border retailers. We support those who recom- nd that the GST and PST be harmonized so the PST can collected at the border. It has been suggested that the vvincial government will lose revenues of over $50 mil- n—I have heard numbers as high as $100 million—as a ult of its inability to collect PST at the border. Currently, ere is a legal and moral requirement to pay the 8% PST mported goods, but the lack of a collection mechanism giving imported goods an unfair advantage. We believe s could be easily rectified by harmonizing the GST and T. We recommend that there be some negotiations held th the federal government on this issue.

There is also the issue of gasoline. There is a cost ferential between the US and Canada and it has been scribed as a loss leader that brings Ontario shoppers into e US. Much of this cost differential is attributed to the deral and provincial taxes on gasoline. The Ontario Border mmunities Mayors Task Force on Cross-Border Shop- ng has proposed that a series of reduced tax zones be mplemented for gas stations between a zero- and 50- metre distance from the border. It is their contention at a reduction in gasoline tax through a zoning formula ill realize the same level of taxation revenue for both the vvincial and federal governments, while eroding the loss ader status of US gas prices.

Enforcement of laws at the border has also been a cus for discussions. We believe this is appropriate, but e also caution that in doing so it should be remembered at penalizing US shoppers and tourists who wish to visit d shop in Ontario through slow-moving lines and so rth would exacerbate the problems of Ontario retailers. e should also note that the costs of increased enforce- ent through a larger number of inspections should not be rmitted to outweigh their advantages.

Small Business Ontario, a branch of the Ministry of dustry, Trade and Technology, has provided assistance to ntario border communities in the form of a marketing strategy framework to assist those communities in keeping their shoppers at home and, of equal if not greater impor- tance, to bring back American tourists who have been staying away from Ontario.

In these difficult economic times, price becomes quite important for many people in determining whether they are going to purchase here or in the States. While it is easy to say that Ontarians should shop in Ontario to keep jobs in the province and support the government services we benefit from, that argument must seem very academic to an unemployed worker who can buy gas, milk and bread cheaper in the US. When we look at the extent of cross-border shopping, it does raise the question of whether the cost of our social programs has exceeded our willingness to pay for them. We need a strong tax base to support our social programs and this relationship seems to be out of sync. We need to redress the balance between a viable tax base and the costs of our social programs.

Collecting PST at the border, introducing gasoline tax zones, enforcing our border regulations and improving the marketing of our communities should all have a beneficial effect for border retailers and government revenues. They are, however, surface solutions and do not address fundamental competitiveness issues in the province.

I would like to talk about some of the long-term solu- tions. The question that needs to be addressed is: What does Ontario need to do to be competitive? The answer to this question lies with business, labour and government and is in our view the single most important issue facing Ontario. We urge that the mandate and membership of the Premier's Council be expanded and that it address this issue as a top priority.

If a partnership is established to focus on competitive- ness, the Ontario government might consider its role in the competitiveness or non-competitiveness of Ontario's goods and services. High levels of provincial personal in- come tax leave fewer dollars in the hands of consumers and contribute to making price for many the top criterion in a purchasing decision.

1130

The PST at 8% is two percentage points higher than the New York sales tax and again gives the US retailer an edge. In an Ernst & Young study of cross-border shopping for the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce, 82% of respondents believed US prices were better.

Direct and indirect taxes on business also have their impact. Corporate taxes, fuel taxes, pay equity, workers' compensation, hours of work and pensions are all costs of business that flow through to the consumer in the form of higher prices for goods and services. This is not to say that any one of these initiatives is wrong, but they are costly in themselves and have a major impact on a cumulative basis. The Fair Tax Commission as it undertakes its study of taxation in Ontario should bear this in mind.

The question then asked is: If government revenues are decreased to make our products more competitive, how do we pay for the services we enjoy and do not want to give up? First, in a growing healthy economy, there would be less call on these services, and second, many inefficiencies can be found in the delivery of these services, particularly in the area of duplication of government services. One example here would be the duplicated collection system for GST and PST. A further example would be the need to concentrate our health care resources more on prevention and less on cure.

Business needs to re-examine its contribution to competitiveness as well, to improve both quality and cost to the consumer. Labour too needs to evaluate its role in competitiveness. We all need to work to accelerate positive change in the province.

In order for partnerships to work we must all stop seeking a bigger share of a shrinking pie before only crumbs are left to pick at. The cross-border shopping crisis will have served us well if it can be used as a springboard from which a new partnership can be launched with a healthy economy as its target.

Mrs Matthews: That ends our formal comments. I am sure there will be a multitude of questions on our presentation.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, just one point of information. You mentioned on page 4 the expansion of the mandate and membership of the Premier's Council. There are several Premier's councils; which one were you referring to?

Mrs Matthews: It would be the Premier's Council on the Economy and Quality of Life. I think they have a three-volume report currently.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. Thank you. You talked about the issue of competitiveness and the impact on retailers and how we all need to do a better job. I believe one of the surveys done by Mr Winter noted that people felt they were getting better service in the United States in some of the stores. He also thought there were friendlier people in the States, but I seem to be the only one surprised by that.

Do you have any numbers in terms of how much retailers are spending on staff training, that type of thing, product knowledge? I worked in the retail sector in a grocery store for seven years and was always concerned about how we hired people and just threw them in there without any training, or just assumed that they knew how to treat people and how to solve problems that may have come up and how to deal with consumer complaints. I am just wondering, from a retailer's standpoint, whether there is any dollar figure or any surveys you have made of your membership to get a percentage figure that they spend on that area.

Mrs Matthews: Specifically, Mr Sutherland, we do not have a dollar figure. A number of our members, through local chambers, have been involved in co-operative training ventures with the community colleges in order to give their staff that training edge and relate to tourism in particular, but a specific dollar figure or time figure I do not have.

Mrs Sullivan: I too am very interested in your comments relating to the Premier's Council. I think yours is the first organization that has suggested that the Premier's Council move from discussion of technological competitiveness on the international scene to the goods and services area.

In that area, would you see the Premier's Council looking at, for instance, the identification of new marketing trends, niche marketing or the identification of international trends, for example, in retailing and in marketing generally where Ontario retailers can in fact be in the forefront rather than behind international trends? I think that in the past we have seen, for example, the warehouse operation, such as the Price Club, starting somewhere else, or the combination retail outlet-manufacturing operation, such as Ikea or Habitat, starting elsewhere. Do you see a role for the Premier's Council in those kinds of marketing focus studies, or would you see the Premier's Council attacking this?

Second, yours is not the first group to talk about gas tax and its variegated implementation based on distance from the border. That is done in Quebec with a very different kind of community, in terms of population concentration and so on, moving away from the border. One of the things I see as a problem here is that, for example, Thunder Bay identifies itself as a border community yet is 200 miles away from the border. In my community which includes Oakville, Burlington and Milton, retailers are certainly affected, in their view, by cross-border shopping. Metropolitan Toronto is clearly adding more to the market. How do you define levels of distance from the border that do not include the entire province?

Mr Cristofaro: Let me answer the question on gasoline. The speaker before us addressed that. He is from Quebec so am I. There are in Quebec these gradual tax zones. The system was set up so that it would not be advantageous if you are a resident of Oakville, for example, to drive down to Buffalo to gas up because, no matter what the price was, it would cost you more to get there and back than the savings you are going to achieve at the gas pump.

So you have a system in place that does it gradually whereby if you save $3 by going from zone A to the United States, you would give a credit to those retailers that would enable them to compete with the US.

Mrs Sullivan: Could I just interrupt for a second? The other problem then becomes: What happens in the local market when the guy from Mississauga comes to Oakville? The gas service stations in Mississauga are affected by the kind of fuel tax reduction in a community right next door within the same province. You cannot stop people from Mississauga.

Mr Cristofaro: But, Mrs Sullivan, if you do it gradually whereby you have a price that, next door to the border is 45 cents a litre and then you have got 46, 47, 48, it will not be advantageous for you to travel the extra 10 miles just to gas up and save one cent. I grant you, you cannot have a perfect system in place, but you can get a system that is a lot better than we have right now.

Mrs Matthews: On your earlier question, certainly there would be support for that kind of activity. Out of the original councils came a number of reports and studies talking about a need to restructure core businesses. I do not think I would limit the council to the two or three that you have suggested. Certainly there is a multitude of competitive issues that the council would have to address. Really what we are supporting is the need for business, labour and government co-operation in order to find those solutions for all of Ontario.

Mr Jamison: I notice that you broached the subject of PST and the GST, and you have said it would be advantageous for business to have those taxes combined. Obviously you understand that this government chose not to raise taxes by doing that, because there is an increase about one half a per cent once you do that, and by doing has left $500 million in the pockets of the consumers of province.

But I am having some difficulty in understanding—on the one hand you are talking about various tax levels and then you are suggesting a measure that would in fact increase taxes collected by approximately half a per cent again.

Mrs Matthews: If it was harmonized, sir, and you are collecting the 15% to begin with—the reason you are saving $500 million is because you did not stack it, not because it is not harmonized.

Mr Jamison: We are not saving $500 million; the consumer is.

Mrs Matthews: But it is a different issue.

Mr Jamison: Yes.

Mrs Matthews: One was charging 7% on top of 8%, and that is where the additional money came in. The other put them together and charge 15% once.

Mr Jamison: What exactly is the chamber doing province-wide at this point to react to this particular situation? I ask that for this particular reason: so that we in government can understand where we can co-ordinate our efforts, because I believe the previous group was very correct in saying that this is an issue that various groups cannot deal with effectively in isolation. I would be very interested to hear what you have been doing to this point.

Mrs Matthews: We have made presentations at the provincial level, and our Canadian chamber colleagues have made presentations at the federal level, with respect to harmonization, because the other thing that impacts the business community on that particular issue is duplication, the bureaucracy and the paperwork and the complications for the small retailer to have to collect two taxes; so there is the workload impact as well as the revenue side of it. We have made presentations at both the provincial and the federal levels, encouraging both levels of government to come back to the table and to harmonize those taxes into one.

Mr Jamison: But my understanding is that where in effect the provinces have done that, it has really not solved the problem. There is no collection of GST at either of those provinces' border crossings.

Mrs Matthews: I think that is an addendum to the discussions. First you have to harmonize and then you have to agree on the collection.

Mr Jamison: But they have. They have, and those taxes, to my knowledge, are not being collected at the border crossings.

Interjection.

Mrs Matthews: Yes, I was going to say, if they are collecting the federal tax they would automatically be collecting the provincial tax, through the harmonization, not previously.

Mr Jamison: Is that happening in Quebec and in Saskatchewan? It is not happening at this point, to my understanding.

Mrs Matthews: My understanding is that it would be part of the process, but I do not have a piece of paper that says that.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to make an observation and then just ask a question. On this gas thing and the various zones that are in effect in Quebec, there is even some question whether they are working there, but the reason they do not have a hope of working there is that there are no great population centres right at the border of Quebec and the United States which have any real impact on the economy. You have to travel quite a distance, so there is nobody who would be travelling to the border to save on gasoline because, as it was suggested, it would take too long to get there in Quebec. So what they are really saying is that if you are coming from Montreal and you are crossing at Burlington, Vermont or Plattsburg, New York—wherever it is—you have got to travel 70, 80 miles to get there, or whatever it is; but before you get to the border, if they have these zones, they will let you buy some gas so you do not have to fill up in the US and the money stays here.

But in Ontario, we have many major population centres that are within easy driving distance. If they are not within easy driving distance to the United States, they would be within very easy driving distance to where these zones are, so you would have a system that I do not think could work because of that. We are just too close to the border and we have got too much population that close to the border.

The thing that I really wanted to ask about is that I see all of your recommendations—and I agree with most, if not all, of them—as being long-term restructuring of the way we do business. I do not see it happening tomorrow; I do not see it happening next year; I do not see it happening for maybe five or ten, if it happens at all, whereas, we are talking now about a retailing problem. The other things affect our competitiveness in world trade; they affect our competitiveness in attracting investment, but what we are talking about basically is a retailers' problem, which eventually impacts all the way down the line, because it then impacts on the manufacturers and on the service sector. But right today, what you have is a shopper who, even in Toronto, sees a purchase and says, "I can go over to Buffalo and buy it, pay the duty and everything else, and still save a lot of money." How do you address that? In the short term, what are your solutions?

Mrs Matthews: I guess, Mr Kwinter, in the short term we make four proposals: harmonization of PST and GST to take away that cost advantage in going south, because you are going to pay the extra tax when you—

Mr Kwinter: Could I just ask you a question about that? Right now, there is no question that, given the economies of scale, there is a cost advantage on many items in the United States. With the dollar today at 87—

Mrs Matthews: Just under 87 cents.

Mr Kwinter: Okay, it is around 87 cents. When you combine the PST and the GST you have 15%, which just about makes it neutral. In other words, any advantage or disadvantage of having to pay the PST and the GST is more than offset by the value of the dollar. So what I am saying is that, even if you do that, you still have to address the basic problem of economies of scale, efficiency of distribution, and all those things. There is no question that all these things you are suggesting are going to help, but are they going to be enough to change the pattern?

Mrs Matthews: I think, Mr Kwinter, that is probably why we characterize them as short-term solutions. We would not disagree with your analysis of gas zones and problems that there may be in implementation. I think it is the problem of what you can do in the short term for business people and communities that are really hurting in these border areas. I think they need the long-term solution, but many of them are not going to be around when we find the solution, unless we can have some short-term assistance for them. Gas zones have enormous problems in their application. It may just move the problem to Burlington or Oakville, but it will offer some help and short-term assistance to people who really are on the edge in terms of the viability of their businesses.

It is very hard to suggest that, although this is a retailers' problem at the moment, it is the inputs as well as their own practices, and the responses of citizens in hard times who want to find the lowest price, that are really combining to make it a retailers' problem, and we are viewing it that way. But until we look at the whole production-distribution system, we really cannot give the retailers a long-term answer.

Ms Harrington: I sat on our chamber of commerce in Niagara Falls for a couple of years, and I would like to tell you I am very impressed with the amount of interest they have in so many issues, provincial issues and local issues. They are really, genuinely concerned about the community.

I wanted to tell you what some of the merchants told me last weekend, that when the difference in filling up your gasoline tank is only $5, as opposed to $10, people will think twice about going across the border; people who are busy, who do not feel that it is that much of an advantage. So I am thinking that would be good to consider, because once you get over there, you are tempted to look around at the other things, and you leave your money over there.

I arranged a meeting between our local chamber of commerce representative and Premier Rae at the beginning of March; we proposed this issue to him and we had a fairly full discussion. Our local chamber is involved with the "Shop Ontario" campaign, which is trying to do some marketing about what is competitive and a good buy in our local area.

It is difficult for them, I admit, and the thing that I have found, after speaking with them, is that some of the merchants lack interest in fully participating in this aggressive type of marketing campaign, and really getting involved in this issue instead of just sitting back and saying, "Well, we can blame everybody, the federal government and X, Y and Z." They should be saying, "What can we do, personally to educate"—of course, they do not like pointing the finger at consumers and saying, "You should not be going across the border." That is not what they want to do, that is what we want to do, but we do want to have some more positive way of dealing with it. Promotional; your organization at a provincial level, is there any way you can suggest local, small merchants more involved with promotional

1150

Mrs Matthews: That is a tough one. I would hope those merchants are members of their local chamber of commerce as well. I made reference to one of the co-operative training ventures with local chambers and community colleges. Obviously it is a difficult problem. I am not sure that you can force them to do anything other than pointing to their best interests. So I am not sure I have an answer to that one, Ms Harrington.

Ms Harrington: You mentioned having the government and the unions, I think it was, as well as—

Mrs Matthews: Business, labour, government, working together, yes.

Ms Harrington: —working together. I certainly agree with that. I am saying that before we can really do a lot, we need to have it come from the merchants, the small business people, from the grass roots, so that we can work together.

Mrs Matthews: I thought that is what you were hearing at these hearings, especially with the border communities and chambers of commerce making presentations. I think the willingness is there.

Mr J. Wilson: Just a preamble: perhaps I did not make myself clear in my last comments when I talked about taxation. I note that the Ontario Chamber of Commerce points that out as one of the primary problems.

You indicated to me off the record, Mr Chairman, that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business had presented contrary evidence, and Mr Sutherland agreed with you. I can only suggest that you re-read this. It has the point in spades that Ontario's competitiveness is one of the primary reasons—in fact, in conclusion, that is what the deal with and the charts indicate—

The Chair: Your comment was International Falls compared to Fort Frances; the closest comparison that document deals with is Duluth with Thunder Bay, and the chart clearly indicates that the tax differential in Thunder Bay to—

Mr J. Wilson: Is less.

The Chair: —is around 15%, and at one point, think, as high as 21%, but your comments ran to three to five times the amount.

Mr J. Wilson: I apologize if that was your specific comment. We agree there is a significant tax differential. Whether that ranges from 10% in the case of Thunder Bay versus Duluth—it is significantly higher, as much as, I think 40%, I was just reading, between Toronto and Buffalo—my argument is, strictly from my experience last weekend in Fort Frances, that you might find examples there if the study were to be done by the government or otherwise, or er 50% differential based on the taxes paid on the Fort nces side, versus the International Falls side.

Just a simple question, obviously. We agree; we have ver met before, but we have come to independent consions that taxes are a major part of the long-term problem.
e solution that this government has put forward has en to defer many of these matters to the Fair Tax Com-ssion. I am just wondering whether your organization d the people you represent, the small businesses in On-io, the people who actually create the jobs in our com-unities, can wait for the report of the Fair Tax mmission and subsequent action it may take. It may be ee years, and I would argue that many, many businesses not afford to wait until that commission comes forward th recommendations. Any comment on that?

Mrs Matthews: We agree, Mr Wilson. I guess we came in today with hopeful suggestions on the short-term basis, things that could help until the longer-term solutions are found. We know businesses cannot wait two or three years for anything to happen. They need something in the short term and then working towards longer-term solutions.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation. Those are the bells that I was warning you about.

Mrs Matthews: Yes. That was very good timing, sir.

The Chair: Thank you.

The committee recessed at 1155.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1552.

The Chair: I call the committee to order. We got a little hung up and started late, but that should not interrupt the time we have to hear your presentation.

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF GROCERY DISTRIBUTORS

The Chair: We have the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors. Perhaps the spokesperson will introduce those present.

Mr Carter: Before I begin, I will ask you if it is all right to make a short presentation of our brief and then our contingent is happy to discuss the issue and answer questions wherever that is useful.

The Chair: That is good.

Mr Carter: Thank you. Let me introduce my associates. Kevin Ryan is vice-president, store operations, of National Grocers/Loblaws, which includes Zehr's and sells to Mr Grocer, which is a franchise operation. Jonathon Wolfe is president and chief operating officer of the Oshawa Group. In this area you may know some of its stores: it operates under the name of Food City, a little further away is Dutch Boy, and it wholesales to the IGA group in this part of Ontario. Bob Winstanley is director of public affairs of A&P, Dominion and Miracle Food Mart. I am Tim Carter and I am with the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors.

We have a submission which we would like to put before the committee and I gave copies to the clerk. With your indulgence, I would like to briefly refer to it, starting at the first page.

Let me first of all say that we appreciate very much having the opportunity to come before this committee, because this issue is of major importance to food distributors in the province. Some years ago when it started, to us it was important, but since then the sales loss and financial drainage have accelerated to the point where we put this issue at the top of our list of items that are important to us for discussion with government.

Our document is divided into seven sections. We have listed those at the bottom of page 1, and I would like to refer to them briefly now.

The association, which we call grocery council, is a trade association representing food wholesalers and retailers. This is a national trade association. Within the membership we have food distributors that do over 80% of the country's business. In Ontario that percentage is about the same. I might say that the members in Ontario operate stores right across the province with staff that exceeds 80,000 employees. This is the major trade association for food distribution, which is wholesale and retail.

Maybe I could start with the size of the financial loss that we attribute to cross-border shopping. You have probably had a number of estimates placed before you. We would like to deal specifically with food.

Food retailers, individual grocers, will estimate their sales loss and gain from various competitors. It is hard to pull together these numbers on an individual trading area basis. What we tried to do is give you more of a m look at the province overall. On 4 April you had be you John Winter and Associates, who estimated that in year there would be a loss from Ontario of about $1 bil in sales to US retailers. My look at these figures concl that about one quarter of that, or about $5 million week, would be the food retail loss.

Translating that into jobs is particularly suitable f food retailing exercise, because food retailers guide t operations by sales per labour hour, very closely. Labou 60% of the cost of running a food store, so they are q meticulous in measuring the sales per labour hour. W we apply that to the sales loss, we come up with a figur the neighbourhood of 1,700 jobs lost in the food retail sector from that sales loss of about $5 million per we This is both part- and full-time employees.

That is just food retail. We believe the worst poin which an economy can lose jobs is at the retail level, cause at this point when you lose a sale you lose it all way back through the system. A retailer losing a sale to United States does not buy subsequently from the ma factorer, who does not buy from the farmer for the r material, who does not buy from the package manufactu and so forth. So the whole chain or all the levels wit food distribution lose.

This then means that the 1,700 jobs you lose at re are compounded by whatever you lose further back in system. Moving over to page 4, we have made no estim for what you lose in the food system beyond retail. V notice that the representatives who appeared before committee this morning did so. We have no argument w their figures, but it shows that there is a loss through whole system.

One thing we have not done as well, which you m want to look at, is the job loss in the non-food section. V have just looked at food. Of course, when you lose ret sales in clothing, appliances, liquor and all those other plac you are going to have a job loss at retail that is followed with a job loss further back in the distribution chain.

We have concluded that the aggregate loss to the provin in jobs and sales is of alarming proportions. We have al concluded that it is going up, and going up steeply. V look at the figures presented by the government showin the same-day trips. They have gone up for the last thr years at the rate of 20% to 25% per year. We think o sales losses are going up at the same rate, so it is growing

One of the things I probably should add, Mr Chairma is that we have noticed that the retail industry and som other industries are coming forth and talking to you. B when the retail industry adjusts, because it is losing sale seriously, and the stores either close or downsize, the nois will drop down. At that time, whether it is one, two, fiv however many years that is, that will suggest th haemorrhaging has stopped, but it will not have stopper because you will still be losing the sales from the manufac turing sector, from the farming sector. That will go on, eve though the sound and the racket the retailers are makin rently may die down. That is an important point for people public policy to see, that it is a total economy problem.

On page 5, we talk a little about the causes. We believe the cause of the shopping migration to the United States is given by lower prices primarily. This is particularly due to the fact that over the past little while we have been in recession. Our own research shows that Canadian shoppers are particularly sensitized to low prices, and they have shown no reluctance at shifting brands, shifting stores, and shifting countries.

US retailers, targeting the Ontario market, are using specific tactics to attract Ontario shoppers. I have brought some flyers with us that you have probably seen—maybe they have even been delivered to your homes—that show the kinds of features they are offering to Ontario shoppers. At times, they are things the Ontario retailer cannot match. Here is one that is interesting. That is beer, Molson sold in a supermarket, sold in New York state at half the price you would pay for it in a store here. We cannot even sell beer, let alone our own beer. They are dropping those prices in southern Ontario. Here are eggs at 28 cents. Supermarkets cannot buy eggs here for their own sale at 28 cents.

They put in maps, as you can see, on how to cross the border and get to the supermarkets. They offer Canadian credit card service and, of course, they are open seven days a week. They go after us in ways that are very hard for Canadians to match.

They have done so in ways that are not just found in the flyers in Ontario. They have changed their stores. We see a lot of stores opening in the neighbouring states which are dependent upon attracting Ontario shoppers. We do see licence plate counts in the parking lots of US supermarkets and we know that a major proportion of their shoppers are from Ontario, so they have a dependency upon Ontario shoppers. We put in the results of one bit of research on page 6.

We look at pricing comparison, because pricing is the major attraction. You have probably had a number of studies presented to you on pricing differences. We have received a number of them and would be pleased to comment during the question period, if you want to ask us about the pricing level differences we observed.

I am on page 7, talking about the reasons we believe the pricing levels are different between Canada and the United States. We know the obvious ones, including the size of the country and the climatic conditions. We have a smaller population base, which damages the economies of scale. We also have large differences that increase the cost of freighting around the country. The northern location of the country puts a premium on single-crop production, and the hazards of crop damage in that kind of situation.

You probably can get, if you like, testimony from the manufacturing sector about these areas, which they are better equipped to talk about than we. They could also talk about the rate of profitability between Canada and the United States. We can simply mention to you that the retail level profitability in Canada is less than it is in the United States. In the US it is 0.86%, which is less than 1% on the dollar. In Canada it is 0.57%, which is half of 1% on the dollar or of one cent on the dollar. Even if we were the same level, it would not account for the huge price differences. We are dealing with less than a cent on the dollar.

One of the things we would like to talk about this morning is the role of government in the price differences, and to tell you about some of the answers which retailers operating in border areas have given to their trade association. For today and other presentations we have asked them to comment on these things, and they have suggested that one of the factors contributing to the differences are the costs of government, both direct and indirect, in affecting pricing levels.

At the federal level, I would like to simply mention the difference in the input costs of some items. Those items are the industries regulated by supply management marketing boards. We see the biggest price gaps between Canada and the United States in those items: turkey, chicken, eggs, dairy items. This, to a large degree, we think, is because of the difference between Canada and the United States in the way the producers are subsidized. We tend to do it through the pricing mechanism as well as the production, which pushes up prices. The United States does it through the Treasury, which is a different form, so that at the border it makes the gap that much greater.

The Chair: Is that how they can put eggs on the market at 28 cents a dozen?

Mr Carter: We think so.

The Chair: Is that a loss leader?

Mr Carter: That suggests the retail loss leader. What we are talking about here is the government approach to helping the farming community. It is very different between Canada and the United States. Here, egg production is controlled in quantity and price. There is a cost of production formula that allows farmers to be subsidized through the pricing mechanism, which goes right through to the consumer, so it pushes up the price of eggs in Canada, as opposed to having the taxpayer do it heavily here, as is the case in the United States.

The Chair: Do you have any comparative analysis of how much the federal Treasury in the United States puts into its subsidies at the other end, which would then give you an idea of what the real price of their egg production is?

Mr Carter: Sure. I do not have them with me, but let me tell you where I think they are easy to come by. In the recent round of GATT negotiations, every country had to put in its method and its quantity of subsidizing the agricultural sector, so these figures are available. You would go to the sectoral advisory group on international trade; it is the Department of External Affairs.

We are working with Agriculture Canada on the subject of the federal government's approach to a second generation of marketing boards. It is a subject which does concern us and does push up the price gap.

At the provincial level, there are areas which we think cost us, and we would like to mention those. Some of them are direct and some are more indirect. On the direct side, we have those which relate to labour costs, such as pay equity and minimum wage differences and workers' compensation, to mention a few just as illustrations.

On the marketing restriction part, we have noticed that US retailers are quick to exploit advantages which they enjoy. We mentioned the flyers and the credit cards, and the beer and wine. We did not mention Sunday shopping. This is an obvious advantage and one we would like to mention. There are others, which I have referred to on page 10, and we can get into them at question period if that is of interest.

Moving over to the conclusion on page 11, we would like to simply mention that we think the loss in cross-border sales is symptomatic of the larger issue, which is the competitiveness of Canadian or Ontario industry in facing international competition. The fact that the retailers are losing business to the United States we do not think has been influenced by the free trade deal at the retail level, but as trade liberalization continues through that deal, certainly other sectors of our industry are going to face, increasingly, international competition, and they will need to look towards being competitive. This is our supply community.

We do not believe sealing the borders is the answer. We think what we need to do is look at operational disparities and move towards correcting them. This is within our own operations as well as the government aspect of public policy.

We think the starting point is for the government to recognize its role in affecting the outcome of the economic struggle and the regulatory burden which it places on local industry. We think this should be viewed alongside the regulatory burden which is placed on competitive industries. In our case, it is food retailers operating across the border. In the supply industry, it is either that which is placed on companies that sell into Ontario or in the markets to which Ontario companies wish to export.

We think the public sector or government is very much a part of our competitive team and we would like to work together to preserve markets, as we know that it is through our joint work that we will be successful, ultimately, in the competitive struggle.

Our first recommendation, on page 13, is to suggest that the government accept its role as part of our competitive unit and do an assessment in much the same way as we know they do at the federal level on new bits of regulations. They look at it in socioeconomic impact studies. We notice them as well on the assessment of environmental factors.

What we would suggest happening, in advance of implementation of legislation or regulation planned, is that it be assessed in terms of the competitiveness of Ontario industry. A benchmark study would be useful to look right now at the competitiveness and the regulatory burden that we and other parts of the economy face, as a benchmark, and we would be pleased to co-operate if that would be useful.

The federal government, on Monday 22 April, will be announcing a benchmark study which we suggested it do. It will not be on food, but they will be announcing it in Niagara Falls. In that city, there will be a meeting of about 20 industrial groups on the subject of cross-border shopping. If the committee wanted to send a representative, I would think that would be very welcome. There will be a number of papers presented, one by Industry, Science and Technology on a study it is doing on the regulatory burden.

However, they have said that budgetary restrictions preclude their doing more work in this area, so I think encouragement which the province could give them to back into it would be most worth while.

The federal government has released a document on customs and excise dealing with Customs 2000 and approach to running inspection points at border crossings. It is concentrating on facilitating traffic flow. We were before the minister suggesting to him that the emphasis should be on preserving the integrity of the border. I thought they were going in a direction that was fine, they should place their emphasis primarily on looking at their primary role, maintaining the rules of importation. We would like to make sure they do not swerve on that and I think any help we could get from the province would be appreciated.

They are also looking at a fast-track proposal to have one lane at border points available for frequent travellers. At these points, these travellers would voluntarily mail out forms and get billed for their duties by mail. This would allow them to go across the border more quickly.

We suggested at the time that they do a proper study, this involving the retail industry so that we could put pre- and post-figures to assess the impact on cross-border shopping. We do not think this idea has been taken on board and any help you can give us in that would be very worth while.

It is important, before they expand this notion across the country, to understand the impact. We do not think it is going to be a good one on sales and it should be looked at carefully.

Our last recommendation, on page 17, deals with collection at the border. We think it reasonable that provincial sales tax be collected when the GST is being collected there. We think an agreement between the province and the federal government is a good idea. Of course, I could not say that without advocating, as retailers, that the two tax systems be harmonized. It certainly would help our operation, as it would the collection at border points.

That is the substance of our presentation. Thank you for letting us present it. We stand ready to answer questions.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, am I restricted to one question? Okay, I have one question with several parts that all related to the main question.

The Chair: You guys do that all the time any way. Why do you even ask?

Mr Kwinter: Number one, do you have any figures to those who cross-border shop, what percentage of their shopping is done in grocery products?

Mr Carter: I have some figures that are limited. One of the things we know is that people change their buying according to the distance from the border, among other things. So people who live right in the same town where the border is may do more incidental shopping like food, whereas people who live in Toronto may do less food and more appliances and clothing and some of the big-ticket items. So it will change. We have one modest study, at least I do; maybe my friends have other ones. In France the proportion was quite high, but it does change

We have, as you will notice in our brief, taken a position alongside Mr Winter's study of about 25%.

The Chair: This is part B, I guess?

Interjection: Port customs, Mr Chair.

Mr Kwinter: Part B, yes. I would assume that, given size certainly of the representatives here, from a buying capacity, you would have the ability to buy as well as, say, ps. I am talking about certainly the members sitting here. I would think that A&P and Miracle, or the Oshawa group or Loblaw's would certainly be in a position to buy well. Is that a fair assumption?

Mr Carter: I would think so.

Mr Kwinter: I am not talking about items that are controlled by market suppliers or supply management. The point I am trying to get at is that if a box of Kellogg's Corn flakes is being sold in the United States and in Canada, what are the factors that would make it more expensive in Canada than it would in the United States?

Mr Carter: You first of all have the cost at which the wholesaler has to buy it. Kellogg's probably will not sell it at the same price in Canada as it will in the United States. They have a whole lot of different regulations to live with, they have different costs, they produce it in Canada so their economies of scale in their production are going to be different. Their distribution costs are going to be different, the price to the wholesaler will be different.

Kellogg's is probably the best one to give you the reasons for its difference in pricing levels. We know, from talking to the suppliers, that those who have a high component of supply-management products as part of their costs are having difficulty facing at the process level the imported products. Kellogg's has grains in it. That is not one where there is a great difference, but certainly for milk there would be and some of the other products. Maybe my friends would like to get in to comment. You might want to call Kellogg's.

The Chair: My understanding is that for Kellogg's, the actual content of the box is seven cents.

Mr Carter: The actual content difference is seven cents.

The Chair: No, no. That is what it costs.

Mr Carter: That is how much weight is in there.

Mr Winstanley: I believe that figure was mentioned without any scientific background at all, as well. That is just something somebody threw out on an estimate.

The Chair: Do you have a better number?

Mr Winstanley: I quite concur with Mr Carter. I think you could get in touch with Kellogg's. They could probably give you a better answer.

Mr Kwinter: What I am trying to arrive at is that we have heard ever since we have had these hearings, "How come, when a product that is sold in the United States and an identical product is sold here, there is such a disparity in the price?" All I am trying to do is to get confirmation from the major retailers as to exactly the point you have made. So, obviously, you are not buying even though you have the buying power that would be comparable to a Tops or even more, you still cannot buy as cheaply as they can at your level, at the product purchase level.

Mr Carter: I do not think it has a lot to do with buying power because they are in a completely different market. Within that market, they will be buying whatever the rules are within that market.

Mr Winstanley: Tim, perhaps the answer is more closely that we would buy Kellogg's Corn Flakes from Kellogg's, which is in London, Ontario. Tops, which is part of Topco, which is an enormous operation, buys from Kellogg's in Battle Creek, Michigan. So it is really apples and apples. Although the package looks close to the same, we are not buying from the same sources at all. That is why I suggest to Mr Chairman that he is best to get that representative answer. We are buying for two separate issues here.

The Chair: You also have a second problem here that maybe makes the Kellogg's Corn Flakes from Ontario more expensive than in Michigan. I brought information to the committee just last week that one of the representatives in my riding, who is a branch plant of a multinational, is told that they cannot compete with the parent company in the United States in terms of pricing and putting a product into the market.

Free trade was supposed to give us the chance for economies of scale, which I think a lot of people assumed meant that all the companies in Canada would be able to compete with whatever is going on in the United States. That, in this one instance that I can certify as being accurate, does not seem to be the case. I am wondering if that might also translate into other costs.

Mr Winstanley: That could be, Mr Chair. However, it is all anecdotal. The issue we are trying to get across in our presentation is that the price we are paying and we are vending it at is enough that it allows us, based on our cost containment, a lesser margin by about 60% than the US is able to make.

The Chair: I think that is something that we as a committee have to understand and get to the roots of: why the prices are higher and why the prices are different.

Mr Carter: I think that is a very useful exercise and you might do it on a number of commodities. The ones that have the biggest gap are the ones we mentioned, such as turkey, chicken, eggs and dairy, and they are all over 50%. The ones that are a lot more similar deal with things like pork and beef and some of the grains. The condiments, where you have a lot of American manufacturers that are in both countries, you will find the difference is quite high. We will be happy to give your research staff what we know at the retail level, but we are only at the retail and wholesale levels. As you work your way through it, the retail component, as you can see, is less profitable here than it is in the United States.

The Chair: I think those numbers would be very interesting for the committee to see. If you could send them along, we would appreciate that.

Mr Kwinter: I am still on point C, or maybe D. It is my understanding, and I may be wrong, but I heard somewhere when I was a minister that the number one product in volume that is sold in a supermarket is soft drinks. But the number one sort of attraction, the one that people are most price-sensitive to, is milk. Is that something you would agree with? If you do not, then there is no sense in my pursuing the question. I was just wondering, do you as merchandisers find that?

Mr Carter: I would ask my friends to comment on whether soft drinks are the largest one, but I can tell you that the ratio of sales of milk to the total company store in border towns is half what it is in non-border towns, which suggests to us that Canadians who live in border towns buy as much milk in the United States as they do at home.

Mr J. Wilson: But they buy a lot of everything else too.

Mr Winstanley: Yes, once they purchase milk. By the way, that same analysis was presented last May in Halifax by David Sobey, who had the study of his stores in New Brunswick that were near the border. I believe that is probably where you got the numbers as well as the numbers here in Ontario. The situation is identical there. But milk, I think you are probably right, sitting here with my competitors, is probably the driver. I do not think there is any question about it. It is consumed daily. You know, it is a fairly simple equation: If you want to drive business, find something that is consumed daily.

Mr Kwinter: The whole purpose of my question is that maybe we have been hearing about the wrong thing to address. Maybe instead of worrying about the price of gasoline we should be addressing the price of milk, if that is the number one driver as opposed to the price of gasoline.

Mr Carter: I think what we understand is that when people go to the United States they do not just buy one item. They buy a basket and it will have gasoline in it or beer and some food items and milk. It is the totality of it. I would think milk would be a good one to chase down. You might want to find out what is in that basket and the item that is most frequently there per transaction is one that certainly is a driving force. I think it would be a very worthwhile thing to draw statistics on.

Mr Sutherland: Speaking of that issue, food, and talking about baskets, one of the presentations said their group did an analysis in Niagara Falls, one of the studies down there. When they looked at a basket of groceries on both sides they found that the differential was not that much. I am wondering whether you feel that in some cases, maybe even in your industry, we are possibly not selling properly, we are not retailing-marketing properly, if there is evidence to suggest that, and that in some ways their part of the thing is that yes, on items like milk there is the big saving, but that overall the savings are not as great as people are led to believe and that we are being out-marketed or outadvertised.

Mr Carter: I do not accept the fact that the savings are not great. Some items are an awful lot higher. We just talked about the ones that are and they are over 50% higher, so it is worth your time, if you are going down to the States, to buy those alone on a per-hour basis. You can justify that because gasoline is so much cheaper that considered free. If you buy a basket, of course you negate some of that value, but you do not have to do. People go down there. We learned about milk. They hitting milk. They do not have to buy the full range what they are doing. If you ate nothing but grains, pasta, and you ate pork and a little bit of beef, it probably would not be worth while, in what we see, going to States. That is not what they are doing. They are hitting items where they can make a huge saving and make worth while.

Let me shut up and ask my friends if they want to anything.

Mr Ryan: I have read the concern that we may outmarketed, but I do not believe that, based certainly our experience. We have a representative from A&P who does business on both sides of the border. I do believe that would be the case at all. Loblaw's does business on both sides of the border. If you went down Louisiana or St Louis and you were to see the National Co stores, you would see stores down there that look very much like Loblaw's stores. We export the technology or store design to that market.

Our corporate brand program is exported to that market philosophically. I am not talking about products, I am talking about the philosophical approach. In our particular case we have put large supermarkets into border communities. Windsor, we put in two large supermarkets recently. Sarnia, we put in large supermarkets, the 100,000-120,000-square-foot variety, large units, well staffed, well stocked. To presume we are being outmarketed, if that were a thought, I do not believe that is the case. I believe people who work in our stores and the marketers in Ontario are as good as any place in North America.

Mr Sutherland: I have two other questions. One I want to talk about the issue of training and development of staff. We heard from Mr Winter that in a couple of surveys people found they were getting better service, one of the reasons, not the principal reason but one of them, and it has a percentage factor. I worked in a grocery store, actually, for the Zehr's people and they did a very good job of finding a niche in the marketplace in southern Ontario in terms of service. But I was constantly surprised at how much lack of training and development there was of the staff. I am just wondering whether you could comment in terms of whether there are industry standards on that basis, or do you just assume that, you know, people you hire off the street are going to know how to deal with people?

Mr Ryan: Speaking specifically of Zehr's, Zehr's and the United Food and Commercial Workers have a joint program and they have a joint training centre that they work at together to accomplish exactly that particular objective. I cannot speak to the time that you refer to, but certainly that issue is being addressed on an ongoing basis to provide the type of service that customers are looking for.

Mr Sutherland: I was also under the impression that you set aside a certain percentage of your sales budget on percentage of your budget for community involvement, community support. I was wondering if you can give us an idea, is there a standard and could you give us some idea to how much money you are putting into these communities, maybe in the communities of Ontario altogether, in terms of supporting minor ball teams, hockey teams, Big Brothers, hospital campaigns.

Mr Carter: I am going to ask them all if they would think about that. One of the things that is hard to estimate is giving to a food bank, or at what level do you do it. They may have different ways of calculating that. Some things you do when you distribute things and pick up in your trucks. Not everything will be able to be caught in a balance sheet, but I might ask them to comment. I know they are involved in different things within the community. A percentage of sales, that may be tough, but they all are involved.

Mr Ryan: We certainly would not have that number with us today, but there is not a segment of the grocery business that is not actively involved. Certainly from our standpoint, with the large franchise component of over 200 stores, there is a tremendous local involvement in small-town Ontario and large-town Ontario.

Mr Carter: A lot of this is done by the franchised players. Kevin is with National Grocers, Jonathan is with the Oshawa Group, and the independent grocer will be involved in what is going on in his community. As far as the collective side is concerned with our trade association with the members, there are a number of things going on right now that are community. You may have noticed Cash for Kids, which helps Variety Village and the telethon and they have all been involved in that. You may have noticed the Kids Help Phone, which is to help children, which is a new item, and of course Computers for Kids where we are trying to raise money for the elementary schools. There is a lot going on.

But I would like to get back to one of your questions, if you could, that talks about the service in the United States. When you have to hit a certain sales per labour hour, in this case it is $116, and your cost of labour goes up, because we have a higher minimum wage here than in New York state, it cuts down on the availability, so it is harder to have as many labour hours available. So when you face a competitor across the line who has got a lower cost, it is easier for him to have more service.

Mr J. Wilson: As I am a member of the Conservative caucus, it will not surprise you that I am pleased with most of your recommendations and comments in your brief.

You identify competitiveness as the overall underlying problem. We are constantly frustrated day after day that the government continues to blame free trade, and I think you said in your oral submission that you did not really feel the FTA had any effect on retail prices. That could be somewhat true and could be argued a bit, I guess.

You identify the importance of pricing and the price advantage enjoyed by the United States. We have had a real problem convincing this government that that is what is driving people across the border, the price advantage.

Having said all that, I am interested in the topic of Sunday shopping. We had about eight months' experience of open Sunday shopping. Could you comment, please, on what the effects were on your stores. The Premier very clearly today, in response to a question in the House, said Sunday shopping had absolutely nothing to do with cross-border shopping. Perhaps you could just comment a bit on that.

Mr Carter: I would like to ask my friends to do that, but I would like to just correct one thing, if I could. We said that the free trade agreement, at retail, had nothing to do, not with prices but with the shopping exodus. That was going on before that came in and we think it would have been going on anyway. What is going on as far as the migration is concerned had really nothing to do with that.

Mr J. Wilson: Because it is price-driven.

Mr Carter: Yes, that is true. I would like to ask my associates here to comment on the effect of Sunday shopping on cross-border shopping, if they could.

Mr Wolfe: No one in this room will have trouble with the concept that some time late last spring and early last summer the Ontario economy went into a tailspin. It began a tailspin and has continued in that direction since then. Coincidentally and concurrently with that drop was the court decision that allowed Sunday shopping.

I do not think anyone in this room could statistically verify which of those two events was the cause of the sales trend that has developed in this province since then, but I think as a retailer I can indicate that of those two concurrent activities, one had a mitigating impact on the other. The fact that the Sunday shopping became available in June, in our view, slowed the decline of retail sales.

I would suggest that to pretend that Sunday shopping is not related to a border issue is perhaps wishful thinking. We closed our store in Fort Frances, Ontario, as a direct result of our inability to compete on Sunday, and this happened before Sunday shopping was legalized in the province last June. This happened in early spring last year when we noticed our customers travelling en masse to International Falls, and we merely had no option after asking the municipal authorities for permission to compete on Sunday. They denied us that permission. We closed the store—it was a UFCW store—and felt we could no longer compete. That of course is an anecdotal example. There are more and there clearly will be more. To deny it is wishful thinking.

Mr J. Wilson: I notice your final recommendation is joint collection of the PST and the GST. I am going to ask you a political question. Given the politics of this, with the government in Ontario now, how realistic is your expectation or hope that you will see those systems merge?

Mr Carter: Our estimate is that harmonization would be good for the Treasury in Ontario. It would actually increase income to the Treasury. I do not know if that is a good thing politically or a bad thing. I will not comment on that.

Mr J. Wilson: It is good if you are the government and you can get away with it.

Mr Carter: But you have to present your budget next week.

It will also make life easier at the retail level, because harmonization—as has happened in Quebec and other provinces; they have looked towards harmonizing—makes sense from a mechanical systems side. We would hope they would look at it. I would not comment on it politically. I think some day, myself personally, it will happen because it makes so much sense.

Mr Dadamo: Has the industry ever thought of doing an analysis of some products that are available in both the US and in Canada, and sort of go on a comparison campaign and go on a media blitz for a short time to tell people that it is costing duty and taxes, travelling time, gasoline, etc, and could you possibly make a case to show them that it would be much cheaper to buy a batch of products here as opposed to going over there?

Clearly, where I come from—as I mentioned this morning, Windsor is my riding; the Ambassador Bridge is in the riding—we know that people are going in hordes to the Pace Warehouse, and we know that they are going because of course they can buy in bulk. I know that Farmer Jack's has tried doing the bulk thing in Windsor and it just does not work, because they cannot sell that case of whatever cheaper than Pace can.

So my point is a comparison campaign. Has it ever been thought of? I think it would be worth your while. I spent many years working in that industry, by the way, with Dominion Stores, since we are name-dropping, but years ago. Run those full-page ads.

Mr Carter: One of the things that retailers do, and you probably notice it in Windsor, is that they will pick out those items where they can compete, and there is a whole pile of them—we talked about them earlier, the pork and then the beef and the grain items—and they will bang those. So some of that is going on. If you tried to say, "Don't go to the States to buy poultry and eggs and milk," you will lose, because it makes sense, particularly when you throw in gasoline and cigarettes are half the price, as beer is, and so forth. So you have got to be careful when you do a comparison. If they are going after those items, your mathematics will fall apart. But the retailers do push those items where they can compete.

Let me ask my associates here: Farmer Jack's?

Mr Winstanley: We operate Farmer Jack's on both sides of the border, and the reality is that normally when you get into a situation like that you encourage retaliation, and that is retaliation that is suicidal, and you do not get into suicidal marketing games. So that is really the end of it.

Mr Dadamo: But if you are running stores on both sides of the border, and I presume that you are buying from, say, one central warehouse someplace.

Mr Winstanley: No. You cannot do that. Maybe the presentation has not made it very clear, and if it has not, I apologize on behalf of our committee.

Mr Dadamo: No, that is okay. I walked in halfway through. I apologize to you. I may have missed it.

Mr Winstanley: Okay, I am sorry. If I could just respond, though, you can just pick up the Globe and Mail and you can take a look at what the price of market on chicken is between the two countries, and it is less half the price, and dairy, and go through all of those is. We do not get into manufactured items. We have got it that we are growing, raising, harvesting right here in province that we can deal with, and I think it has to come the will to deal with those issues and to remove from the jeopardy that we now find ourselves in. I have stores in this jeopardy right now.

Mr Dadamo: Mr Kwinter was talking about Kellogg's earlier, and I had heard not long ago that the costs more to manufacture than the actual contents over the

Mr Winstanley: We covered that one earlier.

Mr Carter: I would recommend that you get Kellogg's in and ask them a little bit about that. But if you get Kellogg's in, you probably should go right back, because you have suggested, or at least I thought you would trace it right back through the system. I think that is a very worthwhile exercise, when you can not only their business input cost right back, but the retail input cost. We do not know what is going to come out of this study the feds are going to present on Monday but you might send an observer down, maybe from your research side, to see if that may be a model to do it. I think it would be very useful to do that, and you could take a look at poultry going back through it, and then the process. It is interesting that you find pricing comparisons show that fresh fruit and vegetables between Canada and the United States are a lot closer in price than the processed. That would be an interesting one to follow through as well.

The Chair: Okay, I am going to terminate this presentation at a quarter to. That would have given them an hour and I have two more questions, one from Mr Hansen and one from Mr Ward.

Mr Hansen: I grew up in the grocery business. When I was in high school I worked for Loblaw's and then I worked for Dominion. What I saw earlier in my life was small grocery stores on the corner. Then came Loblaw's with their large stores, so this was a new type of market in grocery stores. Then later on, at Loblaw's at one time they had Toronto prices and Niagara prices. In order to be more competitive they took the Toronto price, so the price was the same in the Niagara area as it was in Toronto. Then we came along with different type of grocery stores again, Comissio's, where they put the whole case on a shelf where there is just a price there, a code and everything else, so that is another type.

Do you think we are going through another phase of marketing in the grocery store business, that it is distributed? It is a whole lot of things that we have seen here? We have listened to submissions here since January in different areas for the finance committee here, and it seems like everything is changing. And as we have this cross-border shopping, we have to become competitive, and I know we have only one question, so I am going to try to put it all in if you can comment on it.

The other thing is, Mr Wilson, subbing in today—I do not know if he has read all the reports, but on the Sunday shopping issue—

Mr J. Wilson: I have read the sectoral reports, you might know, also.

Mr Hansen: Okay. One report that came in said 65% of the people were shopping in the United States because of price; 1.9% was because it was open on Sunday. It depends on where you stand to take the survey. If you stand at the bridge on a Sunday and ask, "Why are you going to States?" they say, "Because the stores are open," possibly. But in this whole list, from 65% down, and it got cut down to 0.03% because they like the margin, there are quite a few different elements involved in why they are shopping in the States.

I have already heard some of your comments on the Sunday shopping, but perhaps you could give me some comments on the grocery industry. You feel this is an area that we have to move on as a different type of marketing and distribution?

Mr Winstanley: Let me answer that in this way. Yes, you are absolutely right. You have had the entry of people from Ontario like Price Club, which has three locations now and will end up with seven. They do over $2 million a week. Their labour costs are fractional. They are non-union and they are open Sunday. By the way, they open Sunday without regard to your current ruling. They pay no attention to you. So they do that and they take a lot of our business, and they are non-union.

They bring in a lot of products that we cannot sell. We have raised the issue about before, the single-language product—

Mr Carter: You might say illegal product.

Mr Winstanley: I am not going to use the word "illegal."

Mr Carter: If it is one language, it is.

Mr Winstanley: Yes, single-language product and so on. So there are lots of other things going on. There are lots of people finding ways that are open and available to them, and yes, and I have 27,000 employees and they operate a store with very, very few and they do over $2 million a week. So, yes, you are absolutely right in your estimate.

Mr Carter: I detected at least two parts to your question and I would like to refer to them. The second one dealt with the research, when you asked people why they went to the States. Was it because of low prices or Sunday shopping? That type of research is most difficult to get a proper answer on because it may be because of both. It may be because a bunch of other things. I would suspect that is not the perfect forum to find out which is the dominant part. Our own research and observation lead us to believe that low price is the driving thing, and then if you can do it on Sunday, it may take a little bit longer. You cannot go down the street, you have to cross the border, so you need a little bit more time. Sunday is a perfect time to do it. It gives you a little more time, so it is a combination of those factors.

The other part about the changing market, the market is very dynamic. You may have noticed the difference. You asked about the format changes in stores. It is changing a lot. It is also changing in terms of the composition between independent operators and chain store operators.

Nationally, the share of market devoted to independents is going up. No place in the country is it going up faster than it is in Ontario. A lot of that is due to the increased labour costs. They have to face lower labour cost independents with pricing advantages which they enjoy. It is very dynamic.

Mr B. Ward: You are as harsh as the other Chairman when he is in the seat.

The Chair: He is teaching me the brutal ways of being a chairman.

Mr B. Ward: Just one quick question, and it deals with the pricing of the base commodities, which I would call milk, turkey, ham, etc. We have been told throughout our committee sittings by some organizations—not all, but some—that there is an apparent massive American subsidization of the agricultural sector in America. Primarily, this subsidization has led to some pricing policies that some could construe to be artificial in the sense that milk is costed at a below market price because of the amount of subsidization by the American government.

Until I heard this, I was led to believe that in America it was primarily a free enterprise system. Apparently it is not. Has your group done any research into the pricing of American commodities and the amount of subsidization of American tax dollars into that sector? If you have, would you recommend that perhaps our federal government should be looking at increasing the subsidy of our commodities to match their subsidy, if that is possible? I understand it is very massive.

Mr Carter: You bet. I am going to ask Mr Wolfe to get in, but just before he does, you are quite right. The United States does subsidize its agricultural sector. It received a lot of publicity in the recent Uruguay round in the GATT negotiations. Each of the countries participating was asked to fill out forms talking about its subsidization and the method of subsidization. It is really the method that is of particular interest here. The United States places a lot of emphasis on grain and dairy subsidization. It comes through the Treasury, the tax dollar. The Canadian groups tend to do it both through taxes but, primarily in those four commodity groups, through higher prices, which go through to the consumer. It is the difference that we see at the border.

Mr Wolfe: Mr Carter's comments are dead on the mark. The real issue is not that the American government subsidizes its farmers more or less than we subsidize the farming community in Canada. It is the way in which it is done. It is done in Canada at the retail level. Our consumers pay that subsidy. In the United States it is the taxpayer who pays the subsidy and the consumer benefits from a lower retail price. So I do not think it would be fair to accuse the Americans of unfair subsidization—

Mr B. Ward: I did not say that.

Mr Wolfe: Oh no, I am not suggesting that either. I think it would be very beneficial if provincial authorities took note of the differences in methods of subsidization and took an initiative to speak with their federal counterparts.

Mr Carter: I might add that it is particularly difficult in Ontario because Ontario has grown more rapidly than other parts of the country since the supply-management marketing boards were created some years ago. You may remember that they fixed the division of the national production quotas according to that time period. Ontario now gets short shrift because we have grown more than other parts of the country, which compounds the problem here.

Mr Wolfe: In effect we have less quota on a national basis than other provinces, which translates into a shortage of available product in this province, and that by definition raises the price to our consumers.

Mr Carter: If you are looking at things to follow up on we would like to put this on the list because it particularly disadvantages Ontario consumers. If you are writing this down you might take a look at the new report that came out from the poultry task force which recommended opening the quota assignments that were set for supply and management. If Ontario supported this it would certainly help. It is the first time this has happened and that was an all-sector committee that recommended it; it had farmers on that committee.

The Chair: Okay, I would like to thank you for your presentation this afternoon. It has been very helpful, and the hints and directions and guideposts that you gave us will also allow us to do some more research and will probably help us come to some kind of recommendation. We do not know exactly where we are going yet with the recommendations, but thank you for your presentation.

Mr Carter: Thank you, Mr Chairman. We stand ready to help in the future if that is useful to you and with research or to reappear. We would like to emphasize that this is about the most important issue we have got so we are at your disposal. Thank you.

ONTARIO BORDER COMMUNITIES MAYORS' TASK FORCE ON CROSS-BORDER AND SUNDAY SHOPPING

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Border Communities Mayors' Task Force on Cross-Border and Sunday Shopping. They are going to do a grand entrance. Thank you for bringing your signs. It is a good test of whether I need glasses or not from this distance. Please introduce yourselves.

Mr Fratesi: I am Mayor Joe Fratesi from Sault Ste Marie.

Mr Bradley: Mike Bradley, city of Sarnia-Clearwater.

Mr Millson: John Millson, mayor of Windsor.

Mrs Lawn: Sandra Lawn, mayor of Prescott.

Mr Lyons: Dick Lyons, mayor of Fort Frances.

Mr Hardy: Roland Hardy, mayor of Welland.

The Chair: Okay. Begin your presentation, please.

Mr Millson: Thank you very much. I certainly appreciate the opportunity to make this presentation to you today. I will just begin by stating how the procedure began for this group of individuals to get together.

Back about three weeks ago the Premier was in the of Windsor and was at a head table with myself and mini Dave Cooke and we were talking about various iss cross-border shopping and Sunday issues, and it was s gested that possibly the border communities might get together to discuss the Sunday shopping issue. That was c Friday. On Monday morning I was interviewed and course I began receiving phone calls from mayors all of the province of Ontario suggesting that they wanted to on this committee as well.

By Monday afternoon I had unanimous support fr 14 border communities to meet the following Wednes to discuss the issue. We assembled in downtown Toron Actually, we used the Association of Municipalities of C tario office for convenience. The group met. The Suno shopping issue took 15 minutes; the rest of the three ho was totally delving into the cross-border shopping issue do not think that there is a single issue that we have in c community right now that is of greater concern to us th cross-border shopping. I might say that as a country and a proud member of this province, I do not think the provin has a greater issue than the unemployment that is presen happening in this province and across this country, and feel and I hope we are able to demonstrate slightly in c presentation that many of the things you are seeing in t retail sector right now are just the tip of the iceberg, and fact the problems that have created cross-border shoppi are the same problems that have created the tremendo erosion in our manufacturing base.

I will just begin, as well, by indicating that the differ figures that I have used have been comparisons of the c of Windsor in some instances between last year and this ye only because I would not want to bring forward figur from another community that might be inaccurate and I kno the accuracy of the city of Windsor's.

Windsor's unemployment rate has soared from 9.2% March of 1990 to 16.4% in 1991. Unemployment rat across Canada, as you can see, have risen to a level th almost parallels the recession of the early 1980s but is ve unique in that it is continuing to grow.

Welfare levels: Now these figures are not entirely a curate, but I can tell you that the increase in welfare rolls one of the reasons which have tremendously brought th group of mayors and the municipal level of government the table, to react to this terrible dilemma that we fir ourselves in. The previous slide showed unemployme levels on the rise. We all know what is going to happen the bulk of those unemployment figures next year unle we see a major increase in manufacturing. The fact is th those people are going to be off unemployment and on the welfare rolls, which impact negatively on our proper tax base, and we as mayors are concerned about that.

1700

The cost of cross-border shopping: $2.3 billion a ye nationally, $1 billion alone in Ontario annually. We hav with us, as well, John Winter, who is back here, who ha been very generous in allowing us to pick his brain an also is here today as a resource individual. Many of you a aware of the report that he has put together dealing wi cross-border shopping. We consider him to be an exper as you can see by the arrow, his suggestion is very far that through the figures we have seen last month, cross-border shopping is increasing in numbers hourly.

Employment loss in Windsor in 1990 is 7,200 and across the country is 430,000. As it was reported in our Windsor Star by Richard Brennan, who is of course an expert on reporting accurately, he indicated that in the province of Ontario there are some 1,500 jobs per day being lost just in the manufacturing sector alone, which causes great concern for us all.

One of the issues that this committee has been able to identify as reasons on a national level that have created a dilemma in our country and things that have to be dealt with is to reduce the deficit. We are suggesting that GST be put specifically against the deficit to bring it down to a level to bring our economy back into a resemblance of what a country should have for an economy.

Reduction of interest rates is in fact taking place, but we do not see the reduction in the dollar. There are many of us who feel that the dollar has been artificially set at a high level over the last two years that is too high and has not allowed our country to be an export country, of which we have been very proud for a number of years, and in sectors such as Windsor and other border communities has impeded our ability to be a manufacturing centre in the global market.

We are suggesting to deregulate or reduce regulations. We are looking at the marketing board there as one of the main areas that should be addressed in our concern over food prices and spiralling food prices.

To investigate the wholesale monopolies, there are many cases, very clear evidence that in fact there are wholesalers on top of wholesalers on top of wholesalers in this country that inflate the retail price. I can give you an example also of a monopoly, where a set of coffee filters that were purchased by a local restaurant organization in Windsor for the last 20 years had been purchased from Detroit for $1.50. Now, all of a sudden, he went to buy them, was not allowed to, was told that there was now a Canadian distributor in Hamilton. He went to Hamilton to purchase them. The same package was now up to $8, which of course impacts negatively on our community and our ability to retail and of course drives people over to the States even quicker.

Greater border enforcement: We feel there are taxes that must be collected at the border. As well, in order to meet the demand to ensure that the traffic is flowing through our borders quickly and efficiently there has to be greater border enforcement, either more staff or whatever, to get through the difficulty that many of us have—for instance, in the city of Windsor I have more hotel rooms in my downtown area of Windsor than there are in downtown Detroit. Downtown Detroit has the largest convention facility in North America, which attracts literally hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of visitors to the Detroit-Windsor area, many of them staying in our hotels, helping our Canadian economy. Presently the conventioners are not able to get back and forth across the border in an efficient manner because they are tied up in traffic on the bridge for three or four hours at a time, which makes our brand-new convention facility, which will open in November, a very hard place to market, and of course our hotels are feeling the pinch right now.

Finally, we have asked that a graded tax system for border communities be looked at. This is not something that is unique. It happens in communities such as Quebec and I think in Alberta, where there is a graded tax system looking specifically at gasoline tax. We feel, as well, this is an issue that goes far beyond just levels of government but has to include all of the other sectors of our community from business, industry and labour.

We are asking that this group as well sit together to create innovative services and cost-effectiveness, to begin a marketing scheme, a marketing plan to market their products better, an educational campaign to help in comparative, and also the social cost has to be educated to the public: the fact that their tax dollars are going to the United States and not to support projects in our own country. A coalition of labour and business is necessary to pull this all together.

We have asked, and today I am very pleased to tell you, that Mr Pilkey, your Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, has agreed to be available for this committee structure. We have asked that a blue-ribbon task force be put together to deal with national issues. This task force, we anticipate, will be of high-level ministers at the federal, provincial and also at the municipal level. As well, national presidents of business, industry and labour groups that are affected by cross-border shopping will come to a one-day symposium that will allow us the opportunity to hang our political stripes at the door, walk in as a team would, almost as a Team Canada, to be able to work through the various problems that we have identified here and to develop strategies on how we might deal with those.

I would encourage that the members of that task force would then leave that meeting at the end of the day, go back to their respective jurisdictions and attempt to have legislation and programs passed at the various levels to expedite the way that we can once again become competitive and gain our business back.

A statistic out of the Globe and Mail two weeks ago showed that the year-long recession is wiping out jobs in Ontario twice as fast as it did in the 1981-82 recession. That is what Statscan says.

This is just another familiar sight of what you see every day in the city of Windsor, where literally tens of thousands of people are lined up on the border. I can tell you that they have a very aggressive sales approach. This is our Windsor newspaper. This is the Detroit advertisement flyer that goes in our Windsor newspaper. We will not tell Richard that, of course, there is an article in here about how it is bad to shop in Detroit—we would not embarrass him like this—but this is a double-page ad of a United States' lumberyard that is advertising in our newspaper, trying to get people over. The Americans know they have a captive audience right now, and I am telling you we are losing not only jobs but millions and millions of dollars in tax revenue to this province and to this country: tax revenue that you should be collecting.

With that, I would just ask very briefly the other members of this task force who have drawn together as a group, as a team, to bring this to this level and also to the national level as well, to attempt to get both levels of government and the community as a whole to work together on this dilemma that faces us today. Joe?

Mr Fratesi: Thank you, John. Mr Chairman and committee members, on behalf of my community I would like to express appreciation for the opportunity to talk to you about what is a serious problem for all of us who have come here today.

This delegation, unlike many others that you may have heard, is not an existing group with another cause. This is a group that was put together in the last couple of weeks out of a sense of urgency because we in our community share a very common problem. Unlike many other delegations that come to the provincial government or to the federal government, we are not here asking for help from Big Brother. We are here trying to convince you that you must, as a provincial government, and the federal government must become owners to a problem that affects us all. It is not just the consumer whom we can point our finger to and say we have got to solve that problem by talking to him. Waving the flag is not going to work in the economy, especially when it is a tough economy and the consumer is just trying to do his best and stretch his dollar. I think all of us who live in a border city will vouch for that.

The problem is one that all of us have to buy into; all three levels of government, labour, the merchant and the consumer. This does not just affect Sault Ste Marie or Sarnia or Windsor or Cornwall; it affects everyone, and we all lose. If the provincial government or the federal government were to quantify how much money it is losing in retail sales tax or gasoline tax or income tax or how much money is being put out on assistance to deal with unemployment because of this problem, we think all levels of government would very readily want to become part of the solution.

I come from a community, as you well know, that is suffering not only from the recession but Algoma Steel with its uncertainty, after having come out of a four-month labour dispute. The community now has another problem to deal with which is a mounting problem: the loss of probably $150 million per year to a very small sister American city, something that has been calculated to be in excess of 1,000 jobs and with increases that we are told are coming in at over 30% per month. I think there are things that all of us have to accept that we cannot do easily and that we cannot do quickly to help ourselves out of these problems when we talk about a North American recession and we talk about a global economy, but there are some things we can do if we work together to deal with this problem, if we accept ownership of it. I, too, would like to fall behind John and express appreciation for his leadership in encouraging the three levels of government, in a serious way, to come together in a committed way to deal with the problem and to do so with a sense of urgency, the urgency that this problem deserves. Thank you.

Mrs Lawn: Mr Chairman, I am Sandra Lawn, the mayor of the town of Prescott. We are a small community, and perhaps as a small community we can see at a glance the effect that this kind of issue is having in our community. We also feel very appreciative of the leadership that Mr Millson has shown, and we hope that our Ontario government and federal government, along with the municipal leaders of our province, as well as business, labour and industry, can come together and recognize that this is an opportunity that we have at this moment and not, I would say, for a very long time. The window is open, but it is open for a relatively short space of time because if we lose a lot of this aspect of our retail sector, it could well be lost for ever. It does have a tremendous effect on all of our communities.

If we can work together as three levels of government with business and labour, I think this will set an example for the rest of the country on a whole lot of other issues as well. Where in the past the local level has not been involved in discussions having to do with local economies, we have a tremendous amount of work to try to improve the economy of our area, and we need to have the opportunity of working in partnership with the federal and provincial governments and the business and labour leaders of our country.

We hope you will listen carefully to this message we are bringing. It is not a message of blame, but rather it is an opportunity for everyone to work together on something that is affecting each and every one of us as Canadians, whether we live 100 miles from the border, as most of us do, or whether we live in the most northern parts of our country where manufacturing and processing and the development of our natural resources are so critical. This is a very serious matter, and it is also an opportunity to show what we as Canadians can do to affect our own futures. I am sorry I have to leave.

Mr Lyons: Mr Chairman, thank you very much for allowing us to speak to you today. Just to tell you where I am coming from, I am from Fort Frances, which is a 9,000 population community just north of International Falls, Minnesota. We are separated by a bridge that is only 100 blocks long. We are 150 miles from Duluth.

We have identified that we are losing 25% of our possible sales annually; we lost that in 1990. It has been predicted that we will lose 50% in two years. We now know, the way it has been escalating, we will probably lose 50% within the next year. I think this is a problem that is not only a problem for the border communities; it is a problem of the whole province and Canada as well.

We have to get together, as suggested, the three levels of government, and come up with some type of idea to give some relief from this, and I think the most important thing here is the urgency of it. We are being devastated and are being devastated fast. It is happening very quickly. Thank you.

Mr Hardy: I am not from a border town, but we are only about 20 minutes away from Niagara Falls, New York, and half an hour from Buffalo. People are going to the States in droves. They are buying in the States because of the cost. They can go down there and get a gallon of gas for $1 or $1.20. In Ontario right now gasoline is 55 cents a litre. I do not know where we are going to be in years to come.

keep going up with our merchandise and they keep going down, it is going to get worse.

I thank the mayor of Windsor for organizing this and I hope that the government of Ontario will support us.

Mr Bradley: Mr Chairman, I am Mike Bradley, the mayor of Sarnia-Clearwater. I think all the other speakers have summarized the same points that affect Sarnia-Clearwater. There are a couple of points I want to make to you, and it comes back to the time issue. We, I think, as a community, were very reluctant to come forward on this issue. We recognized the danger of coming forward, that we might highlight the issue, that we through the media again identify pricing. Last year I felt that way.

I want to just let you know what has happened at the Sarnia-Clearwater Bridge between Sarnia and Port Huron since 1 January and the imposition of the goods and services tax. There were 23,000 more cars this January than last January. In February, 34,000 more cars, and the figures I received yesterday in March 1991 over March 1990, almost 50,000 more cars. That is telling you the story. There is a tax revolt and it is a tax revolt where people in border communities could exercise another route to, I guess, throw back their anger at governments at all three levels.

The difficulty now is that it is becoming an Ontario problem, not just a border-city problem. I want to give you an example. Sarnia manufactures gasoline for most of this province and for a great deal of this country. Some of that gasoline is shipped to Port Huron, Michigan. In our area there is 23 cents more in taxation versus what is being paid in Michigan. The people of Sarnia are buying gasoline they make across the bridge. When we talk about a graduated system for taxation on gasoline, we are simply asking you to recapture, not to give out money, but to recapture what you are losing. The fact is, Ontario lost $150 million in taxation as it relates to gasoline by the best estimates we have.

So the problem is not just municipal and not just provincial, and certainly not just federal. I hope you will trust that we are being sincere. We really feel this is a non-partisan, non-finger-pointing exercise. We do not want that. We cannot afford that right now. If we have the opportunity to sit down for a day or two and resolve the issues, we believe that we will go back and do what we can within our jurisdictions and that same school of thought should apply to the other two levels of government.

I come back to what I said originally: if you were to visit our respective downtowns, you would understand why we are talking about the urgency of time. It is impacting so quickly and so severely that if this is not solved by the end of this year you will not have to worry about the Loma Steels, you will not have to worry about the automobile plants or the refineries in our communities, because they simply will not have a retail base. Sadly, the jobs that are being lost in the retail base are jobs that we cannot create in these other industries. We are losing employment in an area where the people's only other option is to go to the social assistance rolls.

So we are here from all political stripes. Sault Ste Marie has Sunday shopping; Sarnia-Clearwater does not. That is not the issue. The issue is trying to stop this haemorrhaging of the Canadian market before we have to finally shut down our retail industry.

One final point: the mayor of Fort Frances did not mention it but a week or two ago there was published by the business community there an obituary for their business community. It named all the grieving parties. It is not overstating the issue. We are in serious trouble and we need not just assistance, we need leadership and we need co-operation. Thank you very much, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Turning to questions. Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for coming before the committee. It is interesting, it is a serious situation and I am alarmed that in my riding, the Woodstock area, how many more people are taking weekend trips across the border and doing it on a more regular and more consistent basis.

I guess I want to bring in a couple of points. Mayor Fratesi mentioned that you cannot wave the flag on this one; that is not going to do it. Mayor Millson in the presentation talked about investigating wholesale monopolies and he used the example that if we could source from other places, such as outside the country, as this particular retailer was doing, that is one way of reducing the prices. You also talked about supply-management systems, but all of those have a cost in other areas in the economy in terms of if you are sourcing, as I believe Mr Kwinter has mentioned before, out of the country, then you are cutting jobs somewhere else. Supply management—if that is not there then our farmers are going to hurt even more than they already are.

Mr Bradley said it was a tax revolt, but really have we got a situation here where Canadians are simply saying they do not want to pay the price to be Canadian any more? They want the quality of life, but they are not willing to pay a price to be Canadian.

Mr Millson: That is totally false. What every Canadian is saying to you directly, the provincial and the federal governments, is that we will compete, we will compete with the best of them and we will give you the best damned product for the best damned price possible. Let us do it on a level playing field. I can tell you that Ford in Windsor is investing $150 million in my community right now.

They are doing that for one reason, because of the quality of the workforce. They know they can compete on a world basis with the quality of workforce. My tool and die industries could be competing as well if the dollar was not set at the level it is at right now of 87 cents. If it was 72 cents, they could be doing something.

Once again, all I am doing is stating the problem of the value of the Canadian dollar. For whatever reason over the last two years, it has gone up an unprecedented amount of money. All they are asking for is to be allowed the opportunity to have a level playing field.

Mr Sutherland: If I can make one more point on that, you mentioned regulations. We have some very good occupational health and safety in comparison, we have good environmental standards in comparison. You could debate that they can certainly be improved, but in comparison they are very good. I look at that type of thing, people who are taking the benefits of that. There is no doubt they add an extra cost to doing business. But what do you say to the same people who are still working, who are enjoying those types of benefits, those extra standards and those extra costs, yet still feel that they should be going across the border, still feel that it is no problem to go across the border to get things at a cheaper price? How do you rationalize with those people? What logic do you throw back to those people that they should not do that?

Mr Bradley: First of all, I want to make it very clear to you, we are not here today, I guess, to debate every individual issue. What we are saying to you is, there is a multitude of issues and we just simply want to have you as part of the process of finding solutions. But I will tell you what has happened in the last few weeks in my community, since this became a national issue. People are looking for a reason to stay here. They want to shop here, but they also have to look after their pocketbooks in a recession. All of us are facing double-digit unemployment in our communities.

I will give you an example of a retailer who came to me yesterday knowing I was making this trip. He is in the furniture business and was looking at an order of $5,000 to $7,000 in the furniture business. An American can meet that. They are level and they continue to be level. He is willing to compete, he is willing to bring down his gross profit margin. Where he runs out of luck is that he cannot address the 7% provincial sales tax that is not being collected at the border crossing.

So what we are saying to you on these other issues is, if we even had those issues dealt with—I believe the province lost $90 million last year in uncollected revenue on provincial sales tax. If we had the laws of this province being enforced, if we had these other issues being addressed through the process that Mayor Millson has been requesting, which is an attempt to sit down and resolve the issue, then we believe we can at least stop the haemorrhaging. We know we are not going to cure the problem, but we think we can do that by not today focusing on the individual issues, but saying, “Help us make this a national issue and find a national solution.” We need to do it literally within weeks. We cannot afford months. We need it now.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to congratulate Mayor Millson and his group for their initiative in putting together this task force and I wish them well on their blue-ribbon task force if it gets going.

It is a serious problem. I have said this before. I think that we are in danger of seeing the loss of our retail base, and by extension it is going to impact on the decommercialization, the deindustrialization of the province. When I look at your national issues, in every case, virtually, for every action there is going to be a reaction. I do not have a solution to it, but I will give you an idea.

John, you were talking, I assume, about the Renaissance Center, Cobo Hall in Detroit as being the largest convention centre in North America and that people would normally come over to Windsor to occupy the more hotel rooms there than there are in downtown Detroit. You are decrying the fact that they are not doing that. They are not doing that because it takes too long to get across the border.

In the next breath, you are saying, “We think there should be greater enforcement and we think one of the solutions that we’ve got to stop everybody and make sure everybody who should be paying is paying,” which means it is pushing down here and it pops up there.

By addressing that problem and saying, “Okay, we’re going to put more people in there. We’re going to search cars, we’re going to search the whole thing,” instead of it being two hours, it is going to be two days. As I say, if you have ever travelled through some of the countries in Europe, trucks that are going through checkpoints or through cross-border points are generally lined up for days. You see them there, the fellas say, “Well, it’s going to take me two days to get through this point.” So it is a problem. As I say, with every one of these problems, the solution creates another problem. I am being critical. I am not saying that we should not pursue a solution. I am just saying that if there were a simple solution it would have had it.

Mr Millson: Mr Kwinter, there is a simple solution, actually, and in fact that analogy that you used is an example, but if governments and people went to a local A&P, they could probably find the solution right there in front of them. If I have a Saturday afternoon, I have people lined up all over the place. All of a sudden there is somebody with a cart of 20 items and somebody with a cart of two items. So, what did the merchant do? He decided, “We’ll have a lane specifically for people with a limited amount of goods.” In customs, it would be called something similar to a red-door/green-door approach that we use. We say people who have goods to declare should in fact be in this lane. Other people, be it Canadians, Americans, tourists, whatever, conventioners, should line up in this lane and be drawn through. That is a very simple solution. It is just a mere traffic control problem.

While those people are queued on the bridge, one businessperson—or business person—might say: “Why am I paying 50% of that money just wave through? Why am I letting that go?” I would think if there was an opportunity there to collect federal and provincial taxes, it would make sense, instead of waving one person through, I will hire more staff person to put on duty to collect that tax, so they are not lined up on the bridge. In fact, if you segregated the people and ensured that there was more staff on hand to do the job, you could collect all your taxes and you could make sure there was no waiting on the bridges or in the tunnels, and everyone would be happy and you would be collecting more taxes than you are collecting right now.

Once again, I think on both of those analogies that you used, a simple trip to a grocery store would probably show you how private industry would have handled the situation.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to follow up on that. I am sure you do not have the exact number, because nobody does. Could you give me an idea, present day, how many people go over and shop—same-day shopping—on the border, and come back and declare it, regardless of the level of shopping they have done?

Mr Millson: Mr Winter might have that. He indicates he does not have that figure.

Mr Kwinter: Okay. I have a suggestion. I have no way of knowing, but I would suggest that the number of people to say they have nothing to—I should put it the other way around. The number of people who declare is an infinitesimal number of the people who should be declaring.

Mr Millson: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: And what I am suggesting is that whether you have a green lane or a red lane, the guys going through the green lane are going to keep going through the green lane. They are going to have their trunks full of merchandise, and they are going to say, "I have nothing to declare, thank you very much," and away they go.

Mr Millson: The answer to that, Mr Kwinter, is very simple again. There are rules. There are penalties for not complying by those rules. Right now, our customs individuals are quoted in the newspaper several weeks ago as indicating they were waving through 60% right now. I will just indicate to you that if in fact an individual was to abuse the lineup of a green-door system, go through and indicate that they had nothing to declare and that in fact they were expected, which is a normal process of inspection, to go to secondary inspection, I will tell you that customs have the right and the ability to confiscate the car, confiscate the goods, and never allow them back into the United States again. Those kind of penalties, if enforced, would in fact deter anyone from lying to Revenue Canada.

Mr Kwinter: I had to jump into that.

Mr Fratesi: I would just add to that, if I may, Mr Chairman. A good place to start might be to just add—and might be this simple—another little box on the form for someone who has already stopped, who is already going in to pay federal tax and federal GST, duty, at the border and have the provincial sales tax picked up. That is not going to cost anybody anything. It is not going to make the setup bigger. It is just one more box and one more amount that has to be added to the calculated amount. But that requires some co-operation between two levels of government that, for some reason or other, is not there yet. Getting to this trilevel-type meeting would put those kinds of issues on the table so that at least starts are made on finding some of the solutions, because I do not think any of us expect that we are collectively—as government together with merchants and everyone else—going to make prices equal. All we have got to do is make them closer, and then, and only then, will waving the flag work so that Canadians who are not seeing half-price gasoline but are seeing gasoline for perhaps five cents a litre cheaper on the other side of the bridge going to stay home and stay in Canada, because then they feel patriotic. There are ways, if we just sit down and start talking about them.

Mr J. Wilson: I have more of a comment than a question, because I gather today really we probably do not want to get into specifics on the numerous issues and problems contributing to this problem, but just to let you know, Mayor Lyons, I was in Fort Frances over the weekend and it seemed to me I heard a lot about taxes from tourism operators as the PC Tourism and Recreation critic. Nice place, but you are absolutely right, it was a little quiet there on Saturday in the downtown core and yet the bridge was extremely busy. I did not go across, by the way.

None the less, if our party can be helpful in having people attend the blue-ribbon panel, I think it is a good idea. My only reservation with these things is that they do tend to raise public expectations. You want to make sure the groundwork is done ahead of time so that there can be some agreement there, I would hope, and, second, encourage the tourism ministers to attend. Also we have been saying to the government something we think that they can move on right away, because certainly the federal government would like to see it, trying to convince the government: "Look, the GST isn't going to go away. You should harmonize your tax collection systems. Take the extra bodies that that would save throughout the province in terms of auditors and that and use those person-years for border collection." I was happy to hear the mayor of Sarnia indicate a joint collection at the border, anyway. You did not quite indicate a full harmonization of the systems, but we feel that would be very helpful.

Mr Bradley: Just the point I was trying to make is that right now the provincial tax is not being picked up and there seems to be a jurisdictional dispute between the province and the federal government and there are tradeoffs, I guess, that are not happening, but it is a very clear example of where the only people in the crossfire, the losers, are the taxpayers. But I do not have any difficulty with raising expectations, because if we do not, our community is going to be in a position where it will be a tragedy.

Mr J. Wilson: I do have one more comment. I appreciate the answer. We just heard from the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors. They indicated to us that Sunday shopping was part of this issue. I think it boiled down to the fact that shopping in the US takes a bit more time and Sunday affords people normally more time to shop, because they are not working. Is there consensus among you? I gathered from the presentation that Sunday shopping has nothing to do with it. Have you come to that conclusion, or would you like to comment further on it?

Mr Fratesi: I come from a community that has had Sunday shopping for four years, grocery stores included. My community has as big a cross-border shopping problem as anyone else. I would hate to see Sunday shopping taken out of my community as a feature. It has become a way of life. It would simply give another reason to shop in the Michigan Sault on a Sunday, but Sunday shopping and the ability to have Sunday shopping in my community may be a very small factor in this cross-border issue. It certainly is not a significant factor.

Mrs Sullivan: Thank you for a very interesting presentation. One of the things that I found interesting in the discussions that have occurred to this point with the committee relates to the fact that the issue of cross-border shopping has also come to the fore at a time of recession in the province and in the country. I would be interested in knowing if AMO or if you as individual mayors have done any kind of representative comparison with non-border towns relating to declining retail sales. We know, by example, if we look at the third-quarter report from the Treasurer, that the expected retail sales tax income is going to be down $672 million at the end of this fiscal year. The fuel tax is estimated to be down $19 million in this fiscal year.

Much of that will not be a result of cross-border shopping issue but will be a result of trends in shopping that have been created by the recession. I wonder if you have looked at other communities to determine in fact what proportion of your retail loss is a direct result of cross-border shopping or may reflect a recessionary impact.

Mr Millson: Mr Winter has done a tremendous report for various communities and is what I would consider an expert on the field.

Mr Winter: You just have to look at the market shares that some of our communities are losing: Fort Frances, for instance, 30% in gasoline share; in the Niagara area, 15% to 20% of the clothing dollar is going across the border. These market shares are rising relatively rapidly. The problem is how much damage are we willing to accommodate. It is going up rapidly.

Mr Millson: Eighty per cent of the population is within Mr Winter's circles, I think, referring to what you would purchase 15 minutes away from a border, how much would you purchase from an hour away, an hour and a half, two hours away. With that kind of population growth so close to the border, unfortunately all of your retail trade basically is cross-border-related.

When you speak about other mayors, as you can see, the provincial members from the province of Ontario have certainly rallied behind and endorsed this. I attended in Montreal last week the mayors of the large cities across Canada associated with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. That group of individuals thoroughly endorsed this full presentation unanimously and encouraged us to continue on. In fact, where they had border communities in their provinces, they wanted to be actively involved at the national level.

Mrs Sullivan: Your response leads me to the next question. That is the definition of a border town. I represent Oakville, Burlington and Milton. I am told by retailers in my community that cross-border shopping has had an impact on their operations. You have suggested a gas tax that is graduated from the border to another point. I have two problems with that.

I am not sure how you would do it. It might work in Fort Frances or some place like that, but if you are moving, say, from the Buffalo area through to Toronto, how do you place a tax that does not change retailing patterns within Ontario from community to community? In fact, with the majority of the population of our province, and of all of Canada, within the limited area close to the border of, say 200 miles, Thunder Bay describes itself as a border community. It is 200 miles from the border. In fact, I think you are closer to Duluth, are you not? Where do you draw the line of how a graduation in that kind of tax could work, and even in the definition of what a border town is?

Mr Bradley: It is a very valid question. Even among there are two different types of individuals representing communities. There are the actual border communities that have direct connections to the US and then there are communities that are impacted further back. I have a report which I could file with the committee which is from the federal Department of Finance—it was released a month or two ago—dealing with the cross-border purchase of gasoline. I will be honest with you. The report is saying that it is a very difficult process to implement. The question you raise are legitimate. However, I think it has been worked with that type of mandate to come up with all the reasons why not. We recognize that it would be very difficult.

We also recognize, though, that the problem is as you go further back in, if you are graduating the gasoline from Sarnia back through, say, to London, all you are trying to do through the different zones—we have looked at zones of 10 to 20 kilometres, etc, and a similar reduction as you move back—is to take away the incentive to purchase gasoline. And we think it can be addressed.

We do not believe it is that easy, but on the other hand, if it is in place between Quebec and Vermont, it is in place in other jurisdictions. You are not capturing any of that revenue at the present time. Why would you not try to recapture some of it? We are more than willing to work on implementing the zones and implementing the process. We recognize it is difficult, but it can be done. What you are really trying to do is take away the incentive as you move further into Ontario. We believe that is workable and that is the solution.

Just to go back to when all the mayors met about a few weeks ago, we all had our disagreements on Sunday shopping and some of the other issues. We all agreed on the issue—gasoline. It is the product that takes them across the border there in the border communities and then the other purchasing builds from that. In our community gasoline went to 41 cents per litre just 10 days ago. The gas station owners were telling me they were seeing people they had not seen in over a year, because it kept them, it took away the primary incentive to travel to the US. That is in a town that makes the gasoline.

Ms Harrington: I want to thank you for coming to the way here from all across Ontario. It really is impressive because you are making a very strong statement. I must admit to you that I represent the city of Niagara Falls, so I know exactly what you are speaking about.

As a consumer myself, and having to shop and feed my family—that is, up until September; now my husband does it—I understand what it is like to be there and I would agree with Mayor Fratesi when he is saying that at least when the prices were closer then things, I am sure, would work out better. I believe also, to agree with you, that gasoline has a lot to do with it, with that temptation to go across that bridge. Myself, I take into account the time it takes the aggravation and all those things, and it is not worth going across.

If we could get more people to consider the other factors that are involved in it—we mentioned the people in ession who do not have the money and therefore are struggling across because of their budgets. Certainly, it is a free country and we cannot point fingers at people like that, but we have to, I believe, educate people to think about what they are doing and also be realistic about looking for all kinds of solutions. There is a whole range of them. I certainly have looked at a lot of them and we have to do something.

I would like to tell you that a month ago I did ask Premier Rae to meet with our local mayor about this issue and some other people from our community as well. He told us that he was open to local solutions, so I am saying to you that I believe—this is the first day I have been with this committee—it is this committee's responsibility to carry forward all the recommendations that come before us, to make sure that they are heard and to make sure that there is some kind of action. I think that is our responsibility. As I said, you were talking about a task force, so I certainly would endorse that.

I wanted to ask you a couple of questions. In our community we had an initiative from the merchants themselves which was called Shop Ontario. I would like to ask if any of you have been involved in that and whether or not that is going to do anything to help. Second, you said—and I am trying to quote here—that the same problems cause the loss of manufacturing jobs as cause cross-border shopping. I was hoping you would explain that a little bit more. I have those two questions for you, Mr Millson.

Mr Millson: On the first issue, with regard to the various merchants and the various plans and the provincial report that came out of, as you call it, Shop Ontario—

Ms Harrington: That is it.

Mr Millson: —that has been reviewed by ourselves of course, and it has also been reviewed by the chambers of commerce, I know, not only in Windsor but in many communities across the province. In fact, they find it a very useful tool. The chamber in the city of Windsor has adopted that and is attempting to work at the grass-roots level to get the various retailers together to be part of that program. They have initiated joint advertising dollars, and I will say that my municipality, the government, the municipality itself, has involved itself financially in many of those joint advertising campaigns. I hesitate to mention that, because I am not sure whether it is really legal under the Municipal Act, but we nevertheless have joined forces, through our tourist and convention bureau, to put money into the coffers of the chamber of commerce to jointly put together self-financing ads running in Detroit papers and also to compete locally, so that our merchants can compete and educate the community itself on prices in our community.

I am sorry, the second question?

Ms Harrington: You said that the loss of manufacturing jobs and the cross-border shopping had the same root cause. I wonder if you could go through that.

Mr Millson: Right. Well, very simply put, one of the reasons that many Canadians go to the United States to shop is of course the price, the competitive nature brought about because of a dollar that is not where we as manufacturers probably think the dollar should be. Therefore, the manufacturing sector, over the last two years, has been fighting this same kind of competitiveness that the retailers are facing right now.

Therefore, many of the tool and die industries, many of the manufacturers, have not been able to compete. As we see, the coming in of the free trade agreement with Mexico is another fear that in fact we could very well be losing once again. Every single day we all pick up newspapers that show more plants closing. Since your government has taken power, there was a report the other day, there have been 260,000 jobs lost in the province of Ontario.

Once again, many of those jobs are gone for good, which is much different than what we saw in the 1981-82 recession. Once again, I am saying to you that a lot of that dilemma has come about because of fiscal policies, monetary policies that this country has adopted and carried forward for the last several years. Those are items that have to be addressed, that are just now being seen at the retail sector but actually started at the manufacturing sector earlier.

Mr B. Ward: I think, when you look at the problem of cross-border shopping, primarily it is price. I do not think anyone could deny that. Primarily, the consumer is trying to get the best value for his or her dollar, especially during tough times. If things appear to be cheaper in America, obviously that is where that individual is going to go.

You have made some recommendations. I think part of the problem is that we have two different systems or societies. America has its society and we have ours. America has toll-booths—we have road construction out of general revenue—toll-booths to pay primarily for their road construction or maintenance. Municipalities in America have the ability, it is my understanding, to defer property taxes or to defer some taxes. In Canada and in Ontario, you do not.

In America, they do not have an adequate medicare system. In Ontario and in Canada, we do. There are a number of philosophical differences between the two countries as far as social policies are concerned. In America, if they face a financial crunch, as Detroit did not too long ago, they lay off 300 policemen or they shut down the transit system, as they did in Buffalo. In Ontario, we ensure that we have stability by having adequate revenues through property tax and/or transfer payments from the province and the federal government.

Have you examined that aspect of the situation? I think we have to get to the meat of the question. Do you suggest that perhaps Ontario and Canada should be heading towards a more American-type system? By American system, I mean their tax system and the resultant impact that would have on some of our philosophical policies. Or do you feel that out of the task force recommendations perhaps a number of solutions or recommendations could be suggested so that we could avoid that? I mean the idea of Sunday shopping, the idea of the tax zones for gasoline, the idea of stricter border inspection. Sometimes I think we do things backwards. They are trying an express lane in British Columbia for Canadians and perhaps that should be for Americans, to encourage them to come to our country.

Philosophically, do you think that perhaps, in your opinion, we are doing things wrong as a society, or do you feel that there is a solution to be found by implementing a number of recommendations so that we can avoid heading into the American tax system?

1750

Mr Millson: Anybody want to tackle that one?

The Chair: When you start to answer that, I want to make sure you know that every word is going to be recorded.

Mr Fratesi: I think as long as it is lawful, as long as it is convenient and as long as it results in a bargain to shop on the American side, we all have to recognize who our competition is. It is a fact. We are competing with the American merchant—and when I say “we,” I mean me as a municipality and you as a provincial government and the federal government as well as the merchant—for dollars, whether they be tax dollars or they be dollars that are in the till. And no, I do not think any one of us wants to Americanize our system, but we have to recognize that is whom we are competing with as long as our borders are the way they are.

No one is suggesting that they should be shut down, because that would be regressive, but that is who the competition is. And yes, to your last question, should we be sitting down and talking about this, that and the other thing and putting together a package of things. When I talked about waving the flag before, I was not just appealing to someone's sense of patriotism. I was talking about trying then, and only then, when things get closer, to talk to him about how important our system is because it funds the medical system, because it pays for the roads. He will listen to it when we close the gap, but he certainly is not going to listen to it when he is paying double the price here and it is lawful, it is convenient and it is something that is available for him to stretch his dollar in an economy.

So yes, you suggested there were things that we could sit down and talk about. “We” has to include all levels of government. “We” has to include a merchant who might have to smile longer or with a bigger smile because the American competitor is offering price only. All sorts of things have to be done, but it has to involve everyone, not just you as one level of government or me as another level of government. And not just the consumer, to appeal to him that our system is much different. As long as we remain in a competitive position with Americans, we have to recognize that we are competing. We do what we must. That is what this is all about, putting together what we must.

Mr Bradley: A very impressive list of comparisons. I always like to use one when I am in Michigan speaking: that they have organized crime and we have the Liquor Control Board of Ontario.

The Chair: Is that a comparison or a contrast?

Mr Bradley: I say that with all respect. The former member for Sarnia has now gone to that great heaven.

I would just very quickly make the point that of any group of people in this country, we have managed to resist becoming Americanized. We are very proud of being Canadian, and we know we can compete, as the mayor of Windsor indicated. We recognize there is a substantial difference. There is a substantial difference in municipal taxes. But we respect the benefits we get out of that.

What we are just trying to do is, again, move the pl field to a level where at least they have a fighting ch That is all we are asking for out of this whole exercise

Mr Millson: Just in conclusion on that, Brad, i last couple of days did you not just lose 350 employe your community?

Mr B. Ward: It seemed like we were losing a p week for about the last six months.

Mr Millson: I guess that is probably my point. No wants to go to the American system. It is a great pla vacation once in a while but, you know, do you wa live there type of routine. But the difficulty we al facing right now is as you are experiencing today in community. You lost 350 employees. Who in the h going to start paying these bills? Who is the one wh putting the money into the coffers of this province an this country to give us the hospitalization? You say you are collecting taxes, and I am saying to you that t is not going to be anybody able to pay the taxes any m That is where we are at and that is why these border c munities have this problem.

Mr Hansen: Mr Kwinter had stated earlier that like a snowball; it is growing. I agree with him on that I hope it melts pretty quick.

I see a lot of other social costs involved, like in S Ste Marie just recently, the money that came from province for the development of the park. That park be free for people in Ontario and to attract tourists to c from the United States. But it seems that when you g the States and you go to a park, you have to pay to ge you have to pay to park your car. So we have a diffe fabric here in Ontario completely.

Mr Winter described Fort Frances also. The police partment is, I think, double the size in Fort Frances of v it is in International Falls. Not only that, but there full-time fire department, which is safer in Fort Fran than it is in International Falls. So when you start compar these social costs that are protection to your family, e the fact that people felt safer shopping in Fort Frances t in International Falls, people have to compare all th things, and what do they want in the end?

This is a short-term gain; they are gaining right now going across the border. But what we have to do is tak look at the long term. I am glad that this task force star before we even had a chance to ask you, because this v one of our objectives that we have been going along partnership between the federal government, the provin government and the local municipalities. You are just c step ahead of us. I think we said this about three weeks a and I do not know whether you heard it on the radio or T but this is an area that we are coming to.

We have sat through most of these hearings; we ha some that are subbing in here today. But the other thing that I look after a rural area, which is Lincoln. I can s that in the municipality, with the tax base, if we are payi more for welfare cases, and it is going to grow, then v have to cut in certain areas. So most likely for the ball d mond down the street you say, “Sorry, we do not have mor in our budget for the parks department this particular yea only that, but the corner store or the small shop will "I do not have the money this year to sponsor your baseball team." So I think you are going to find that it is going to change the whole fabric here in Ontario if we do solve this problem right away.

I have talked to the Minister of Revenue already. They are taking a look at the tax situation in New York state. I brought to her attention that you go to the States and buy lawn and lawn furniture and have it shipped over here and they tell you that you do not have to pay state tax because you are going out of the state. They tell you on the telephone that you do not have to pay provincial tax; it is up to you to pay it. All you have to do is pay 8.3% duty and 7% GST and they will drop it in your driveway.

So these are new ways that the competition is trying to get in that back door. We have to close that back door and lock it a little bit. Thank you.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming. I know you have travelled a long distance. I think the fact that this committee is having these hearings and has invited as many people as it can to them is an indication of the degree to which we take this as being a very serious issue. We are seeking to try to find solutions and recommendations that we can give to the Premier and to the government.

Mr Millson: Thank you, Mr Wiseman. Thank you, members, very much.

The Chair: We have one piece of business as a committee before we break. On Monday there is the meeting of the government's and private sector representatives on the cross-border issue at the Ramada Renaissance hotel. It is at 10 o'clock in the morning and it goes until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Obviously, if you can make it—that would be your own—that would be great. As a committee, I do not think we can go because of the time. It has been suggested that perhaps we should send the clerk and Anne or David to this meeting, but we need to have direction from the committee to do that.

Ms Harrington: That is Monday morning, 10 o'clock, in Niagara Falls?

The Chair: Yes, from 10 until 2 o'clock.

Mr J. Wilson: I do not know whether Mr Sterling would have a problem with that or not.

Mr Hansen: Monte, do you have a problem with that?

Mr Kwinter: I have no problem with that.

The Chair: In the past we have discussed the whole idea of travelling as a committee. Travelling as a committee, in this circumstance, I do not think is possible, and I know that Mr Sterling would not agree with that.

Ms Harrington: It is the first time I have heard about it, but I would like to check and see if there is any possibility of my being able to go for at least the morning.

The Chair: You can do that on your own, but this is to send two members of the research staff.

Mr Kwinter: Oh, just to send them?

Mr J. Wilson: We have no problem with that, no.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr J. Wilson: I thought you wanted to send Norm.

The Chair: It is agreed. Okay. No, just that you are filling in for Norm.

Mr J. Wilson: We can get rid of him for a day, sure.

The Chair: Okay, so we can decide who is going to go. This committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock Thursday.

The committee adjourned at 1801.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

BUFFALO ADVERTISING INC

The Chair: We have a quorum now, if Mark Adler of Buffalo Bargains could come forward, please. Thank you coming to the committee.

Mr Adler: I am glad to take my place before you this morning as a proud Canadian and as a resident of the province of Ontario. As the Chairman said, my name is Mark Adler. I own an international company, Buffalo Advertising Inc. I am also an international author. I published a book titled Buffalo Bargains, which was released last September. Within the first three weeks of its release it became a Canadian best seller. I was very pleased with the progress of the book and the sales. To date, Buffalo Bargains has sold over 25,000 copies, making it not only a Canadian best seller but a best seller in the United States as well.

My company is also in the business of providing shopping directories not only for Canadians who live in southern Ontario but also for Canadians who live right across the country. I am publishing books for Bellingham, Washington, Montrealeers who head to Burlington, Vermont, and for people who live in Atlantic Canada who shop in the north-eastern United States.

Although I have not gotten much ink on this aspect of my business, I also provide shopping directories for Canadians shopping in Canada, but the more popular side of my business these days seems to be for those Canadians who are heading to the United States to do cross-border shopping, which has become known.

I come before you today really to talk about ordinary people, ordinary Canadians. I am talking about the single mother of two who has to go to Buffalo to provide milk for her children, where she can buy it at 69 cents for a half-gallon as opposed to paying $3.18 here in Toronto; the single mother of two who has to go to Buffalo to buy her vegetable soup, where it is only 49 cents as opposed to $1.09 here in Toronto.

I have some comments by ordinary Canadians which have appeared in the press, some of which I would like to share with you. It is a reflection really of how Canadians and southern Ontarians feel about having to shop here, having to pay the high prices here and rising taxes.

I have one quote here from an article that appeared in the Toronto Sun last November, from a 33-year-old civil servant. It does not say whether or not he is employed, or at what level of government, but he says: "Everything is cheaper, kids clothing, groceries, toys and shoes. And there's also tremendous deals on shoes. A pair of boots I bought here for $15 are $60 at home. Cowboy boots I bought here for $22 are $75 at home." He goes on to say: "It's our crazy government's fault. Prices in Toronto are outrageous. We're paying so much because of all their taxes and that's why we have to come here." They go on to say that they hope—this was during the wintertime—that there would be a blizzard so they would have to stay over longer, so they could legally bring back more goods to Canada.

From an article in the Globe and Mail, we have another ordinary Canadian. These are people who live in Thunder Bay who shop in Duluth, Minnesota. We have one resident saying: "Retailers in Thunder Bay have ripped us off for so damned long and now it's catching up to them. My brother saved $700 on a refrigerator. At these prices I can't afford to be loyal to Canada." He goes on to say: "No way I feel guilty. I could care less. It's cheaper in the US, staff are friendlier and there's better selection."

Let me just finish off with one quote I found rather humorous. This is a butcher in a Super Duper market in Buffalo, where he is telling one Canadian consumer that turkey costs 75... a pound. This is compared to $1.49 a pound in Toronto, and he says to the Canadian consumer, "Guess you guys are the real turkeys."

Let me put the human face to cross-border shopping, how it affects people, why people are going, why Canadians are hopping in their cars and taking the hour-and-a-half drive from Toronto or from Oshawa, or the 20-minute drive from wherever it may be, St Catharines, to head down to Buffalo and shop. Something must be wrong if a resident of northwestern Ontario can go down to Duluth, Minnesota, a 200-mile drive, buy lumber that was cut down in his own backyard, bring it back to Canada and, after all the duties and taxes are paid, find it cheaper, on a $6,000 purchase in one instance. This is from a call that I received, and I receive lots of calls from people all across the province who tell me their stories or their small victories. This person, by paying $6,000 for a pine door, or a number of doors, saved over $1,100. This is after duties and taxes were paid on wood that was cut down in his own backyard, from his own forest.

Something must be wrong when a Canadian student can purchase Pierre Berton's books, the history of his own country, the history of Canada, for $6.35 in the United States and $8.54 in Canada.

Now we are in a major recession. We have unemployment seasonally unadjusted at 10.5% in this province. People are being laid off all the time. More Canadians are on social assistance than ever before in the history of our country. Again, these are data, but they are stark data and they tell a story. Behind each statistic is a human, a face. These people are fighting a war against rising prices and high taxes in the best way they know how. They do not hold meetings in secret. They do not need task forces and they do not need committee hearings to know that they can get eggs for 39 cents a dozen in Buffalo, as opposed to $1.29 here in Canada.

My office fields calls from Canadians every single day, telling me and my staff of their small victories, of being able to purchase eggs and soup and bread and groceries, just the bare essentials of life. These people are not heading down to Buffalo to buy frivolous items, although some do, but a lot of people are heading down there to buy the bare necessities, to feed, to clothe and to put fuel into their own automobiles.

These people are proud Canadians and it is wrong to point an accusatory finger at them and tell them that it is their fault the Canadian economy is in such poor shape. These people are not unpatriotic. They have really reached a threshold. They feel that they have been taxed too much, that prices are too high, and they are fighting back in the best way and the only way they know how. Rather than pointing an accusatory finger and condemning them, I give them credit.

Now the term "cross-border shopping" itself is really a misnomer. It has become synonymous with the people who, as I say, hop into their cars and head to Buffalo and load up on jeans and groceries and soda pop and all those types of items. But cross-border shopping is much wider than that. It is not really useful to focus on one minor part of cross-border shopping. I would be engaging in cross-border shopping if I headed off to Hong Kong or Europe and purchased items. I would be cross-border shopping if I were a Canadian land developer purchasing land in the United States. Robert Campeau was probably the best example of a cross-border shopper. Thank goodness for many in our retail sector perhaps, he was a cross-border shopper and did not buy a Canadian retailing concern.

Should we be allowing our airlines to fly Canadians outside Canada to buy goods and services that they can buy here? Perhaps we should set up a government tribunal which would evaluate the usefulness of Canadians flying abroad. If their trip is not of any economic benefit to Canada, then perhaps we should not let them go.

In all these instances, money is leaving Canada. It is a form of cross-border shopping. So when we talk about cross-border shopping, we should include every facet and not just the single mother of two, or the family that heads out to Buffalo, or the family that crosses from Sault Ste Marie for the day to buy some groceries or some gasoline. That is wrong. What is considered shrewd for the Canadian businessman is considered to be unpatriotic for the ordinary Canadian, and I say that is wrong.

In my submission I put forth some statistics. For example, if a Canadian were to buy a condominium in Florida—I take the case of Boca Raton, for no particular reason. Take a $250,000 condominium that a Canadian purchases in Florida. If we agree that $150 is the average spent by a family or an individual across the border on any given shopping trip, this works out to about 1,700 such shopping trips until the amount spent in Buffalo equals the amount spent by the Canadian on his Florida condominium. With Robert Campeau spending $7 billion on Federated Department Stores a couple of years ago, this equals 46 million trips by Canadians.

Why the double standard? Why is it wrong for Canadians to shop in the United States, to engage in cross-border shopping to buy jeans, to buy a Walkman, to buy groceries to buy gasoline, yet it is right—and I am not saying that it is wrong—for business people to go and scour the country for bargains, for land deals and for things that really are not available to the ordinary Canadian?

A reason why a lot of Canadians are shopping in border communities is because they cannot believe the cost. They cannot believe that some goods that are made in Canada sell for less in the United States than they do here. We heard a couple of weeks ago, maybe it was last week, of some coffee filters that are made in Scarborough, Ontario, that sell for, I believe it was $1.29 or $1.59 here in Toronto and they were available for four for $1 in Buffalo. Unfortunately, I do not have the name, but I have been told that by many people, that they have bought these coffee filters.

Unfortunately, as I say, I do not have the name of the filters, but I do have one particular item. It is a hand lotion called Complex 15. A friend of mine picked this up at Freddie's Pharmacy in Buffalo. It retails there for $3.39. It is manufactured in Canada, and here in Toronto—I picked it up yesterday at two drugstores—it sells for $10.99. With this sort of incident, people begin to feel they are being ripped off in Canada, and it makes Canadians determined more and more to shop in the United States. This is an issue that has to be dealt with.

I mentioned before that taxes are another big reason why Canadians are shopping in the United States. They feel that their threshold has been breached. Canadians accept that they have to pay taxes, they know that government provides them with wonderful social services, but they can take advantage of, but they also know that when taxes influence a person's purchasing decisions the taxes have gone too far, they are too intrusive into the lives of individuals. They feel that the way to fight back is to avoid paying the taxes, and to do so they are shopping in places like Buffalo.

Canadians also find that they get better service in US stores. They find the service is friendlier, the staff are more knowledgeable. I am sure I am not the only one who, when he walks into a department store here in Canada, finds it very difficult to get some sales help. Whenever I am in a department store and I want to make a purchase, when I want to find a sales person I just look behind the largest merchandise stand and no doubt I would find them there. But in the US stores, when you walk in they make you feel like you are at home. They want to give you a kind of assistance they possibly can and they are knowledgeable about their products. A lot of stores here in Canada do not provide that service. We had one of the members mention a couple of weeks ago that when he worked in a supermarket there was a lack of training provided.

In US stores there is a sort of corporate culture created. Trained staff are told to be friendly, staff are made knowledgeable of the products that they are selling, and consumers appreciate this. All of this is part of a consumer-driven osophy that is really lacking in Canada but which we would work to develop here if we want to keep Canadian consumers shopping in our own country.

Another reason, I found, why Canadians are shopping: shopping has become a form of entertainment for a lot of people. They find that arts and sporting events have become much too expensive for them to enjoy at their leisure and so shopping has become an inexpensive substitute for these people. They find they can go out and spend the afternoon at the mall in what has become temporarily known as a period of bonding for the family. They can spend some time together. They do not have to purchase anything, but it is an opportunity to spend some time together. This is basically what the whole Sunday shopping issue is all about, but I do not want to get into that. It is a hole can of worms in itself.

Now, a figure that has been suggested as to sales lost to the Ontario economy is in the neighbourhood of $1 billion. That seems to be an accepted figure. However, the figures are a bit misleading. Let me point out why I think they are. They are misleading because of a basic economic principle, and I get into this in my brief, but basically what I am saying is, rather than a principle of diminishing marginal utility, which is offered by economics 1 courses, I refer to the "Wow, I can't believe it's so cheap" principle. Basically what is behind this is that Canadians who go there and want to spend their disposable income find that because goods are cheap, they are willing to buy more items than they would normally have bought, because the goods are more expensive in Canada.

So if somebody were to go there, for example, to buy aluminum foil—I do not know what the price is here in Canada, but I would say it sells for $1 a roll here and in Buffalo it sells for, let's say, 50 cents a roll. In Canada, when they go out and purchase it, the person who is in charge of purchasing this in the household would purchase perhaps two or three rolls, or as much as they need. When they go to Buffalo, however, because it is so inexpensive, they are willing to purchase more; so they have more utility, more use for goods, because they are less expensive than they find here. And because they will find more, the total basket value of their goods increases, and hence we get a larger number of total sales that are projected to be lost to the Ontario economy than really are.

Another reason why the $1-billion figure has been offered is that there is more variety in the United States. People are buying goods there that are not available here. To say that $1 billion is being spent in New York or in Michigan, in the Ontario border states—it is not necessarily true that the same $1 billion would have been spent here, though I am not arguing that none of it would have been. Of course, probably a majority of that figure would have been, but we would have found other uses for the remaining amount of money.

Now, we have heard about the decrease in retail sales tax revenues and gasoline tax revenues. If we look at the treasurer's third-quarter report, we find that they are down by almost $1 billion, but it does not show where exactly these revenues are down and in what communities they are down. Obviously people who live in Niagara Falls are more inclined to purchase their gasoline across the border than is somebody who lives in North Bay or the farthest points of northern Ontario, but we do not know exactly where the figures are down and where they may be up. So it is misleading to suggest that merely because sales tax revenues are down, and gasoline and retail sales, that indeed they are down because of cross-border shopping. There are so many other reasons why, including recessionary pressures, declining consumer confidence due to the Persian Gulf war, energy conservation and, of course, cross-border shopping, I am not denying it. All these translate into lost sales tax and gasoline tax revenues.

1030

It has also been argued that department store sales are down across Canada. This too has been attributed to cross-border shopping. But if we look at communities that are not affected by cross-border shopping—take the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, Alberta and Newfoundland, which is not affected by cross-border shopping one iota—we also find that retail sales are down. In fact, in some of these communities they are down more than they are in Ontario and British Columbia. By the same token, no one would suggest that because retail sales increased 1.5% from last month, there has been a decrease in cross-border shopping. So the argument works both ways.

Another figure that has been offered as to the popularity of cross-border shopping is the number of trips taken by Canadians, whether they be one day, two days, three days or whatever. These are raw figures and again they do not break down why these people are going across the border. They may be going across the border to visit Aunt Jean. They may be going across the border to go to school, to go to work. Not everyone is going across the border to shop. So to suggest that these people are merely shopping across the border, merely disposing of their hard-earned Canadian dollars in the United States, again is misleading.

Another suggestion as to how we can curb the phenomenon of cross-border shopping is to devalue the dollar. I do not want to get into this too much. For the sake of simplicity, I am just mentioning it. But I know that devaluation of the dollar involves very many repercussions. It may be advantageous to the business community if we had a lower dollar vis-à-vis the American, but again it certainly would not help those people who are least able to pay, because Canada, being a net importer of goods, would find itself in an inflationary spiral and the people who were least able to pay would be affected most by such an action.

We have a free trade agreement with the United States. We were told by our federal politicians and by advocates of free trade that we would enjoy lower prices. We were told to look beyond our national boundaries, to look beyond our local community, to reach out and go into the global marketplace. We should not be walking around with blinders on.

Ordinary Canadians have taken a lesson from the free trade agreement. Their minds were set for lower prices. We were promised lower prices. But lower prices were not forthcoming. So ordinary Canadians took a lesson from the advocates of free trade and they too are looking to the global market. It is merely a question of survival for these Canadians. They want to survive, they want to be competitive, just like business wants to.

These are people who are looking beyond their local communities to survive, to purchase milk at 69... a half gallon. The bigger threat to the Canadian economy is not so much the drain, the leakage from Canadian shoppers heading across the border to buy a pair of jeans or a bag of milk; it is more from the high tech drain and from the brain drain. It is from companies like Northern Telecom, which jumped across the border into the United States with moneys that it got from Bell Canada's monopoly to set up research and development facilities in the United States and not in Canada. That is the real problem. That is where the haemorrhage is occurring. It is not occurring because Canadians are shopping across the border to buy a pair of jeans. I am not saying that this is not a problem. It certainly is and it creates a leakage of valuable money that we could probably use here. But it is not the only problem and it is funny that cross-border shopping has brought to light, really, the competitive problem faced by Canadians in the world economy.

Also what is ironic is that a lot of groups that appeared before this very standing committee, although the faces have changed and the names are different, three short years ago many of the same groups argued in favour of the free trade agreement. They said we need free trade to become competitive, we need free trade to look to the global marketplace, to force Canada to be streamlined, to be competitive in the world marketplace. Now these same groups appear before you when free trade is working for the consumer and they find that that these Canadians should not be taking in free trade and somehow are wrong.

Let me conclude by saying that we have been told nationalism no longer has any place in the global marketplace. Appeals to nationalism will no longer keep Canadians shopping at home. We were told by our federal politicians, by the advocates of free trade, to expect lower prices, to expect Canada to become more competitive. That did not happen, so Canadians are merely using free trade, using the tools that were given to them by the people who worked for the implementation of the free trade agreement that we now have in this country. They are now taking advantage of it, and somehow they are wrong.

Members of the committee, it is really a travesty that ordinary Canadians, who merely want the same privileges as the business community, are denied them. They want value for their money. It is merely an issue of survival. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you. I have Mr Jamison, Mrs Sullivan, Mr Sutherland, Mr Hansen, Mr Ward, Mr Kwinter and Mr Phillips. If we could make these questions short and have one from each then perhaps we can get through the list a couple of times if we need to.

Mr Jamison: One question that I would like to ask at this point is, from your experience, what is the position of cross-border shopping in the United States retailers' minds? What is the US retailers' marketing strategy at this point? What are they doing in particular that is different or promoting in a greater sense the ongoing ability to attract the Canadian consumer? What exactly are they doing in your opinion?

Mr Adler: I have a great deal of contact with a many retail outlets, particularly in the western New area; owners of shopping malls and stores and that sort of thing. They are very aggressive retailers. They know opportunity when they see it. They can see the trends, are very astute business people. They see the number of Canadians flooding down through the borders, over bridges to the United States, and every retailer down there wants a piece of the action. They all want a piece of the Canadian consumer pie.

There are various vehicles they have taken. They have taken advertising on TV, they have taken advertising in newspapers. There are a lot of newspapers in the southern Ontario area which take flyers from United States retailers. A lot of supermarkets send, I believe it is, 60,000 flyers into southern Ontario every week. Buffalo Bargains, a concept that I came up with, has offered these US retail outlets a more inexpensive way of reaching Canadian consumers, a more direct, sort of hard-core market group, market segment that they could take advantage of.

But to answer your question, United States retailers recognize a trend and they recognize a flow of Canadian consumers coming in. They do not want to miss out. In the Burlington, Vermont, area, for example, staff are trained to learn French to accommodate the Montreal consumer. A lot of the items available in the Burlington, Vermont, stores are brought in from Europe or manufactured in a European style because they know that the people of Montreal and people in Quebec prefer a more European style, as opposed to what is available in other places in the United States for Canadians to purchase. So they are accommodating, they are reaching out, they are attempting to find out what the consumers want and they are making a concerted effort to do so. You really have to give them credit.

But I may add that it is not totally restricted to US retailers. There are some Canadian companies that are also doing the same thing and we have to be fair. You know, we cannot just say that US retailers know what they are doing and Canadian retailers do not. There is one Canadian retailer who was mentioned in the Buffalo News last year. It is a family-run fur business in Fort Erie. "Each of us is fitted with the equipment for survival," the owner says. "We provide excellent service, knowledgeable staff, friendly and courteous service at reasonable prices and he is very successful in the Fort Erie area." He is attracting Americans. He is attracting Canadians.

So it is having your finger on the pulse of consumers and exactly what they want, whether they be Canadian or American. There is no reason why Toronto retailers cannot attract Americans to come shop here. There is no reason why not. But the point is they should have their finger really on the pulse. Many retail analysts and marketing consultants are paid mega bucks to figure out how to do that. I am not in that business; I would, perhaps, have some solutions to the retailing situation here in Canada.

again, I am not in that business and I do not pretend to be an expert in the area.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Adler, I find your presentation interesting. I am particularly interested in the fact that you have couched your view relating to the publication of Buffalo Bargains in the context of social good when in fact what we are really looking at here is a young, bright entrepreneur who has taken some risks to put together a publication that sells advertising to American retailers to reach the Canadian market. Social good may or may not have anything to do with it. I suspect that it had nothing to do with your original thinking about going into this. Your thinking was entrepreneurial.

You have, in the course of your presentation, indicated many of the competitive factors which have been placed before us in previous hearings of the committee: price, quality, variety, product knowledge, selection, entertainment and the aggressive marketing that the US retailer puts forward. I am going to ask you two questions about your publications and I may have to leave before you are completed—but I will look at the record—because I have to go to the House.

First of all, do you include in your Buffalo or other American publications an indication that there are differences in the products which are purchased; whether, for example, in white goods, there are CSA standards or energy efficiency levels, or whether there is a difference in warranties and so on. Do you provide that kind of information?

Second, I note that your economic analysis of the effect of cross-border shopping describes only impact on retail sales; you have assumed that the $1-billion figure, which is accepted as the figure of the economic effect, is relating to retail sales. Indeed, that is not what that figure relates to. It relates to the entire economic effect of lost sales, closed stores, the manufacturing-distribution-marketing chain and its impact on revenues, not only gas tax, but on corporate and personal income tax, retail sales tax, and so on. So I agree with your argument about the impact on the economy.

The other thing that I was wondering was, in your shopping in Canada book, which I understand you also publish, do you take into account the competitive factors that you have named? Do you also sell ads to Canadian retailers through that publication, and where do you see the retailers who are included in the Shopping in Canada book in terms of their competitive situation with those who are included in your Buffalo book?

Mr Hansen: One question?

Mr B. Ward: A point of clarification, Mr Chairman: as that one question with three parts in it?

Mrs Sullivan: It was a well-rounded single question.

The Chair: If we all have questions like that, we will be here until 7 o'clock tonight.

Mrs Sullivan: Start with the last one first, maybe.

Mr Adler: Okay, that is what I was going to do. I was going to approach your one question from bottom to top. In terms of my Canadian publication, which is currently in the works, it has not been released yet, I have had a great deal of difficulty convincing Canadian retailers to come on board and to demonstrate to Canadians and to others that this would be a good vehicle for them to advertise and to reach out to potential consumers.

The sell is unquestionably a lot easier in Buffalo. I have no difficulty whatsoever walking into a store, showing a retailer what I have—because nine times out of 10 they have heard of it, they have read about it in the newspapers, they have seen it on TV—and they are willing to go, first time around, an unknown commodity, with a half-page ad.

With the Canadian retailer, however, I find I have a much more difficult sell and a lot more of a salesmanship job to do. When you ask me to comment on why I have a much more difficult sell here, there are reasons perhaps to do with the recession, their advertising budgets are down. But recession is not really isolated to this area of North America; there is recession in Buffalo too, but the fact is that they recognize an opportunity in Buffalo whereas here they are a bit sluggish and a bit slow to come on board and take advantage of an opportunity.

So in terms of the competitive structure vis-à-vis Canadian retailers and American retailers, it is comparing apples to oranges. Because I am a sort of international marketer, I am an international company, I look globally, and I do not want to exclude the Canadian retailer from participating in what has proven to be a successful vehicle for getting a point across to a potential consumer.

The second point that Mrs Sullivan made was regarding warranties and CSA standards and the like. The fact is that a lot of items have international warranties. A lot do not; a lot cannot be serviced in Canada, and that is a problem. But again, when you buy a TV or a VCR across the border, how many of us really have real problems with a VCR that we purchase? It lasts four or five years and then we dispense with it and buy a new one, those of us who can.

That does not seem to be a concern for the Canadian consumer who shops in the United States. They are not questioning whether or not the goods are going to be covered by warranty or guarantee here in Canada when they bring it back and something goes wrong with it. In fact, a lot of retailers here, even though they should not be fixing it because of CSA standards, they are—and repair people have told me this—repairing goods that are made in the United States, and I know they should not be doing that and the like, but they are in fact doing it.

As for couching my presentation in social good, I do not have any less or more of a social conscience than any businessman perhaps. I am here providing a service for Canadians, and I am flattered that Mrs Sullivan thinks my book has created this massive groundswell of Canadians wanting to shop in the United States. I am flattered that she would say that, but I really cannot take all the credit for it. After all, it was our federal government that gave us free trade, that told us to look globally, told us to look beyond the local economic community, and that is essentially what I have done.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, I want to say it is a sad commentary on our society if shopping is a great family activity in this day and age. I have problems with the premises you are using to justify your argument. You have commented that it is cheap entertainment and that these people cannot afford the other types of entertainment, whether it is sports, theatre, whatever. You have also said it is survival.

Granted, for those people who are going across the border and shopping for basic food items like milk and eggs and cheese, I can understand that. But if it is really survival, Mr Adler, how do you explain the fact that people are going over and buying VCRs and stereo systems? Surely those things are not for people concerned with survival, and we have already had evidence before this committee which indicates the higher your income, the more likely you are to do cross-border shopping. So I have problems with that.

You also mention that this is all consumer-driven. But are not these consumers who are going across the border also consumers of the health care system, community services, consumers of our better environmental standards, our better occupational health and safety standards? I guess what I am saying is, they are being selective about what they think they are being consumers about.

Mr Adler: Absolutely. Thank you for that question. To deal with the first one, about the form of entertainment, why should it be a sad commentary on our society when people want to spend their leisure time shopping or window shopping? People have told me that they feel the government has become too intrusive into their lives and they should not be told whether or not they should be allowed to shop on Sunday. But again, it is not an issue I want to get into, it is an issue that should be dealt with perhaps by this committee at some other point, but I am not here to talk about Sunday shopping. It provides an inexpensive alternative for ordinary people to do something with an afternoon.

Mr Sutherland: But, if I may, you said, "And they may not buy anything." But all the stats prove that they are not just window shopping. There are actually people buying, and buying big-ticket items.

Mr Adler: Not everybody is buying big-ticket items. The only study that provides data that suggest that higher-income people are shopping in Buffalo is a study that was done for the Toronto area alone, not a study that was done for Niagara Falls. This study did not encompass Niagara Falls, did not encompass St Catharines or Welland or that area on the Niagara Peninsula. The study that you are referring to was a study done for the Toronto area alone.

I would agree with you that the people from Toronto who tend to go to Niagara Falls, because they are in that sort of echelon, that geographic area that was given to this committee before, sort of in the VCR-TV area where they would purchase items, perhaps they would go there to buy VCRs and higher-ticket items. But the people whom I have met, the people whom I have dealt with, the calls I get from people—I have not had any calls from people who are telling me that they are going down to buy fax machines, that they are going down to buy 40-inch colour television sets. People are telling me that they are buying milk, that they are buying cheese, that they are buying bread for four for a dollar. This is what people are buying.

Not everybody is going down to buy VCRs and television sets, contrary to your suggestion.

To deal with social services, yes, they do take advantage of social services, and they pay for their social services. These social services are not provided by the government free of charge. The money comes from the taxpayers. These people are paying for their social services.

Again, it is a double standard. Let's be fair to everybody. The Canadian businessman who sends his manufacturing operations overseas, that is also a loss of production capital that could be applied here in Canada, and as a Democrat you should be aware of that and you should know that and you should agree with that, as I see you

Mr Sutherland: I am.

Mr Adler: But let's be fair. You are all politicians, you are all supposed to take into account the consideration of all the people you serve, so let's be fair and let's put blame where blame is due, and not blame, like I say, the single mother of two who may want to go down to buy milk and vegetable soup to give to her children. Let's just be fair about the whole issue and not just take isolated cases. If you say that they are going down for VCRs, they are going down for luxury items, because of conspicuous consumption, in some cases they are, but in many cases they are not. I just be fair about it.

Mr Hansen: The single mother, I do not know whether she is on mother's allowance or not, but at least one thing we have here in Ontario, we do not hand out food stamps, we do not make people wait for handouts. It is quite a different living style here in Ontario. The provincial governments in the past and present are looking for a different standard of living there.

You talk about gas prices. There is no comparison between Ontario and, let's say, New York state where there are toll roads. A few years ago the last toll came out of Burlington, so when you drive from Toronto all the way down to the border there are no toll roads. I do not know if there is any toll road in Ontario. If we are talking gasoline prices, there is a difference in gasoline prices in those areas also.

I know you were talking about basic groceries, but I heard at the very beginning that they were all items that had sin taxes on them, that these products were not essential products; people were buying cigarettes and liquor and that.

Mr Kwinter: They are essential to a smoker.

Mr Hansen: Yes, that is correct. The other thing I heard had one person call me—and I live in the Niagara Peninsula also—who wanted to buy a gas stove. She checked with Consumers Gas, and they said, "Well, if you put this, this and this on, we'll hook it up, but if it doesn't have these safeguards, we're not hooking it up." By the time it was checked into safeguards, it was going to double the price of the gas stove. So what we are doing with our regulations is looking after her.

I do not know where you go to see your doctor, Buffalo or in Toronto. You say you are a Canadian, but I do not know where you are shopping on that. But the question is, you have no indication why there is a difference in the price of that, what was it, hand lotion, that you bought for $3.35, which costs $10 here? I think if you to go back to the source of that other question, the ers that were made in Monte's riding—was it your ng?—you brought that up a while ago. Can you give any indication why there is a difference and where uld you rather live?

Mr Adler: I will deal with the last part first. Where uld I rather live? I have sat in on many of the hearings read all the transcripts of all the witnesses and what y have had to say, and what all the members have had ay, and I do not know of any witness so far who has n sort of personally attacked in such a way.

I am a Canadian. I choose to live in Canada. I am a businessman who is taking advantage of a free trade agree-ent that was implemented by our elected officials. I have en the advice of those people who have told me to look bally, I started an international company. I live here, I y taxes here, I pay income tax, I pay corporate tax. I pay the services that I reap. I see my doctor here in Canada.
e I said, I pay my taxes like other Canadians who ose to live in Canada, they too pay their taxes and it is ong to call them unpatriotic merely because they are ng across the border to buy a pair of jeans or to buy a ve or whatever. It is wrong to call it unpatriotic.

Again, let's not have this double standard. Let's call it at it is. These Canadians are going across the border for vival. They are going across because our federal govern-nt gave us a free trade agreement. It told us to expect ver prices and yet these lower prices did not come. Peowant value for their dollar. They want to stretch their ar as far as they can get it today. Why is that wrong for nadians to do that? You applaud a businessman for ing it. He is called shrewd, he is called a good business-n, yet when an ordinary Canadian consumer tries to do he is labelled unpatriotic and an accusatory finger is inted at him to say, "Who do you think pays for your cial services?" Canadians pay taxes and they accept the ct that they have to pay taxes, but what they are telling e is that their taxes are too high, they just cannot with-nd the tax burden they are under and that is why they e just seeking tax avoidance activities, which in this case ppens to be shopping in Buffalo, and there are other ays of doing it.

It was your party a few years ago which referred to orporate welfare bums and these corporations do not pay xes. Let's deal with what is fair and let's not point an cusatory finger at the ordinary Canadian for doing what he s to do or she has to do to survive. Let's just be fair again.

Mr B. Ward: I hope you do not interpret these quesons as personal attacks, Mr Adler. It is just trying to get idea of how you are thinking. The tone of your brief to e was that you more or less feel cross-border shopping is urt of the free enterprise system where freedom of choice ould be allowed, and I think you are the first one who as more or less taken that tone. Every other group has ggested we should be doing something as a government prevent cross-border shopping.

First of all, I appreciate you taking the time to present our brief. I think you are a smart individual. You recog-ized a business opportunity and took advantage of it and we should encourage that. I am assuming that when your first book came out there was a lot of legwork on your part to get the advertisement dollars to pay for the book, to make it profitable. You probably wore out more than one pair of shoes in the process. That is something we should be encouraging, for young business people to take a risk in this province in an effort to turn a profit, because that is how you create wealth. So I have no problem with what you are doing from a business perspective.

There is no denying that cross-border shopping is having a devastating economic impact on the retail sectors of our border towns, Windsor, Sault Ste Marie, Niagara Falls, Fort Erie, Cornwall, and other small towns in between.
When you drive through those areas—and I am not saying you travel throughout Ontario; probably your main focus would be Niagara Falls, possibly Fort Erie—and you see the impact that it is having on those particular retail sectors and the stores that are being forced to close—some are very long-term, family-operated retail stores forced to close because of the lack of consumer traffic and consumer spending in Ontario—are you suggesting that is just part of the free-enterprise system and government should not be attempting to implement policies to prevent it or intrude in that free-enterprise aspect of consumer choice, and that we should be writing off the retail sectors of the border towns?
Or do you think that perhaps we should be doing something in a policy sense so that some of that consumer dollar stays in Ontario? Perhaps in the future you would be developing a book on Canadian bargains and selling it in America. I just want your feelings, your points of view on that.

1100

Mr Adler: I thank you very much for those comments and for applauding me for recognizing opportunity in the marketplace and taking advantage of it.

The fact that retailers and a lot of business establishments that have been in operation for many many years, particularly in the Niagara frontier, which is the area of the province I am most familiar with, have to close their doors because they cannot compete with the American retailer is a horrible thing. I hope I did not come across as a sort of proponent of Thatcherism, that we just leave everything open to the free market and free enterprise, total laissez-faire.

I do believe that rather than taking the suggestions of a lot of the groups who have appeared before this committee and others who have been involved in the issue—they all propose Band-Aid treatments. They have suggested imposing a fee on Canadians heading across the border. They have suggested devaluing the dollar. There has been a plethora of what they call solutions to the problem, but those are not really solutions. They are not going to solve the problem of high prices, rising prices and high taxes in Canada. It is more, really. Canadians are avoiding high prices, but they are protesting at the same time. Canadians do not go into Toronto harbour and hop on a ship and throw tea overboard. We are not like that. We protest in silent ways, in other ways.

Yes, the problem with our retailing sector, the problem that we see with shopkeepers closing—when I drive to Buffalo, I do not just get on the Queen Elizabeth Way and drive straight to Buffalo. I stop off in the Canadian communities, in the border cities on the Canadian side. I look around and I see the devastation and what is happening to a lot of these Canadian centres. It is a horrible thing. People who have been employed, people who have had businesses for years, find themselves out of work, and no future. These same retailers have called me. They do not blame me for what I have done by any means. They do not suggest what I have done is un-Canadian or wrong. Like you, they applaud me for my initiative. But they also tell me that they find they have no future in Canada because of government policy and the tax burden, the business environment they find themselves having to work in. They just cannot compete with American retailers on the other side.

I suggest to you, when you draw your conclusions and make recommendations to the Legislature from this committee on the issue of cross-border shopping, that suggestions are made that we do not apply Band-Aid treatments to this, because Canada is really in need of radical surgery. It does not need a tourniquet. There is a haemorrhage. I agree there is a haemorrhage occurring, but you cannot apply a Band-Aid to it. Canada needs radical surgery. You politicians, members of the committee, members of the Legislature, are all physicians. You are chosen by the people, you have asked for a mandate from the people, you have been given this mandate to perform radical surgery on Canada to make us more competitive, to solve the problem of cross-border shopping, to stop the outflow of massive amounts of Canadian dollars to US retailing outlets. Let's perform this surgery. Canada is the patient, you people are the physicians. Perform the surgery, make Canada competitive because, as I say, I am an international businessman, I own an international company. I am just as happy to write a book about getting bargains in Canada. My only problem with that is I wish it would be easier for me to attract Canadian retailers to advertise in my directory. As I said, I find it easy for US retailers to do so, but I would love to see Americans come up to Canada. I love to see Canadians go down to the US. It works both ways.

People have always travelled around the world and brought back goods, and Canadians have gone to other parts of the world. We want to attract people from other countries, it is a good thing. We learn from other cultures, we learn from other societies. Let us, as I say just perform that surgery and make Canada competitive and relieve us from that oppressive tax burden. Let the Canadian retailer compete on a level playing field, which was promised to us with the free trade agreement and by the advocates of free trade.

The Chair: I have three left: Mr Kwinter, Mr Phillips and Mr Sterling. In fairness to the next deputation, we should try and wrap this up within the next five minutes or so.

Mr Kwinter: Maybe we can get some information that might be useful to us on the distribution of your publication. One of the first things I would like to know is what does it mean by saying, "This is the official shopping and entertainment directory for western New York." Official, like sanctioned by whom?

Mr Adler: Sanctioned by all those Canadians went out and made it a Canadian best seller. This is the comprehensive shopping directory for—

Mr Kwinter: It is not official. I am not trying facetious, I just thought that maybe western New York said, "We are going to give you the authority to put this thing out," and this is the official shopping guide of western New York.

Mr Adler: No, that is not the case.

Mr Kwinter: This is your official buying guide?

Mr Adler: This is official, as deemed by the town of Niagara gave to it, and that has been sanctioned by the many Canadians who have made it a Canadian best seller. Just going back to the point, I did not seek the support of any chambers of commerce down there. I notified them of what I was doing, but I did not ask for any money from them or anything of that sort.

Mr Kwinter: No. As I say, I am not trying to be facetious, I just want to find out if this is being sanctioned by somebody.

Mr Adler: No.

Mr Kwinter: This is not something where organizations have said, "We want you to do this for us and we will consider this our official directory."

Mr Adler: No.

Mr Kwinter: Okay. The other thing I would like to know, the main part of the question, is do you have any idea, statistically, of the distribution of the people, thousands, or numbers, who are buying this book, where are they located?

Mr Adler: I receive the statements from the various booksellers and distributors, just to see, for my own interest, where the books are selling best. It varies. There are pockets. The sales are less in the Niagara Peninsula than they are in the Niagara Falls area, for example, or in the Stoney Creek area, say, from Stoney Creek east.

There is a very simple reason for that. The people who live in Niagara Falls and in Welland-St Catharines have been shopping for many, many years in the western New York area and they know, really, where to shop. They do not need to be told where to get a coat for half price, or whatever. They know where to go; they know where to buy their groceries. But because of the spread of cross-border shopping and the trend that I recognized because it was moving around the horseshoe—and this is borne out by the sales of the book—the book is selling much better in the northern half of Lake Ontario and the greater Toronto area and in the Hamilton and Burlington area than it is, really, in the area of the Niagara Peninsula. The hottest sales are coming from the greater Toronto area, in answer to your question, essentially.

Mr Phillips: I am trying to salvage some useful time out of this hour we have spent. I guess, first, the committee would reject one of your arguments, which is that this is not as big a problem as some people think. We think it is a big problem, and we are going to deal with it on that basis. Second, we all know that we have a competitive problem, so we appreciate the advice. I guess my own last observation on the question is that it is difficult, as you might appreciate us to accept the objectivity of your advice because you have a major vested interest in the book.

Mr Sterling: My question is this: Assuming for a moment, if you would, that it is a big problem—an assumption which you do not accept, but which we believe—can you give us one suggestion on what we can be doing to help our Canadian retailers minimize the impact of cross-border shopping over the next two or three years, beyond improving service?

Mr Adler: First of all, Mr Phillips, I think it is unfortunate that you do not think the views of average and ordinary Canadians are useful to this committee. I really find that unfortunate. The fact that I do not have an objective viewpoint—I made it clear earlier that I am an international businessman whose international company provides shopping guides for Canadians to shop in the US, and am in the process of preparing a shopping guide for Americans to come shop here in Canada. Why should my objectivity be questioned, and that of other various interest groups that have appeared before this committee not be questioned? Again, it is very unfortunate that you attribute those motives to me.

To deal with your query on what I think Canadian retailers should be doing: As I said earlier, there are a lot of marketing analysts out there. You had one before you a short while back, I believe, who suggested what Canadian retailers could do to become more competitive. I know this committee thinks it is a serious problem, a serious issue to be dealt with. I think it is a serious issue to be dealt with; do many other Canadians out there. It is not fair to aim, with an elitist sort of attitude, that ordinary Canadians do not appreciate the fact that they have to haul down to Buffalo to buy their tomato soup or their loaves of bread or whatever.

But to suggest a possible solution to this problem which you perceive to be a problem for Canadian business, and I do agree it is a problem for them: Again, I am not a retail expert in the area. I do not want to suggest any possible solutions for the Canadian retailer. There are experts out there. You have had them before this committee. You have asked them these questions and they have made suggestions to you.

I am not here to present solutions to the Canadian retailer. It is not my area of expertise. My forte is what I have provided for you today, the information I have put before you. I suggest if you want possible solutions, that as a committee—I gather that at the end of this you will discuss and come up with certain recommendations which you will take to the Legislature and which will prove useful to the Canadian retailer. I have complete confidence in our abilities as elected officials, and in your taking into account all the recommendations and submissions that have been presented before this committee.

Mr Sterling: Is your publication weekly or bimonthly or monthly or—

Mr Adler: The title would suggest that it is annual, but the major revision is done yearly, and it is updated every few months as I accumulate more coupons and advertising to offer to Canadians.

Mr Sterling: So you offer advertising, etc, and that is one of the major sources of revenue for you?

Mr Adler: Right.

Mr Sterling: I understand that if I wanted to start Toronto Bargains as an opposing magazine, if I wanted to promote Toronto stores, there would be a major difference in what the retailers would have to pay for their advertising. Is it correct that if an American store, for instance, advertises in your paper and they pay $100 for an ad, they do not have to pay GST?

Mr Adler: That is correct.

Mr Sterling: But if I put out Toronto Bargains Directory and the retailer took out an ad for $100, he would have to pay $107, is that correct?

Mr Adler: That is correct.

Mr Sterling: Do you think that is fair?

Mr Adler: No, I do not.

Mr Sterling: So therefore you would suggest that this committee, assuming we are going to maintain the GST, recommend in our report that we tax American advertising where the major distribution is here in Canada?

Mr Adler: For American retailers to take out an ad in a book such as mine?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Mr Adler: The suggestions that your committee makes are entirely up to you; I do not offer any possible suggestions that you can make to the Legislature. But as elected politicians, you have a responsibility to your electorate and to the people who have sent you here. How you set up the tax structure and payment and that sort of fee structure is entirely up to you.

Mr Sterling: But you would not consider it unfair if we taxed your publication 7% of the advertising revenue that you got from American sources?

Mr Adler: I work within the rules of the game, and if you people establish a rule that I have to remit taxes—

Mr Sterling: Okay. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Adler, for coming to the committee today.

CANADIAN SHOE RETAILERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is by the Canadian Shoe Retailers' Association, Sharon Maloney, president.

Ms Maloney: Good morning, Mr Chairman and members of this committee. My name is Sharon Maloney. I am the president of the Canadian Shoe Retailers' Association. In that capacity, I am responsible for the overall operations of the association, including liaising with members of the footwear retail industry and representatives of all other sectors of the industry.

A significant portion of my responsibilities includes tracking general retail trends, speaking with members of the public about issues of concern to the industry, and dialoguing with footwear retailers on a variety of subjects which impact their businesses.

The Canadian Shoe Retailers' Association is a national trade association of the footwear retail industry. Our membership represents a national retail sales volume of $183 million. Members are predominantly footwear-specific, and include family shoe chains, specialty chains, and owner-operated independent businesses. The majority of our membership trades in the women's footwear segment, which includes dress, casual, comfort, athletic and fashion. The Canadian Shoe Retailers' Association does not represent discounters, large department stores or athletic shoe stores. The largest portion of our members is located in Ontario, followed by western Canada and the Atlantic provinces.

The goal of the Canadian Shoe Retailers' Association is to promote the interests of the footwear industry and the Canadian consumer. Footwear in Canada has been subject to quota and anti-dumping duties for over 20 years. Footwear retailers have operated for less than two years in an environment where supply of product was not artificially controlled. The effect of quota on the retail trade has been dramatic. Those retailers who had quota were restricted in the amount of imported product they could provide for their customers. Those retailers who did not have quota, most often independents, were generally unable to obtain any, and were thereby severely disadvantaged in providing the type and range of footwear which their customers demanded. Moreover, the independent retailer was forced to compete against large chains and department stores for supply of domestic product. The regime thereby lessened competition for those participants already in the trade and effectively barred new entrants who could see no future if they were not able to obtain quota.

Market share by independent retailers consistently dropped from the initiation of the quota regime in 1978 to its removal in 1988. The quota regime also hurt retail trade in that Canadian consumers were forced to pay more for less choice and variety. As pointed out in the submission of the director of investigation and research under the then Combines Investigation Act, holders of quota were reluctant to use it to acquire cheaper types of footwear. This resulted in more expensive types of footwear being imported so as to properly utilize quota allocation. Scarcity of imported product also inflated the prices of footwear.

The quota regime was dismantled in 1988, and by 1989, a dumping complaint was filed before the Canadian International Trade Tribunal against Brazil, China, Yugoslavia, Poland, Taiwan and Romania. Despite submissions from the retail community that the imposition of dumping duties would hurt consumers and therefore retailers and would force consumers to look elsewhere for their footwear, the CITT found in favour of the complainant. The result was the imposition of dumping duties ranging from 25% to 90%, depending on the subject country and product.

The advent of this finding posed immediate and dramatic problems for the footwear retail community and did little to sustain the existence of domestic suppliers other than to increase prices. Footwear retailers who had had a quota regime for over 20 years and who were just beginning to emerge into a more competitive environment were immediately stymied by this decision. They were presented with four immediate problems: (1) increases in foot prices from sources upon which they relied; (2) additional administrative costs in locating new sources, both with and without the countries faced with dump charges; (3) unwillingness of traditional sources to deal with the headaches and costs created by the new regime; and (4) immediate differentials in price and product selection vis-à-vis their American counterparts.

All sectors of the industry were impacted by this. At least able to respond and the most vulnerable were independent retailers who did not have the buying clout to directly or get the attention of major Canadian importers.

For over 25 years, footwear retailers have not had the ability to compete because of market intervention based on the rationale that it will protect Canadian suppliers. In the meantime, Canadian suppliers, especially in women's casual footwear, are virtually non-existent and consumers are voicing their feet and shopping in the USA.

CSRA does not know how frequently footwear is brought across the border. Footwear is a commodity which is easily—and, we believe, frequently—transported. CSRA does not know:

1. Canadian footwear has a tariff of 22%; American footwear has a tariff of 10%.

2. Dumping duties are not enforced at the border and it is virtually impossible to identify where the footwear is made, what factory it is from, and therefore what duty it is subject to.

3. The free trade agreement is not a significant factor in that only 80% of the American footwear market is dominated by domestic product. That being said, there are so many American high-end producers in men's and ladies' footwear that have made significant inroads in the Canadian marketplace.

4. There are few, if any, low-end producers of Canadian casual footwear that can distinguish themselves vis-à-vis American products, be they imported or otherwise.

5. There are Canadian domestic producers of high-end and mid-priced ladies' shoes and boots that have brand recognition and can distinguish themselves in both the Canadian and American marketplaces. This, though, is a narrow field which may be further diminished because of high operating costs in Canada and lack of operational and consumer trend information for Canadian independent footwear retailers.

The following is a list of suggested actions:

1. The elimination of tariffs protecting those commodities in the footwear sector where there is nominal, if any, competition with Canadian producers—for example, athletic footwear.

2. The reduction to comparable American levels of tariffs in all other footwear sectors.

3. The review of the CITT decision as it relates to the impact on domestic suppliers, retailers and, more importantly, consumers.

4. Immediate implementation of collection of provincial sales tax at the border. Our communities can no longer afford to be caught in a battle of wills between the provincial and federal governments. We need action and we need it now.

6. The utilization of the existing requirement of an economic impact study in the province of Ontario upon the implementation of any provincial program which increases the regulatory burden on small businesses or consumers.

7. The finalization of any agreements between the United States, the federal and provincial governments prior to the implementation of border projects such as the Space Arch Customs Entry program. We understand that the PACE program was introduced prior to the sister program in the United States being implemented. Likewise, the PACE program was introduced prior to agreements being reached with the border states for collection of provincial sales tax in those jurisdictions.

8. The creation and implementation of a Shop Ontario/Shop Canada program which addresses our pluses rather than our minuses. Competition does not mean that we have to be the same. It does mean that we have to offer the Canadian customers perceived value for their hard-earned and diminishing dollars.

We must emphasize and deliver good service, good return policies, personalized service and better guarantees. This program must also emphasize that we are price-competitive when these items are brought into the equation, and also on a straight exchange basis, on a variety of commodities.

9. The recognition of every Canadian, including politicians, bureaucrats, retailers, consumers and workers, that we are all part of this problem. The issues we are facing go to the very heart of how this country has operated for over 100 years. We cannot hope to sustain the standard of living we have enjoyed, let alone the political will to act as a nation, if we continue to erode the tax base, increase the burden on those already paying and operate as if our individual decisions do not have an effect on the overall ability of our community to be competitive.

10. The Premier's Council for economic renewal should be seized with the responsibility of addressing the competitiveness of the province, with specific attention being paid to the issue of cross-border shopping.

11. The creation of a committee of provincial and federal ministries which are responsible for the issues impacting on cross-border shopping, including Revenue, Finance, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, and Industry, Science and Technology Canada. We cannot afford reactive measures such as the PACE program. What is required is proper strategic planning and co-ordination coming from the highest levels of our bureaucracies. To complement this initiative and/or form part of it, a similar committee should be composed, consisting of all three levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—big business, labour and small business.

12. The provincial government should participate in the proposed expansion of the study, commissioned by STC and conducted by Ernst and Young, on the competitiveness of the retail sector. The first study is limited in nature, comparing a small number of commodities and not addressing issues such as taxation and regulatory burdens.

The current situation, especially for border communities, needs immediate action. Concrete steps must be taken to stem the tide of cross-border shopping. That being said, there are deep and substantive problems in our current economic structure and process which must be addressed. In our view, the phenomenon of cross-border shopping is a reflection of a deeper malaise existing in the Canadian economy, that being a lack of competitiveness.

Canadian taxpayers/consumers are rightfully in the driver's seat on this issue. This trend can only be reversed by offering good value for money received. This equation must be operative, not just for the retail sector but for government as well. We urge you to recognize and accept the primacy of this statement and to act accordingly.

Mr Sterling: I would like to thank you, Ms Maloney. I think that is one of the most impressive briefs we have had presented to this committee, in terms of representing an interest, but also, in my view, in terms of looking at it in a realistic manner and presenting arguments which cover not only your sector but also many sectors.

Ms Maloney: Thank you.

Mr Sterling: I have a couple of brief questions. One is, I do not know what PACE is. What is it?

Ms Maloney: PACE is a program that the federal government introduced in Vancouver, the fast-paced program for crossing at the border in Vancouver.

Mr Sterling: Oh, I see.

Mr Kwinter: The express line.

Ms Maloney: The express line. That is right.

Mr Sterling: Okay. I just did not know what PACE meant.

The Chair: What acronym they were using.

Mr Sterling: Yes.

One of the suggestions that has been made by other groups deals with the collection of provincial sales tax and the ease with which that sales tax is collected. One of the suggestions, or one of the attractive options, is to harmonize the PST and the GST. Some of the footwear now is exempt from PST in Ontario. If there were a harmonization and that tax were put on—I am not even sure which shoes are exempt.

Ms Maloney: It is very small. It is only $30 in Ontario.

Mr Sterling: Under $30.

Ms Maloney: Yes.

Mr Sterling: It is not the first $30, but it is under $30?

Ms Maloney: Under $30 it is tax-exempt, and thereafter it is subject to tax.

Mr Sterling: Would that have a significant effect on sales if there were harmonization?

1130

Ms Maloney: In my view, it would not. However, I recognize the problem in terms of the collection of taxes without harmonization. I think if harmonization were to be introduced, it would be introduced with the recognition that there should be an overall decrease in the combined tax, rather than combining the taxes and getting rid of all of the exemptions. I think it would be far more palatable, certainly, to our membership as well as to consumers, if it were addressed that way.

Mr Sterling: I do not know what the figures are on it, but I would expect that if harmonization took place and they added—I think there are two or three or four exemptions that were raised by the Minister of Revenue when she was here—you would not even really make up a point, though. I do not know if that is possible or not.

Mr Kwinter: I want to congratulate you on your presentation.

I think it is the first presentation we have had that really crystallizes the problem we are dealing with. It is quite interesting. We have an association arguing that Canadian manufacturers should not be protected as well as they are and that we should be allowing more imported goods to come into the country so we can compete. This, as I say, is a rather strange kind of presentation when we are looking at how we can protect our Canadian jobs and Canadian manufacturers. That is the problem. It is a realization that China, Yugoslavia, Brazil, Poland, Taiwan and Romania at least are producing shoes much more cheaply than we possibly can. Why are we denying our consumers the opportunity of buying these at the best prices for the sheer sake of protecting our Canadian manufacturers?

Ms Maloney: In a nutshell, yes.

Mr Kwinter: That, in a nutshell, is what it is. Here we are trying to do just the reverse. We are saying we cannot have these imported goods coming in. They are not being imported, but they are being carried by Canadian consumers walking across the border and importing them individually and we are saying this is not a good thing.

Ms Maloney: I think part of the difficulty has been, and it is not just in our sector, if you look at the sectors including footwear and apparel, which are more fashion-driven sectors, we have always worked on the assumption that we should be protecting our domestic suppliers. In our view, it is not that we do not want a domestic base here; we very much do want a domestic base and in fact I think it is one of the ways of addressing this problem. It is how you arrive at affording that protection. In our view, what steps have been taken are negative and really have not enhanced the opportunity and the ability to compete.

But I think it has been crystallized very clearly right now because Canadian consumers, and particularly women consumers, have been paying for this for 20 years and they have paid for it because they did not have any alternative. It is very clear to them now that they do have alternatives and they are operating on that assumption and exercising their right to find that alternative.

I do not believe we can stem that tide by making it more difficult for them to do that or by trying to protect a sector of the industry which, for whatever reasons, has not been able to address those marketing needs. That is not the way to find a solution to the problem.

Mr Kwinter: If I can just carry on for one more minute, what we have is a situation where in virtually every one of these cases we have low-wage countries turning out shoes in what is really a handicraft operation.

Ms Maloney: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: We are saying we should take advantage of that opportunity and forget about our industry because we have labourers who demand too much money for those kinds of jobs where they can be done a lot cheaper somewhere else.

Ms Maloney: It depends on the sector you are dealing with, too, in terms of the domestic suppliers. Where the greatest gap has been created, really, is in women's casual shoes. We do have a healthy industry as far as boots are concerned and a very competitive industry, a tremendous competitive industry—well made, well designed. They have tremendous standards in terms of the product they produce and it is a more labour-intensive type of product as well, whereas ladies' footwear is not. I really do believe, in the nature of the economy and the standard of living we have in this country, that we are ever going to be able to produce a shoe as cheaply and as well as, say, Brazilians, the Chinese or the Taiwanese produce a shoe.

Again, it depends on the type of footwear you are talking about and that is another part of the problem. A lot of legislation, especially the dumping legislation and quota legislation, may be sufficient when you are dealing with ball bearings, but it is not sufficient when you are dealing with commodities as subject to subjective assessment as footwear is and clothing is. You cannot parcel out those countries and their ability to compete and their ability to be fashion-driven from the Canadian marketplace. Canadian consumers can see just by turning on their television what is available to them all over the world. If they cannot find it in their stores here, they will find it somewhere else. They are not going to buy it here just because they have it. They are going to wait and find it somewhere else.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just ask one question for clarification. I have not been familiar with your organization. You say that members are predominantly family shoe chain speciality chains, owner-operated. Are we talking about names like Naturalizer, Julia, Agnew, those types of stores?

Ms Maloney: That is right; all of those. The only people we do not include in our membership are department stores and very large discounters.

Mr Sutherland: Right. And there would be good odds that the owner of the shoe store in my small town is likely a member too?

Ms Maloney: That is right. Yes. In fact, our core membership for what I would call the true independent which is a single store, is located outside Toronto or outside the main centres and generally located in many of the communities we are talking about, smaller communities closer to the border where there has been a tradition of people supporting their local businesses.

Mr Sutherland: In the action plan, you talked about number 8 about what competition means and that we do not have to be the same. But you go on to say, "It does mean that we have to offer the Canadian customers perceived value for their hard-earned and diminishing dollars." I find it interesting that you used the word "perceived" because of the past presentation and some of the issues in terms of perception of what is real value across the border and what is not, whether it is the examples that Mr Hansen used about gas stoves or even shoe wear. I was wondering, do you feel that there is some problem with perception of re, that people do not feel that Canadian shoes are of good value or that they are getting good value here, or are they just perceived to be of better value in the US?

Ms Maloney: Yes, I do. I think there are problems. I think that as an industry, especially in this type of commodity and in the apparel industry—and you are talking about the largest segment, which again is the ladies' sector—whatever reasons, I do not believe we have enhanced our image as well as we could as retailers. There are a lot of reasons for that. I think within the local communities, certainly with a large portion of our membership, they are being impacted to the same extent in some communities as in others because they have been able to maintain that relationship.

When you get into the larger communities and especially when you get into the border communities, it becomes more difficult, especially when you look at the fact that if you are a Canadian independent and you are buying brand name footwear and you have been using that to enhance your image with your customers, and they look across the border and see a $60 difference, you run into a real problem there because you are not distinguishing yourself any more from your American counterpart, especially if what you are basing your distinguishing factors on was a particular product which is much cheaper there.

It is a combination of having a diversity of product that is somewhat different from what is being offered south of the border as well as having people perceive that when they pay X dollars, the product they get is going to give them some longevity, that there are guarantees in place and that they are going to be treated properly when they go back into the store and so on and so forth.

Mr B. Ward: I will be brief. I appreciate your taking the time to give us this presentation. I think this picture could be taken two ways. The federal government probably, through the briefs from the organizations of shoe manufacturers, could have said that there would not have been an employee in the shoe manufacturing industry without the dumping duties. That could have been their argument. I am not here to debate that.

Ms Maloney: There are always two sides to every issue. I might say, though, that there are only about 6,000—

Mr B. Ward: Without a job, they could not afford to purchase a pair of shoes.

Ms Maloney: I agree with you, but I must say there are only 6,000 people in the supply side of the footwear industry.

Mr B. Ward: That was not my question, Mr Chairman. That was a comment. I am not saying what the federal government did was right or wrong. I would like to focus on the suggestion that the PST be collected at the border.

It is my understanding that your organization has no problem with the PST being expanded to all shoes. I thought I heard you say there are currently some exemptions and you felt it would not add that much to the cost if the PST were expanded into the areas that are currently being exempted.

Ms Maloney: With a very important caveat, which was that there be an overall reduction in the combined retail sales tax and GST.

Mr B. Ward: Yes. Is your focus—because I would not want to suggest that the PST be expanded into areas of exemption if the GST is a temporary tax and will be modified in the future, depending on the will of the Canadian electorate—that this committee should be making recommendations to the government to explore all avenues of how the PST can be collected at the border, of which harmonization of tax would be just one?

Ms Maloney: Certainly.

Mr B. Ward: Because we would not want to enter into areas of exemption of the PST—I do not think that is what you are saying—unless the harmonization aspect is one. But you would not necessarily agree that the PST should be extended to the exemption areas; the prime focus is that the PST should be collected at the border and all avenues of how it is collected should be explored.

Ms Maloney: Absolutely. We are not saying the only avenue is harmonization. What we are saying is, we do understand some of the difficulties, given the fact that we are talking about a national program with the GST, and if you do have harmonization, you are most probably looking at harmonization for 10 different jurisdictions. So we understand that there can be difficulties because every jurisdiction has different exemptions. That being said, we are also of the view that there is the capacity to implement collection of the PST with exemptions, not having to go through a complete rationalization or harmonization of the program.

Mr B. Ward: Are you suggesting that should be explored very strenuously, to collect the PST at the border?

Ms Maloney: That is right.

Mr B. Ward: Okay. I wanted to make sure that was clear in my mind.

Mr Sterling: This is sort of a supplementary coming out of some of the other questions, and you partially answered it when you were responding to Mr Ward. You mentioned that there were about 6,000 people in the supply side of the shoe industry, and I had a brief discussion with one of my colleagues, Mr Kwinter here. We were talking about Thomas Bata, who is a native Ontarian and the largest shoe manufacturer in the world, and why we cannot compete when we have the entrepreneur of all entrepreneurs within our own province.

I guess the problem relates to the high labour content associated with shoe making; it can only be automated to a certain level. So I guess the extension of the argument is that we do not want those jobs in the bottom line because if they are high labour content we are never going to be able to justify a high hourly wage for the people in those jobs.

If we took your brief and said, "Okay, we agree with everything you have put forward," so that the marginal manufacturers would drop off, what would it go to, in your estimation, from 6,000 people on the supply side?

Ms Maloney: Down to?

Mr Sterling: Yes. You talked about the boot industry being very strong and being able to compete. They have found a niche in the market.

Ms Maloney: I very much think it would not be that dramatic, because the figures I am quoting were made available to us at the time of the dumping complaint. I hate to take figures out of a hat but I think you might be looking at a 25% drop in employees, because what is emerging is that, as the stronger suppliers are becoming more aggressive and going into the United States and being more focused in what it is they are producing, they are in fact expanding. They are picking up some of the smaller organizations that have failed and expanding their base and their ability to compete by doing that.

So what is occurring is a rationalization within the supply industry to be competitive in this—I hate to use the word—global environment that we are operating in.

Mr Sterling: One other brief question, if I can. I have been reading some articles on competitiveness in the Globe and Mail this week, in the business section. Some of them are pretty good. One of them relates to the levels of distribution. Are there too many levels of distribution in your industry?

Ms Maloney: It is interesting. If you compare the Canadian marketplace with the American marketplace, I think one of the most staggering items to me is that the shoe industry is considered among the top five major industries in the United States, whereas you cannot say that in Canada.

In the United States, certainly because of the size of the market they have, there are a number of very, very large retailers who are able to source directly from offshore manufacturers as well as domestic manufacturers. Therefore there is a relatively smaller wholesale industry in the United States, whereas in Canada we do have, not a large import or wholesale community, in terms of numbers, but a stronger wholesale community operating here, which of course adds to the cost.

There is always the possibility that American exporters could come into the Canadian market and pass on to independents the economies of scale in their purchasing power when they purchase offshore. Their suppliers are not interested in the Canadian marketplace. They are interested in the American marketplace and we are secondary. We are fitted in as is necessary.

With the intrusion of dumping duties, those exporters find it really quite difficult to come into the Canadian market. They do not want to have to deal with the issues and the problems that they are faced with at the Canadian border. So there is an opportunity which could be made available to Canadian retailers but which they really cannot take advantage of because of the dumping duty regime that is in place.

Mr Sterling: I am sorry; another question has sprung to mind. If I import a pair of shoes into Canada from the United States, what is the duty now?

Ms Maloney: It depends. If you are bringing in a shoe that is—

Mr Sterling: It was made in the United States.

Ms Maloney: If it meets the requirements of O there is a graduating diminishment of the tariff. I am sure what rate it is at now, but it diminishes, so you are subject to the tariff. But what has happened, interesting enough, is that a number of American producers make the main body of the shoe, the upper, and they make it domestically in the United States; then they may take that and ship it to Mexico to have stitching done on it. Immediately the opinion is formed at our border, "This no longer qualifies as being an American product and therefore subject to the diminishment of tariffs," and retailers are immediately hit with severe dump charges or increased tariff on the product.

So the problem with the footwear industry, much like the apparel industry, is that it is not something where the complete product is made in one region or part of a region. Different parts may be made all over the world and cannot stop that kind of migration of product.

1150

Mr Sterling: Of the 6,000 jobs, how many are in Ontario?

Ms Maloney: I would say probably half, a little bit less than half. It is really split between Quebec and Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: I want to come back to the issue of retailing, because we have heard several presenters talk about the reasons people are going across, that they do not get as good service or the staff are not as knowledgeable. I was wondering if you could give us some indication of the amount of money that is spent on training staff, on making sure they are knowledgeable, and on customer relations and customer service, and then maybe a little more in terms of what support you provide in terms of retail incentives and initiatives.

Ms Maloney: Let me start with the latter part of your question first. We do provide training. We are in fact the only group that has a product knowledge program available to footwear retailers. As well, we provide a sales training program, which we have been able to secure from the United States, as a matter of fact, for distribution to our members.

The first part of your question is difficult. In my view there is not sufficient training happening.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just ask, the product knowledge thing, is that solely for the managers of the stores or is that for salespeople as well?

Ms Maloney: No, it is for everybody. In my estimation there is not sufficient training going on in these industries and I think there is a variety of reasons. For example, we do not in this country, let alone in this province, have access to what I would describe as good, solid consumer trend information. We used to have that. Unfortunately, the federal agency that was running it decided it was no longer appropriate, for a variety of reasons. I suppose one of the reasons was that it was not being embraced as quickly as they would have liked. The result is that large segments of our community are not obtaining Canadian consumer trend information. That is significant, because if you are going to market yourself you should know what the trends are.

Second, there is no operational survey of the Canadian footwear industry. We are in the process of trying to create such a survey so that people can compare what their margins are and their operating costs and so on and so forth.

Third, there is not really too much opportunity for these people to take advantage of training because usually they are sole operators and there may be one or two people in the stores, so they are very reluctant to go to a seminar. What they need really are programs, either audiovisual or people who come into their stores, to give them training. I think programs which were made to address the particular needs of that community would certainly be very well received and would be very successful and helpful, because I think there are skills in selling and customer service that have been neglected.

Mr Sutherland: If I may just ask—and you may not be the appropriate person, but I am sure you deal with other sections of retailing—about the comment you made about consumer trend information; and I believe you are the first one to make that comment. From your relations with these other organizations, what would your sense be of how that fits retailing in general; do retailers in general seem to have enough consumer trend information, or quickly enough, to respond?

Ms Maloney: No, in my view they do not. I think they are not trained sufficiently even to do their own surveying. I have to commend MITT on the strategy report it prepared and made available to retailers. That kind of information, with the skills it provided to people so that they could actually read it and take some steps, was very, very positive, because generally that information is not available, certainly, to the independent community. The larger operators, larger retailers have access to that information, but generally it is not available. There is very little consumer trend information. As far as I know, there has never been a focus group. In fact, we are probably going to be the first organization that does a focus group on footwear and why people buy footwear. Generally that information is just not available.

Ms M. Ward: You represent small independent retailers. On the other side of the border—

The Chair: Excuse me, we have a 5-minute bell for a vote in the House.

Can you ask your question very quickly?

Ms M. Ward: How do they compare? Are those large department stores that people are going to shop at as opposed to small retailers on the other side?

Ms Maloney: Yes. In fact, there are real differences in the product that they are selling as well. In most cases, I do not think the product is as high-quality as is being sold in the border communities, but they are traditionally from larger stores and malls as opposed to sole operators on street locations.

The Chair: This is called abruptly. We have to go to the House for a vote. Thank you for your presentation. It is very helpful.

The committee recessed at 1156.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1540.

The Chair: As we begin this afternoon's proceedings, we do not have any members from the Liberal Party, but I am sure they will show up. We do have a quorum.

LIQUOR CONTROL BOARD OF ONTARIO

The Chair: I would like to begin the afternoon with the Liquor Control Board of Ontario, Andy Brandt, chairman and chief executive officer. Welcome, Mr Brandt. I have a hint that you might understand how this works.

Mr Brandt: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. I know if I have any difficulties procedurally, you are there to help me every step of the way. I want you to know that I am delighted to be here and be back in a place that I called home for a great many years. So I am looking forward to having an opportunity to address the committee.

Is it appropriate that I begin at this time? I am extending my hand, looking for some assistance at this early point. If you would like me to begin, I can so do.

The Chair: Yes, I would like you to begin. We are just going to turn down the House monitor so that we do not have any distractions.

Mr Brandt: I have never allowed legislative debates to interfere with my line of thought in the past. I do not know why it should happen now.

The Chair: Perhaps some of the members in the gallery have not trained their thought processes as diligently as you have.

Mr Brandt: If I might, with the permission of the Chairman and the committee, I would like to introduce some members of the LCBO staff who are here with me as well. Cheryl Parry, who is the executive assistant to my office and as well serves in the capacity of secretary to the board of directors of the LCBO; Mark Synnott, vice-president of finance and administration; Rob Dutton, who is director of economic policy and planning and works directly with Mr Synnott's staff. Chris Layton, who is with our press and media department at the LCBO, is with us as well.

With just a couple of brief opening remarks I would like to get into my presentation, and certainly will leave more than adequate time for all the members of the committee to address any questions they wish, either to myself or to members of the staff.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to address what is an extremely important and critical economic issue for the people of this province. I will not be dealing with the issue in a global sense—although all of us, I know, have views on it—but more specifically the impact of cross-border shopping on the liquor control board, and by extension, on the province of Ontario.

It is an issue that is a very personal one in many respects to me, as it is to many members of this committee, because I come from a border community. I have eyewitness accounts really of the impact of cross-border shopping virtually every time I go back home. So it is a problem that has impacted very severely on my community, on most border communities throughout the province and certainly, by extension, inland communities.

If I might set the stage and give you some statistics will not bore you with a lot of them. But in 1986, average, 1.7 cents of every consumer dollar or every dollar of household spending was spent on beverage alcohol, the type that is sold by the liquor control board, either in a store or at a licensed outlet, a hotel, a restaurant or a legally appropriately licensed outlet that sells alcoholic beverages. What that 1.7 cents out of every dollar translates into in terms of impact on the province is a total revenue of $1.7 billion, of which in the range of a third, or specifically some $650 million, is transferred to the Treasury of the province of Ontario.

Now, let me put that in some perspective for the members of the Legislature, many of whom I know are new to the provincial Legislature. The $650 million is in excess of the total transfer of revenue from all of the lottery funding to the province, which is something in the range of about $500 million. So it is considerably below what the LCBO transfers, and I think if you take a look at other items in the budget like land transfer taxes, you will see that the $650 million is again a figure that is well in excess of some other very substantial revenue items and ones of great importance to the province. Mr Laughren, the Treasurer of Ontario.

Now I know that a number of other organizations have appeared to give this committee some indication of the rather critical and devastating effects of cross-border shopping on their business or their specific area of activity. The message I have is somewhat different from the standpoint of the analysis we have taken at the liquor control board.

The impact of cross-border shopping on the LCBO has not been nearly as great as it has on other retailers, and I would like to point out during the course of my remarks why that is so. Beverage alcohol sales generally have been declining, going down over the past couple of years, for a variety of reasons. Some of those reasons include changing social attitudes among the people of this province, many of whom are turning away from distilled spirits to light alcohol products, or are reforming entirely and not using alcohol products of any kind. Drinking and driving measures that have been introduced by the province of Ontario today and over the course of the past number of years have persuaded people not to indulge in alcohol beverages when they are driving, and price also is a factor. The price of alcoholic beverages in this province and generally throughout Canada is relatively high compared with the competition south of the border.

Now overall, that decline, for a number of reasons—and perhaps more recently we could throw in the current recession that we are experiencing in the province—has resulted last year in a net decline of sales of some 3%. It is an important figure because I want to pick up the impact on cross-border shopping in just a moment.

Three per cent is the global number, the total of lost revenue to the province for a series of reasons. We can all make certain guesses as to what those reasons might be.

I have given you some for your consideration. However, in border communities, and we have analysed the border communities in a very specific and detailed way to determine what the impact of cross-border shopping at the moment, we find that decline to be only slightly higher at 4%.

So to put the figures into perspective again, Mr Chairman, 3% across the province and 4%, somewhat more intense and a more rapid decline, in border communities.

We are finding, however, that in those same border communities there are again a series of problems that are causing a difficulty with respect to those communities. As an example, the recent shutdowns in Windsor have impacted very directly on the economy of that community. The Algoma situation in Sault Ste Marie, another border community, is the same kind of thing. There were closings of Fiberglas and Holmes Foundry in my own community, in an economic downturn in a border community. And if you look at the border communities there seems to be, aside from cross-border shopping, a more sharp decline in economic activity than in some of the inland communities. Now you can get into trouble with generalizations, but it seems to be one of the things that came out as a result of our study.

To provide a little perspective on how large border communities are in terms of the study that we took, the cross-border shopping area, which is the catchment area closest in to the US border, represents about 10% of all of our stores. There are 622 LCBO stores in Ontario, so for purposes of coming to a number with respect to the border communities, they would number something in the range of about 60 stores. They also account for about seven and a half per cent of the gross sales of that $2 billion I mentioned earlier that is marketed by the Liquor Control Board of Ontario.

Now, why are we here? I mean, if our problem is a 1% problem effectively, you have looked at our sales, they are down slightly, what is the purpose in the LCBO coming to make a presentation to you—and I assure you, it is not to waste your time, sir.

What we are finding is that there is an accelerated loss starting to set in. In many of the communities where the present numbers are not critical or devastating, there appears to be a trend line which, if projected outward to 1991-92, 1992-93, would seem to point to a continuing erosion of sales in some of these communities that are already being minimally impacted and will appear to be impacted in a much more major way in the not-too-distant future.

For example, in the Niagara region five years ago sales were growing at a rate of about 4.5% over the previous year. That was compounded and that growth was fairly predictable on a year-to-year basis. If you compare that with 1990-91, the sales in that same Niagara region have declined by some 5%. That is not in conflict with the other numbers that I mentioned, the 3% across the province, 4% in border communities. This community is a little more heavily hit, in that the decline there is 5%, and that could be attributable, certainly attributable in part, to cross-border shopping.

But I think it is attributable as well to the fact that there is rather intense advertising going on out of New York state, which is flooding that geographic area in a much more competitive way than perhaps other parts of the province.

However, in the Niagara region, this is the third consecutive year that we have witnessed a decline in sales in that particular market. In my own area, the Windsor-Sarnia area, a similar situation has occurred. The sales, which increased slightly based on the demographics of the area and natural population increases, those sales have declined in 1990-91 by close to 7%. So you can see there is an erosion occurring, and that erosion, as I said—and excuse me for repeating myself—appears to be accelerating.

The LCBO, in an attempt to provide you with some information that would be helpful, looked at a couple of examples in order to come to a very specific determination as to whether or not cross-border sales were really the fault of this declining situation. What we did was compare a couple of communities in Ontario, a border community of approximately the same population as a more inland community. One of the first ones we took, for no apparent reason, was Sarnia and Peterborough. In taking Sarnia and Peterborough, we took a community that was on the border, impacted by US sales, and a community like Peterborough, which is some distance from the US border and would likely be less impacted.

Within the last two years, Sarnia has begun for the first time to trail Peterborough in LCBO sales. In the last fiscal year, both areas recorded drops in sales, again our overall decline being 3%, so Peterborough was impacted by that. The difference is that while Peterborough fell only 2%, Sarnia went down by about 7.5%. So you can take those two communities as an example of where that accelerating process seems to be taking hold.

Two other communities that we looked at were Sudbury and St Catharines, again attempting to come to a comparison that would be reasonable, and communities that were approximately the same size.

For the last three years, while Sudbury was showing growth in 1988-89, which was as high as 6.5% in increased sales, St Catharines has been declining by roughly 2.5%, 4%, and about 4.5% over the last three years. Again, a very direct indication that cross-border shopping is starting to impact on areas like Sarnia, St Catharines, and other border communities.

I would like to mention as well for your information that Brewers' Retail sales are being impacted far more dramatically than sales at the liquor control board. The magnitude of loss and declines at the Brewers' Retail is in the range of some 12% to 15%, so it is much larger than the decline that I mentioned earlier, before Mr Kwinter arrived, namely some 3%.

If you contrast the difference between Brewers' Retail and the LCBO, you will find, if you refer to the Ernst and Young study on cross-border shopping, that the purchase of an LCBO product or a distilled spirit product is relatively well down the list as an item that people cross the border to search out. At the top of the list in the Ernst & Young study was gasoline and second came groceries and then following groceries came clothing, and the fourth or fifth item down the list representing the actual product that people went to shop for, and that was about a 4% factor I think, was a product that would be handled by the LCBO. So that is one of the reasons why I do not believe our sales are impacted nearly as critically as department stores, grocery stores, Brewers' Retail, gasoline retail outlets, because their products seem to be higher up on the popularity list for purposes of cross-border shopping than is the case with the LCBO.

The other factor is that for years the Ontario public has become rather accustomed to the fact that our prices are higher than they are in the United States. This is not some factor which has come into play in the last year or the last two years or in the last half a dozen years. Traditionally our prices have been higher in Ontario because we have taken an attitude that in order to keep a semblance of control on the question of social responsibility as it relates to the consumption of alcohol products, price was a key factor. If you made the product really cheap, it would encourage some people to drink considerably more. So price was a balancing factor and always has been, I believe, with all parties in this Legislature, irrespective of their political stripe, because the belief was that it was an important element in terms of our social responsibility as legislators.

The second item that is important with respect to the difference in price is the fact that the Ontario public has historically and traditionally received a great deal of benefit from that $650 million in transfers to the provincial Treasury that is not realized, obviously, by the American consumer or by the American citizen, namely our health services, our community and social services. A whole host of educational services are provided as a result of that $650 million being available. Obviously the downside is that there are some people who will make a decision to take advantage of a price in the United States, forgetting completely about the fact that our tax structure is such that we build in a lot of programs that we offer to people and that does result in a product being slightly higher. I will refer to a few specific products because I think it is important that we have those as well.

Over the course of the past few years, however, since this question of cross-border shopping has become somewhat more critical and obviously has intensified rather dramatically as an item for concern by the members of the assembly, it is interesting to note that there has actually been a slight reduction in the gap between the price charged in the United States and the price charged in Ontario. In other words, the differential—and I am not going to try to convince you it is dramatic, it is very small, but a very noticeable decline in the difference between the price you pay over there and the price you would pay here in our own jurisdiction. What I am saying is that it is not as a result of galloping price increases on the part of the government of Ontario and/or the LCBO that is causing people to buy in another jurisdiction. In fact, it is more of an incentive for them to come back home again and buy here, because our price difference is slightly smaller than it was.

If you were to take our most competitive products, by and large they would be the premium brands. In the premium brands of the LCBO product lines, we are rather competitive with the United States. As an example, and not with intent of advertising a particular product, a Scotch by name of Johnnie Walker Red Label in a one-litre container would sell in the United States between a low of $23.80 and a high of $28.31. Those are translated into Canadian dollars and those are in various US border cities. The same product at the LCBO in Ontario sells for $28.53. I think argue that is a competitive price. Although we are slightly higher it is not so dramatic that it would encourage someone to cross the border.

Here is where we have a bit of a problem. That is lower-priced products like Smirnoff vodka, not that anyone would be familiar with that particular product, but mention it only in passing because you may have seen it on a shelf somewhere. Our prices are not nearly as competitive. The US price ranges from a low of $12.80 to about $15. The Ontario price is $24.33.

Again, the position taken by Ontario is that whether it is a bottle of Scotch, a bottle of vodka, a bottle of rum, looking at it from the standpoint of attempting to bring about an attitude of social responsibility in alcohol consumption in this province, we do not want to deeply discount a product which will encourage overconsumption of a vodka product, so our vodka is priced at approximately the same price as the Scotches.

Let me move on quickly here, because I know you want to get to some questions. The current loss situation, to put it into perspective, is important to us, although not critical. What is critical, however, if left unchecked and the growth continues, as some observers have suggested with respect to cross-border shopping and if these revenue losses continue—it could become much more significant.

I know there have been some comments made and certainly some very critical observations have been offered with respect to the GST. I want to say that the federal GST is revenue-neutral, price-neutral in so far as liquor products are concerned. It had no impact on our business. I know it had considerable impact on other products that one might purchase, but it in some instances provided even a slight price reduction in some beverage alcohol products.

In the Ernst and Young study that I mentioned earlier, one of the findings was that some 36% of the respondents shopping dollars was spent on gasoline, which was the number one sort of attraction in going south of the border. Some 68% indicated that the variance in gas prices was the chief reason that they had—I mean, more than two thirds of all the people who crossed the border have indicated that gas prices were the main reason they went over there. Now, the reason that a lot of liquor purchases are not being made in the United States, based on our best information, that it is an ancillary purchase, it is not the main purchase. It is fourth or fifth down the list of reasons why a person crosses the bridge or goes through a tunnel to go over to the United States. So again, although it seems to be increasing, it is not increasing dramatically as yet.

Let me give you some ideas as to what might be done with respect to the liquor control board and from, obviously, our vantage point in this entire debate as to how we think ne of this erosion could be stopped. One of the things we could do, obviously, is reduce prices.

If we reduced prices and if we were more competitive if we cut back on the amount of money that was transferred to the provincial Treasury, that would have a significant impact on any sales that were being made north of the border, but I want to caution you that in so doing, it has a very dramatic impact on the Treasurer's revenue base. It would erode substantially the $650 million that the Treasurer anticipates receiving from the liquor control board and there would in all probability be an erosion of certain programs like health, education and other programs that are paid for at least in part from dollars which are generated through the liquor control board.

We could continue, as a second alternative, to pursue liquor control board retailing initiatives. For the benefit of the members of the committee, I would like to refer to the Chairman's own riding, where we recently opened a new store which I would hope the Chairman would agree is a very attractive, modern, entirely different kind of merchandising concept in the liquor control board from what we have used before. It is not an irresponsible method of merchandising liquid refreshments, but in fact provides better consumer services. Our modernized stores include such things as trained, knowledgeable staff, a wider choice of products and, I might add, something that we should all be very proud of: the world's most exacting quality control standards. We are looked upon in the laboratories at the liquor control board as being the leader, certainly across Canada and by many US jurisdictions as well, as the jurisdiction that keeps a very tight control on the quality of the products that we allow for sale within our operations.

One of the areas that I have felt for some years could be improved upon in order to make a considerable difference with respect to the erosion of some of our retail dollars into the US market is for some improvement in customs enforcement. If we could encourage the federal government, as an example, to do one thing—to collect provincial sales taxes at the US border—if a deal could be made between the Minister of Revenue of Ontario and Jim Jelinek at the federal level, and if he could just ask, without adding more staff, without any administrative changes that would be dramatic or would be particularly costly, if they would simply collect the applicable 8% provincial sales tax on items that are simply being waived at the moment, a couple of things would happen.

Number one, the people would quickly come to an understanding of what the true cost of that purchase really is, because they are in fact evading taxes by not paying the 8%. By the way, you are supposed to pay the 8% on a voluntary basis, and I could ask for a show of hands by any of you who know of any volunteers who have paid that 8%. Well, I know that you would, Mr Sterling. I was not speaking on a personal basis but rather on—

The Chair: Most of the members of this committee do not shop in the United States.

Mr Brandt: At least over the course of the last few weeks.

Some enforcement improvements and/or collection combined with that of the provincial sales tax, in my view, would help us recoup some of our lost revenues. More specifically, it would help the provincial Treasurer, because those revenues would be directed to sources obviously that he is in need of.

We could begin a more aggressive marketing strategy to encourage US shoppers to come north, to purchase from the liquor control board, by comparing some of our very competitive prices—and we are competitive, as I showed you, in certain lines. But we also happen to have premium products and a far wider range of products than American stores normally carry.

Those were a couple of ideas that I wanted to throw out for your consideration, Mr Chairman.

In closing, let me just say that Ontarians must come to understand that the money that we raise from the LCBO goes to pay for some very critical services, which you as legislators and we as the Ontario public at times take for granted, benefits that flow directly to our communities and the activities that are paid for as a result of revenues generated by the liquor control board. That $650-million net transfer is a significant amount of money. It is one of the largest sources of outside revenue which comes directly to the provincial Treasurer.

So I would just say to this committee that we are concerned about the current erosion. We are more concerned about what we see to be a growth or an acceleration of that erosion, and we think it can be at least slowed down, if not stopped, if some measures are taken to combat it such as I have outlined in my brief remarks to you this afternoon.

Thank you very much for your attention and patience. I would respond to any questions that you might have.

1610

The Chair: I have seven questioners. If we could limit it to one question each and if those questions could not be multiple-part questions with a long intro, please, Mr Jamison, you are first.

Mr Jamison: By the way, that was a very good presentation. I think it gave a very good overview of the board and its purpose and I would like to thank you for taking the time to come here and be with us.

When we talk about the price differences in brands, of course, you pointed out clearly that the premium brands are competitive in price. What I would like you to do for the purpose of the committee is to expand on what you are doing as a liquor board to really promote the board itself customer service-wise, what kinds of benefits we have in having the stores under the one banner of the LCBO and the kind of training and programs. I know there is such a thing as point of sale that is looming on the horizon. What does that mean? And again, I know that the public awareness programs are of great benefit. If you could expand, just for the sake of the committee, I think that is an area in particular where again it speaks of keeping the public's confidence in the way that liquor is distributed within the province. I think that is a major responsibility of yours, and also relates to the funds in the end result.

Mr Brandt: We have attempted to merchandise in a more modern way, because obviously the LCBO had to change, as did many other retailers over the course of the past few years. To respond to Mr Jamison's question, if you look at a typical LCBO store today, it bears very little resemblance to what you saw 10 or 20 years ago.

One of the things we have added to our stores in terms of features is the Vintages stores, which now cater really to those in our communities who have an affection for wine and food and by any argument that one could raise are not abusers of alcohol products but have a refined taste and want to enjoy better wines from virtually all over the world. We have experts on staff who are trained who I will compare with any employees of any similar kind of operation anywhere in North America, who can provide advice on the wines of the world, if you will, in addition to Ontario wines, those that we purchase from France or Germany or Italy or any of the other countries that we import wine from. So our Vintages stores as well as the Vintages section of some stores are a major step up in terms of service.

We provide services like French-language services in our stores, which are not provided, obviously, by many other jurisdictions. Any of the information that is available in LCBO outlets is available in quite the same way as it is here at the Legislative Assembly. We provide a direct hotline information service if you have a special function, if you have a wedding celebration or some kind of family celebration that you require some liquid refreshments and you want advice on how to get a licence or how to purchase the product or whatever. We handle something in the order—and I am guessing at this number—of 7,000 calls a month on just questions relating to our store operations, perhaps a question as simple as what kind of wine goes best with a particular type of food product.

The liquor control board, in addition, has as one of its mandates a very important function economically that Mr Kwinter will be aware of in his former role as Minister of Industry and Trade, and that is the support of the Ontario wine industry and the grape growers. That has an agricultural component to it, but we do our level best to promote Ontario products within our operations, because I need not tell you, it is an employment question as well as a question of trying to expand and to enhance an indigenous Ontario industry which is vitally important. You can see the kind of advertising campaign that the wine industry is involved with at the moment where they have a new slogan, "We're Ready When You Are," trying to encourage people to not buy an imported product but to buy a local Ontario product. We become part of those kinds of efforts, if you will, in order to sell those particular types of products.

We have a no-hassle return policy. If you are not happy with an LCBO product, you can bring it back. That is just not available in a US jurisdiction in most instances, but if you buy a product from us, you can bring it back. We would rather you did not, but if you do, we will give you the cash back for it.

Those are the kinds of things that we are involved with, and I would maybe bring Mark Synnott forward, if you would for a moment, Mark, if you would join me here and perhaps expand on the point of sale, which is part of our new computerized and modernized upscaling of some of our stores. Mr Synnott, who heads up finance with the staff, would be able to respond to that, I believe.

Mr Synnott: The primary objective behind this new system is to improve customer service at the checkout counter. It gives things such as the automatic call-up of price so that the customer is processed in a shorter time period across the counter. It is also intended to provide better access to and knowledge of what inventory is available so that if the customer wants to inquire about a product, he can get immediate access as to what is in the store. It is also designed, in the long run, to help us manage our inventories more effectively so that we can make more effective use of the province's dollars that are invested in the LCBO.

Mr Brandt: Just to expand briefly on that, about a third of our 622 stores have now been equipped with this more sophisticated type of checkout system, and we are doing a few of those every week. Eventually, the new system will be placed on that particular point-of-sale computer system. So that is what we are moving towards and I hope it responds to your question.

Mr Sutherland: I wanted to ask about duty-free stores, because liquor products you can purchase at duty-free stores but beer you cannot purchase. Can you explain how that arrangement works and what revenue the LCBO gets from that?

Mr Brandt: We get a slightly reduced revenue because of the competitive nature of a duty-free store, but your observation with respect to beer not being available is in fact not correct.

Mr Sutherland: Is that right? I have not been over a duty-free in a while.

Mr Brandt: I know that you probably would not be a consumer of that product.

Mr Sutherland: No comment.

Mr Brandt: So I just want to mention to you that products of the two major breweries in Ontario are available. I do not believe any of the microbrewery products are available. If they are, they are very limited.

Mr Sutherland: Is a wide selection of beer products available?

Mr Brandt: No, just the two majors, Labatt's and Molson's.

Mr Sutherland: I mean all of Labatt's products, all Molson's.

Mr Brandt: Not usually. It is limited.

Mr Sutherland: Could you just clarify?

Mr Brandt: It is limited not because of anything we do as a board, it is limited because of space limitations within the geography of the store itself. But I think your question is more directed at the pricing situation. In order to be competitive with the United States, and recognizing that this is a product which is exported and never sold again in terms of Ontario—in other words, it is driven out of the country and is consumed somewhere other than Ontario.

have to be somewhat more competitive price-wise. So it is how those products are marketed in duty-free shops.

20

Mr B. Ward: First of all, I would like to congratulate you on your appointment. I think you are doing a fine job and I would hope that you can continue on in a successful manner.

We are here primarily to talk about cross-border shopping and the problems that our border communities are experiencing with the consumers going across the border into America to purchase a number of items. There have been a number of suggestions made by various groups on methods that we could use to discourage that type of endeavour. One suggestion has been to reduce the amount of tax on gasoline along the border areas. The one concern I have is that, and I do not know if it is shared with everyone in this room, is that unless you control the direct cost, there is no guarantee that savings of any tax reduction will be passed on to the consumer, simply because you do not control the cost. Those are private sector initiatives, and they will charge whatever the market will bear.

However, under the LCBO we do have a monopoly that is controlled by the government. I think that part of the selling point of going to America is the so-called cheap booze. In America in fact some stores sell certain brands at a loss to encourage you to go in and perhaps buy milk or eggs or whatever along with it. From an administration standpoint, and I do not know if you can answer this or not, is it possible for us to have a reduction in price of alcohol—and I am talking on a broad basis of our LCBO outlets—in the border communities, just from an administration standpoint, and would that cut drastically into the amount of revenue that the LCBO takes, recognizing that there seems to be an accelerating decrease in volume of sales along our border? I do not know if you can answer that.

Mr Brandt: Administratively we could do it. There is no question that we could do it in one store, we could do it in 100 stores, in 622 stores. Whatever the government wanted we could do in terms of drawing the line.

Let me revisit for a moment the numbers we are talking about; 10% of our stores would be in the geographical area that you are identifying, by definition a border store. They represent about 7.5% of sales. Wherever you draw the line in doing this kind of thing, whether it be gasoline, whether it be alcoholic beverages or whether it be bread, somebody going to be able to drive across the line and buy it—

Mr B. Ward: Yes, we are aware of that.

Mr Brandt: —from an expensive jurisdiction, like perhaps London, Ontario, compared to an inexpensive jurisdiction like Sarnia, or wherever. So that is a problem, and I do not know how you overcome that. But if your question specifically is, can we administer that, I am saying yes. Mr Synnott will probably say it would be difficult, but it certainly would not be impossible.

Mr B. Ward: It is possible. We are exploring all sources of opportunities that we can think of as a committee and as groups are presenting them to us to attempt to come to some type of solution to this problem. So thank you very much. It is possible. It may be some work, but it is possible.

Mr Brandt: Yes.

The Chair: Did you want to make a comment on that?

Mr Synnott: The current act requires national pricing across Ontario.

Mr Brandt: Uniformity.

Mr Synnott: Uniformity in pricing.

Mr Sterling: I was interested in your example about Sarnia, Andy, and when you said that the sales were dropping in Sarnia, one of my colleagues said to me he had not heard that you had moved down to Toronto.

Mr Brandt: I want to assure you, the impact of my consumption would not reflect itself in any statistical aberrations up or down, Mr Sterling, but I do appreciate your bringing it to my attention.

Mr Sterling: The importation of liquor from the United States: While in answer to Mr Sutherland's question you talked about the outflow, I was more interested in the inflow. I understood that you had to be out of the country for a certain period of time before you could bring in 40 ounces or whatever or one case of beer or whatever it is. Can you bring in more than that and just pay duty on it?

Mr Brandt: Yes.

Mr Sterling: Is the duty exorbitant so that you would never do that?

Mr Brandt: No, it is not. It is rather competitive. In some instances you can buy a product in the United States, come back, pay full duty—I am talking everything from PST, GST; add up all of the taxes—and you may still bring a product in for slightly less than what it would cost in Ontario. That kind of aberration is something that I want to look at, because if I had more time to prepare the response to the question Mr Sterling has raised, I might have had a suggestion to make along those lines. But I think it is wrong that somebody can do the sort of thing that you are getting at, namely, buy a product over there and do everything that is legal, bring it back into the province and it still costs a little bit less than what we would charge for it in Ontario. That is a bit of a quirk or an aberration that I think should be cleared up, but it is possible.

Mr Sterling: The question of collecting provincial sales tax has been made by other people as well. My question is, you are suggesting that we collect it on what product that is being brought in, the one being declared because you have been there for more than 24 hours?

Mr Brandt: Where the federal government is already collecting the federal taxes, they have a person physically in an area where they have filled out a form and that form requires a certain collection of the federal taxation which is applicable to that product. It also carries with it that voluntary element which is obviously not being pursued too aggressively by Ontario consumers, namely, the 8% sales tax.

I am saying that they could add a line to a form, a simple piece of paper, collect the 8% sales tax and Mr Jelinek could simply transfer that back to Mr Laughren here and say, "This is what we collected on your behalf." It is not unusual that one level of government would do this kind of thing as a courtesy for another level of government.

This kind of cross-relationship in a co-operative sense goes on, as we all know, in a great number of programs. But the loss to Ontario—can you imagine for a moment if we had a voluntary income tax program, and said to people, "Send in voluntarily what you think you owe us."

Mr Sterling: Okay. I know you do not get out very often, Andy, but I would like to get—

Mr Brandt: How many questions do you get?

Mr Sterling: I would like to get brief answers to my questions but—

Mr Brandt: I am trying to give you brief answers.

Mr Sterling: At any rate, the $23.50, the Johnnie Walker bottle, if somebody bought that at the duty-free shop, would they get it for less than $23.50 in the US?

Mr Brandt: At a duty-free shop, yes.

Mr Sterling: So there is no way that you can compete or compare with that kind of thing.

Mr Synnott: You are taking all the federal markups out of the price.

Mr Sterling: Their federal markups?

Mr Synnott: Their federal markups.

Mr Sterling: So it would be considerably less than $23.50.

Mr Brandt: Our comparison is on a retail-to-retail basis and sometimes you will see price comparisons that may not fit directly with what I have shared with you this afternoon, but that is because of what I think Mr Ward said. Someone indicated that they will sometimes deep discount a particular product as a loss leader or as a come-on. That is a form of merchandising in the US which we cannot use in Ontario because, quite obviously, our prices are uniform across the province.

We do discount occasionally when we are closing out a product or if we have a slow-moving product and we need it out of the inventory or whatever. That product will be made available uniformly, to the extent that one can, in a number of different stores of the LCBO. So we do occasionally clear out a product that may not be repeated for our inventory purposes.

Mr Hansen: Mr Brandt, you answered most of the questions I was writing down here throughout.

A lot of people wait until the well goes dry, and with the cross-border shopping, that is exactly what is happening with the revenues declining here in Ontario.

I remember the beer strike that we had, I think it was 1988 or 1987. At that time it was $2 more a case than you could buy it here in Ontario by going across to the US. With the beer strike on, the beer drinkers still went across and paid all the duty to come back. I think you are right in that sense that it should be a level playing field if you are importing. It should cost the same as here in Ontario.

The only other thing a lot of people do not see by reducing the price is that your health costs can go up if you wind up with a higher consumption. You are not really saving any money, you are spending it someplace else.

My one question, coming from Lincoln where the grapes grow, is that I have had a lot of concern from the grape growers and the wine industry down there that domestic wines are not treated, I have been told, the same as the foreign wines. One instance: the display on shelves is less. The other issue is the purchase of the wines, where the wine is paid for. On domestic wines it is paid when sold or has gone to the LCBO store, whereas foreign wines are paid up front, so they are telling me that it is a large cost up front.

I have not written to you, I have not put this question before you, and it would be a very simple answer, but I could have it now to take back, because sometimes you do not get all the facts or sometimes they are misconstrued.

Mr Brandt: Let me answer in part, and I am going to let the number cruncher who is here with me, Mr Synnott, perhaps respond to part of the question. First of all, even an advantage legally under GATT that we can give to Ontario producers is given. Keep in mind that we are a party to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; we have to be in compliance with the GATT regulations. There is a constant stream of complaints that are quite opposite of the coin from those that you have offered today, sir, from other producers in France and elsewhere who think that we are unfair. To give you one example, there are roughly 225 Ontario wine stores in this province. There is not one foreign wine outlet anywhere. Legally, we are on reasonably safe grounds in that we grandfathered those stores in as outlets for Ontario product, but we have literally frozen out the foreign competition by saying "Thou shalt not have any stores in Ontario."

Second, the day I went with Mr Wiseman to open the new Ajax store, my second trip that day was to Pickering. If you went to the Pickering store, which is one of our newest modern stores, you would see a very substantial—in fact, quite huge—display of Ontario products which are well identified and, from the standpoint of shelf space, take up far more room than any of the foreign products. In terms of sales, Ontario products represent, through our operation, about 30% of the total wines sold. No question, the market is declining for domestic Ontario wine. It represents about 40% of all wine consumed in Ontario, the Ontario wine industry—the additional 10% is made up of the product sold outside of an LCBO outlet, namely an Ontario wine store, either a Brights store, you have seen them, the Chateau Gai, Andres, and those kinds of stores. So we give even a conceivable advantage to the Ontario wine industry.

Let me tell you how frequently I meet with them. I met with them yesterday. I met with them again today, and I will probably meet them on some other issue tomorrow. We meet constantly to try to find ways to market their products in such a way as to make sure that we enhance Ontario sales, Ontario products, Ontario employment and all of those other things.

I wonder if Mr Synnott could respond to the—

The Chair: I did not think there were any numbers left to crunch.

Mr Brandt: Yes, there are. There are some serious ones that I want to share with Mr Hansen, and I left them all for Mr Synnott.

Mr Synnott: The payment terms for Ontario wines 30 days from receipt at our warehouse. The payment for import wines is 30 to 60 days from the date of receipt at our warehouse. Generally, that means it is something like 100 days by the time it comes from Bordeaux, the time they receive payment back in Paris, so there are very preferential settlement terms with the Ontario wine industry.

Mr Kwinter: The LCBO case is a classic business case. If every business in Ontario was like it, we could solve this problem very easily, if we had the political will. The LCBO is a monopoly. When I was the minister responsible for it, it was the largest single purchaser of alcoholic beverages in the world.

Mr Brandt: It still is.

Mr Kwinter: It still is, which means that economies of scale certainly do not get into it. They can buy as cheaply as anyone anywhere in the world. They have the state of the art as far as a warehouse that is totally automated. Again, that opened during my administration, with no pains, but it did open, and I assume it is working.

Mr Brandt: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: It is spectacular and it was conceived, a matter of fact—

The Chair: It is going to be a long question.

Mr Kwinter: No, the point I am making, and I think it is really important, is that all of the things we are going to have to address—hardly any of them, with one exception, apply to the LCBO. You cannot say the distribution is easy. They have 622 stores, it is a monopoly, and it is all done automatically. It is all sent out, so there is no wastage there. They buy as well as anybody can possibly buy, so there is no wastage there. All the changes that they are making are not really to help them make money, they are to help address the consumers and their problems. They are not expected to have to go in, write it out and get a little brown bag and sneak it out of the store because it was a no-no to be in a liquor store. So they are doing all of those things. Again, when you talk about competitiveness, the number-one-selling whisky in the United States is Seagram's 7 Crown, so we are competitive. It is the one area where we do not do all of those things.

The one problem that we have is in the beer industry. In the beer industry, because of our interprovincial trade barriers, every single brewer has to have a brewery in every province in Canada, with the exception of PEI because it is too small. So you have provinces with a population of 700,000 or 600,000 and they have to have a brewery. That is why the cost of our beer is so high at the manufacturing level. There is a plant, and I do not know—Andy, you may know—that is in mothballs in the United States, but it probably still is. It has enough capacity in that one plant to supply all of Canada with all the beer it will ever drink and can do it very, very cheaply. So that is the one area.

So the problem that we have and the basis for the discrepancy in the liquor prices is strictly taxes—we tax differently—and the monopoly. The first question I have for you is, do you think it is a serious problem, the problem of purchasing alcoholic beverages across the border?

Is that a serious problem that could be addressed by either breaking up the monopoly of the LCBO and changing its name so that it no longer reflects the puritanical idea of control? Second, should we allow competition so that the people can go out and compete on a one-on-one basis in the free market system?

Mr Brandt: The component which results in a higher cost for the Ontario product is taxation. Let's face it, that is where it is at. It has nothing to do with our distribution costs, the efficiency of our operation. If you take a look at the liquor control board, look at its laid-in price for a case of product, we can compete effectively with virtually any jurisdiction in the world. We buy better than some. We are large enough, because we are the largest purchaser of alcoholic beverages in the world. As a result of that, we do get preferential treatment in certain instances, so we put our size to work on behalf of the Ontario consumer.

But if the bottom line of your question is how do we become more competitive, how do we sell if the interest of the Legislative Assembly ultimately was to sell a $24 bottle of Smirnoff in Ontario for $12 to compete with New York State, it is totally taxes. You will not squeeze nickels and dimes out of the other end. In other words, the total component that goes into the cost of delivering the product is all taxation.

Mr Kwinter: That was the point I was trying to make, that it really is not the problem with the LCBO. If you want to get a lean, mean, clean organization that has the economies of scale, that has distribution, that has everything, they are it. All you have to do is move the taxes. Unfortunately, we can apply that to hardly any other sector of the economy.

Mr Brandt: That is right.

The Chair: You mean you are not inferring that we should monopolize all the other stores?

Mr Kwinter: No, the point I am making is that there is no sense in doing it. That is an easy one. All you have to do is have the will to say, "We're going to cut the taxes," and we can be competitive, but you cannot apply that anywhere else.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation. I kind of miss your sense of humour in the place, too.

The message I got, and then I will get to the question, I was actually surprised that it does not seem to me that cross-border shopping has had a major impact on your operation. I was surprised by that. The only caveat on it is that maybe it is because it has been there for so long in liquor that it is already built in. If you have 10.5% of your stores doing 7.5% of your business, does that mean anything? If 10.5% represents population and 7.5% is sales, then maybe they have already, years ago, been shopping across it. But if that is not the case—

Mr Brandt: If I may interrupt you, that is an accurate observation. Part of the erosion was already built in, so part of the decline, which is slower and less dramatic today, is as a result of what we believe to be practices that have been established for a long number of years. That is an excellent observation. I should have mentioned it, but it is a fact.

Mr Phillips: Thank you. I need that every once in a while. My question, though, I guess is to take advantage of your experience—I mean this sincerely—of (a) living in a cross-border area; (b) the Legislature; and (c) now running this operation. I think you have given us one piece of advice and that is, “Look at the provincial sales tax collection.” Have you any other advice, with your broader hat on, for the committee, recognizing, as some other members have said, that our goal here is to try and find something that at least over the next 12 to 24 months can help particularly our Canadian retailers survive?

Mr Brandt: Short of trying to go head to head with American competition, which would be very difficult for a lot of other reasons—economies of scale, methods of merchandising, costs of doing business, that are built in, that are sort of an intrinsic part of the way of doing business in Ontario and in Canada as opposed to the United States and would make it very difficult for us to compete one to one on a great number of products—I think some educating of the Ontario consumer would probably go at least some distance. I do not suggest to you that this is the entire solution, but I think there are a lot of people who think they are simply getting something cheaper, without recognizing that the quid pro quo on the other side of the ledger is that you may erode the availability of health services, you may not have an expansion of educational services and facilities, you may not be able to get some of the social welfare benefits that are available in our society, if you continue to allow this to happen.

I know that in a small way some of this is occurring. There are some retailers who are fighting back now in border communities who are advertising extensively, saying: “This is what you get when you buy a gallon of gas in Ontario. You receive certain benefits that are paid for out of that tax money.” I think we can maybe reach some people from an emotional standpoint and maybe they will be somewhat more self-conscious about going across the border to purchase when they realize it is not just a question of getting a bargain, because that bargain may whip-saw back and result, over a period of time, in erosion of the very services that they voted for in one fashion or another over the years.

The second thing I think that we could consider, and I am not just speaking of the LCBO by any stretch of the imagination with reference to this comment, but the increase in control at the border points I think has got to be something that is taken more seriously by the federal government. I do not like to be critical of another level of government, but I think that if you are going to collect the revenues which legitimately belong to a particular government, then you have got to either provide the manpower or the resources or enter into the co-operative undertakings between two levels of government to make sure that those resources are collected. I think that would perhaps dissuade certain people from making a purchase in another jurisdiction if they knew they had to pay the 8%. Technically, you are supposed to voluntarily send it in now. We know it does not happen and I think it is nonsense to even suggest that people are going to do it voluntarily. Very taxes are paid voluntarily.

So those are a couple of ideas. I know it does not go enough to answer all of the problems that you have to address in this committee.

Ms Harrington: Thank you very much for promoting wines in Ontario. I represent Niagara Falls. I hope you were down to Niagara Falls for the Grande Cuvée month, for the competition of Ontario wines.

Mr Brandt: I was not. Some of my staff were there, was not able to be there, but I understand it was a success and one that will be expanded as the years go on.

Ms Harrington: You mentioned education awareness in the last little while. I believe that is something that we are all responsible to do, as to how our whole way of doing things here is wrapped up with this issue. You also mentioned increased control, which is paying the 8% tax, and I believe that is important.

Living in Niagara Falls, I know exactly what the situation is and why people go over. I do not go over for liquor but certainly one is tempted to go over for gasoline, and I believe that is the crucial thing. It was number 1 on my list as well. So what I wanted to ask you was, briefly, do you know it is not your area of expertise, but you were here for quite some time, so I think you may have an opinion—do you feel that having the concentric circles of reduced taxation on gasoline would be a workable solution?

Mr Brandt: Personally I do not, because I think that the tax will simply spill over to different types of circles with different types of buying patterns, but I think you have either got to do it uniformly or forget it, because I just do not know how you could break this province up into some kind of pricing zone.

In responding to the question earlier, I personally do not think it is workable. That is an opinion. I have no proof of this. But as I said before, wherever you draw the line there is going to be someone on the wrong side of the line who is simply going to slip over to what he sees as being an area that is more economically attractive. Ultimately, then, if the purchaser in London, Ontario, further away from the border finds that gas is cheaper if he drives to Strathroy or if Strathroy find the gas is cheaper if they migrate over to the great community of Sarnia, they are simply going to go to the community where it is cheaper. That is why they are going from Windsor to Detroit, from Niagara Falls to Buffalo and from Sarnia to Port Huron. That is why it is happening. They are simply jumping the line.

The same thing, I would respectfully suggest, would happen if you tried to do it within Ontario itself, and I know that some of the mayors have asked for some consideration with respect to this kind of thing. I would like to know more about their proposal, because on the surface I hesitate to say that I think it is workable.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Brandt, for your presentation this afternoon. I would like to thank you on behalf of the committee for coming.

Mr Brandt: Thank you very much. I enjoyed it, and I am delighted to be back for a few minutes.

The Chair: If you have any further analyses that you think the committee could use in its deliberations, we would appreciate them being sent along.

Mr Brandt: I might add, Mr Chairman, any of the statistical data that we have been able to put together and research that our staff has done with respect to comparisons between communities, between regions and so forth, would be delighted to make that available to you if it is of any use to this committee. We have a great deal of material that I was not able, because of time limitations, to share with you today, but I would be delighted to make it available to the committee or to the clerk, Mr Decker, if he would like to have it so you could refer to it. I do not want to load you up with paper. Heaven knows you have got enough, but we have it available.

The Chair: I think that at least one copy to the researchers would be appreciated. Thank you.

Mr Brandt: I will see that is done. Thank you.

STONEY CREEK FURNITURE

The Chair: Our next presenter is Jim Carruthers, the general manager of the Stoney Creek Furniture store.

Mr Carruthers: I did bring some paper.

The Chair: If you would like to begin.

Mr Carruthers: Sure. I am not totally familiar with the rules and procedures, but I am sure the Chairman will interrupt me if I do something wrong.

I appreciate the opportunity to sit before you today and perhaps bring to light some of the situations we are facing closer to the border down the Niagara Peninsula.

In that little package that I just distributed, it gives you the background information on Stoney Creek Furniture, a company in Fruitland, Ontario.

A couple of positioning statements in terms of the values of our company: the fact that in 1989 we won the Outstanding Business Achievement Award; in 1990 we won the Corporate Citizen of the Year award.

There are a lot of statistics in there, some paper you have already seen from the Retail Council of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. In my presentation I am trying to stay away from percentages, numbers and facts. You have got all that, and I am sure you have digested it at your leisure.

I would like to give you just a little bit of background on who we are and the problems that we are facing. I sit before you here today wearing a few hats. I am a Canadian citizen. I am a Canadian consumer. I am general manager of Stoney Creek Furniture, representing a group of 46 dedicated staff members. I am also a former board member of the Canadian Home Furnishings Association and I still am actively involved as a member, so you will forgive me if I go from first person singular to plural once in a while.

As Canadian citizens, my family and I have decided not to utilize our buying power in border cities. It is a personal decision. I fear we are really in the minority. We reached this decision not because we have a lot of money and can afford to be patriotic. We figure that at some point in time, as revenues evaporate, the provincial Treasurer is going to come after us and get some more somehow.

A good number of my staff at Stoney Creek Furniture do shop in northern New York. It is their effort to stretch their after-tax dollar. It is a personal decision, and they look at it as, everybody is doing it. I make no judgement. If you walked into our cafeteria and opened the fridge, you would see label after label of Tops Friendly Markets. As Mr Brandt was saying, most of them buy their booze in the States.

I also come before you representing one of the best teams in furniture retailing in North America. I do not mean that to be an arrogant statement. It is a statement of fact recognized in many international trade publications. You have, within the package in front of you, testimonials as to our accomplishments on a local level. However, we are recognized at the international level as a star in our industry. We are a successful company. We are an innovative group of people. We are a profitable company, and we have an extremely dedicated team.

But guess what? We cannot compete. Twelve to 24 months from now, unless the rules are changed, we will not be around. We can compete for the consumer dollar locally, but we cannot compete across the border. The cost of doing business in upstate New York, it is in those reports you have in front of you, is low, and there is nothing we can do about that. We are very good at our jobs, and no, we cannot compete.

We belong to the Canadian Home Furnishings Association, to a buying group and to the American-based National Home Furnishings Association. Within that umbrella group, we are able to exchange a lot of information, quite a bit of it financial, and we see that we are one of the best at managing our assets, a great group of people, and we cannot compete, and it is frustrating.

We manage our expenses carefully, but it is the overheads that we cannot control that are doing us in. We do not come before you looking for dollars, handouts. We know we will never really get a level playing field. For the comprehensive programs that are available to Ontarians, we realize there is a cost, but we do want more. We want leadership. We want you to cross your party lines. We want you to negotiate with the municipalities. We want you to show some leadership to our federal government. One of the levels of government must decide to lead and the time for action is now.

Almost every day of the week, my staff is challenged by a customer to beat a competitive price from south of the border. It is not profitable for us to take that order and try and meet that price. However, our direction is exactly that. That is what we do. We then remind the customer that it is his or her responsibility to report a purchase made in upstate New York and pay the provincial sales tax. You know what the answer is: "No way."

We try to meet the price and then we have to collect and remit the provincial sales tax. Their response, without exception, is the same: "Eat the tax. We are not going to pay it."

Furniture stores average a 2% profit in North America. The numbers are fairly consistent in Canada. We do much better, but we cannot afford to swallow 8%. Profit dollars fuel everything we do. Investment in product, investment in people, investment in physical assets and a return of investment to our community. We must be profitable to grow and we must grow if we are going to survive. Given the current set of rules, more and more of our customers will turn to the United States to take advantage of lower overheads and cheaper prices. Please be reminded that the retailers south of the border do not buy anything cheaper. They are not better merchants that we are. It is simple: Their cost of doing business is less.

The trickle of consumers migrating to the United States has become a flood. They will not be deterred by traffic jams and long lineups. Our customers are not trying to save a few dollars on eggs, gasoline, shirts or a bottle of Smirnoff. They will put up with the hassle because when they go down there to buy furniture, they are saving hundreds and, in some cases, thousands and thousands of dollars on big-ticket purchases.

Our industry research indicates the cost of doing business just south of the border, just across the border from us in Niagara Falls, is about 40% less than southern Ontario. I believe that is referred in one of the handouts I gave you. Our wages, our property values, our benefits, taxes, interest rates are higher and beyond our ability to control. We are an efficient company, but we cannot compete.

The goods and services tax is not the culprit. The elimination of the federal sales tax on furniture has resulted in a net saving to the consumer. Artificially high interest rates are not the culprit either. It is a waste, it is a nuisance; however, we personally manage our assets well and have actually reduced our borrowing costs in the past year.

A lower Canadian dollar is not the answer. Free trade has devastated the Canadian furniture manufacturing industry to such an extent that we import 70% of the products we sell from the United States. If the dollar depreciates, our costs go up.

Lowering wages is not the solution. Our staff earn every dollar they make and they deserve more. Sunday shopping alone will not stem the flow of traffic south of the border; however, it would eliminate a competitive disadvantage.

The list goes on—problems without solutions, questions without answers. Fundamental changes are required to allow Canadian business to compete, most beyond the power of this provincial government. But one power you do have and one change which is required immediately is the power to collect the 8% provincial sales tax at the border. This action is required without delay. It is a competitive disadvantage we can no longer tolerate and survive even in the short term.

I do not expect the members of this committee will lose a moment's sleep tonight over the loss of 45 retail jobs at Stoney Creek Furniture. It will not happen tomorrow, and it will not happen next week. Unless the rules change, it will happen. We will not go bankrupt. We will simply close in Canada and we will open in the United States. And guess what? It is a great team. We will be very successful. The fact that I hope you will find particularly chilling is, we will be one of the last to go and thousands will have gone before us.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you very much for your presentation from a business person who is trying to survive these tough times. You mentioned that the prime cost would be the collection of the PST at the border, from your perspective. Recognizing that the government has to collect every dollar we spend, do you feel it would be a wise expenditure for the provincial government to establish an administration that is necessary to collect the PST at border points? Do you think that would be a wise expenditure on this government's part?

Mr Carruthers: I see no reason why the money should not be collected. The GST is being collected at the border. I see no reason why the federal government cannot act as an agent for the provincial government.

Mr B. Ward: But if they are not willing to co-operate with us, do you think that would be a wise expenditure for this government to undertake?

Mr Carruthers: Is the general public aware of this?

Mr B. Ward: I am not sure if they are or not. But another question is dealing with the taxes in America. We know why we are taxed the way we are, but why do we think the tax levels in America are the way they are?

Mr Carruthers: There are a variety of services we receive as Canadians, and my family lives here and would like to stay here. We enjoy this country. We enjoy the services that are offered. We know why the tax base is different in Canada.

Mr B. Ward: I am not talking about Canada. Why do you think it is the way it is in America?

Mr Carruthers: The cost of living has a lot to do with it. The tax structure is just totally different than in Canada. My driver makes $14.50. The driver for—

Mr B. Ward: That does not have anything to do with taxes.

Mr Carruthers: I am just answering the question, because it has to do with after-tax income. The driver for my competitor in Buffalo makes $8.50 and enjoys a fairly good standard of living, pays less personal income tax than my staff members do or I do as an individual.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, but why? Why are the taxes lower in America?

Mr Carruthers: I would assume that it is more efficient. We have three levels of government taxing us: death as business people. Our municipal taxes have gone from $98,000 to $216,000 in three years. Our business taxes are up.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, so you are suggesting that the taxes in America—I am trying to clarify—are lower simply because you feel their governments are more efficient, because of the service they provide or the way they operate as far as government entities is concerned.

Mr Carruthers: You are probably asking me a question that is a little bit out of my scope, and I have to be able to refer to this.

Mr B. Ward: Okay. So you are not sure then.

Mr Carruthers: No.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, good.

The Chair: I can give you one point. In the United States, especially in the southern United States, the average salary for a master's degree teacher is $14,000. The average salary for an Ontario teacher with a master's degree, 5 or 16 years of service, is $60,000.

Mr Kwinter: My wife is a schoolteacher. She makes more money than I do.

Mr Phillips: The big money is in the pension. The teachers have a pension second only to ours, in the world.

Mr Sutherland: I wanted to ask you a couple of questions, because some of the evidence you put forward is a different opinion than what we have heard. Before I do that, I want to compliment you first on your sincere dedication in terms of trying to make an operation go here and very innovative ways that you have been operating.

You said that American merchants are not better than Canadian merchants, yet we have heard there is evidence to suggest that people's perception is out there. We had a presentation earlier this morning that said that people are cross-border shopping to survive, and you certainly indicated your staff in terms of going over the border for basic commodities, food items, that type of thing, trying to stretch their dollar. But how do you explain furniture, electronics, VCRs, electronics, if people are going across the border to survive? How do you explain the big-ticket items like luxury items like VCRs and electronics? I mean, the argument that people are going across the border to survive and they are buying VCRs and electronics, it does not really wash with me.

Mr Carruthers: I do not think I was making the argument that people are going across the border to shop—

Mr Sutherland: No, someone else did and I was just wondering whether you separate the two, from going for food to going for the other items.

Mr Carruthers: No, I do not look at it and I have never had it explained to me by anybody I have met who shops across the border that he looks at it as survival. They look at it as stretching their dollar, more bang for the buck. In the case of durable goods, in the case of big-ticket items, it has not been all that well publicized that it is opening. But once it is and you see the big dollars that are involved, not that you are saving 50 cents on a dozen eggs—$10,000 dining room in my store can be purchased for $10,000 in Buffalo, and we are operating on exactly the same gross margin.

Mr Sutherland: Could you comment then on the marketing aspects, the merchandising aspects of Canadian retailers versus American?

Mr Carruthers: I would like to first put on my Stoney Creek hat and answer that from our perspective. Okay? We are good merchants. I made the point I did not want to sound arrogant, but sometimes we are.

The American retailers in our industry were up here in January at a conference—and I think this might put it in perspective for you—at the Bristol Place Hotel, by the airport here in Toronto. They had heard so much about our store they wanted to come out and see it. There was a blizzarding snowstorm. It took us two and a half hours to get to Stoney Creek to show them the store. I did a little head count. Those retailers who went through that blizzard to come and see Stoney Creek Furniture were responsible for over $2.5 billion retail in furniture. They wanted to come and see how we did things because they had heard so much about us.

It is very difficult for me to comment on other furniture retailers. There are some very good ones. I have been involved with other retail companies, survivors, profitable companies that do a heck of a job, very good merchants, and there are some out there that are borderline. It is like any other industry.

1710

Ms M. Ward: Are you simply retail? I had the impression at first that you were furniture makers also.

Mr Carruthers: No.

Ms M. Ward: I was thinking it is different than all the other presentations we have heard, because one of the things that really bothers me is, I cannot go to the store and buy a Canadian product very often. As a matter of fact, I am without a vacuum cleaner right now because I have not found a Canadian one. I thought you were—

Mr Carruthers: I used to be a furniture manufacturer, but I saw the writing on the wall and I got out.

Ms M. Ward: Okay. Anyway, I had that impression, but you have cleared it up now. Thanks.

I just wanted to ask you to expand on something you said. You were saying to us that we should show some leadership to the feds and to negotiate with the municipalities. Did you have any specific recommendations there?

Mr Carruthers: It stems back, I guess, to a comment the Chairman made to me before the meeting, that you are not getting a lot of co-operation at the federal level. I made the comment earlier, is the general public aware that we are trying to harmonize the taxes? But looking at the cost structures, in business, in trying to compete, I look at these reports that you have seen before and you know what taxes we pay. You know what our competitor is paying. The three levels of government have to work in co-operation if they want us to stay in business in Canada.

Ms M. Ward: So it is taxation you are speaking of mainly.

By the way, where does your furniture come from?

Mr Carruthers: Seventy per cent of it is from the United States.

Ms M. Ward: There have been several companies lost, have there not, in the last few years in the furniture manufacturing business?

Mr Carruthers: About 40% of the industry is gone.

Mr Phillips: You have sort of painted a doomsday scenario for us here, I think, as I listened to it. I have some sympathy with what you are saying. I think many think a lower Canadian dollar will be a panacea for our challenges, and get the interest rates down a little bit and it will all go away. I think we have got some long-term economic issues.

I am looking for short-term solutions, though, because things that you are talking about are very long-term and will take a long while to work their way through, if ever.

But your short-term solution is the collection of the provincial sales tax. In fairness to the federal government, I think what it might say when it is at the table is it is anxious to harmonize the two taxes. But I think the government does not want to do that.

Mr B. Ward: As a clarification, they have refused to collect that tax unless we harmonize.

Mr Phillips: No, I am just saying that they said, "Listen, can't we get together and collect provincial and the GST together?" and I think the government said: "No, we won't do that. We have no intention of doing that."

Mr B. Ward: But they can still collect at the border.

Mr Phillips: I am saying it is very difficult for this government to say, "In 98% of the cases, we don't want to be involved with you, but in the one case where it's in our interest, please harmonize." I have no brief with the federal government. I am just saying if they were sitting here, they would say to you people: "Wait a minute. In the 99 or 999 cases where we want to be more efficient and work with you to collect it together you say no, but in the one case you want, for other reasons, to harmonize it." I think you may have to make your minds up on that one. I am just saying that therefore you suffer because of squabbles between two levels of government.

Mr Hansen: Mr Chairman, may I interject something? In New Brunswick, where the government is willing to collect the GST together, still at the border it is not being collected.

The Chair: Saskatchewan.

Mr Hansen: Saskatchewan? So we just cannot take a look at Ontario and other provinces.

Mr Phillips: That is one recommendation, the provincial sales tax.

Mr Carruthers: That is a short-term solution.

Mr Phillips: The long-term ones are competitiveness and all those things that are going to be long-term, but how else can we help organizations like yours survive until the long-term one sorts itself out?

Mr Carruthers: I do not really have a suggestion for you. I do not think you want to artificially prop up merchants. The retail community has to be very liquid. It has to be able to move and shift with changing situations. As a general rule, Canadians are pretty good at that. I am taken aback a little bit by one of the comments I heard earlier, that somebody had sat in front of this committee and said, "Canadians aren't very good merchants." There are several examples of very good merchants here. The strong will survive in a free market system, but we need more of a level playing field. Those Canadian merchants who are good will survive and they will demonstrate to everybody that, given a level playing field, they will compete with the best.

Mr Phillips: But the short-term one is the provincial sales tax.

Mr Carruthers: In the short-term situation there is the provincial sales tax. And we have to stem the flow of people going down to the border on Sundays, so we have to have Sunday shopping as well.

Mr Phillips: How far Sunday shopping? I assume you are in Stoney Creek? That seems like a bizarre thing to

Mr Carruthers: Actually, I live in Thornhill; I am in Stoney Creek. During the week, and I mentioned to the Chairman before, it takes me an hour to drive to work. When we were open on Sundays, it took me an hour and three quarters, and that is strictly all the people leaving Ontario heading for Niagara Falls and Buffalo to go and spend money. You are not getting any revenue from those people because they are spending it in upstate New York.

Mr Hansen: Are you finding a problem with merchants or stores in New York state shipping furniture into Canada? Are the consumers bringing back the furniture themselves?

Mr Carruthers: Both.

Mr Hansen: So actually when it comes down to it, the firm that could be in New York state would be reduced by the 4%—I believe it is 4%—New York sales tax. They are rebating that, plus you are not paying the 8%, so you are talking about 12% savings by shopping in New York state.

Mr Carruthers: It is even more than that. We have shopped the stores in the Falls and Buffalo quite extensively. Basically what it is, and what we would call predatory pricing in Canada, is predatory pricing. They have shopped southern Ontario stores quite extensively as well. They know what our prices are, they know what our margins are, they know what our costs are with the material cost of the product because in a lot of cases it is exactly the same.

Mr Hansen: Is it the same product that is being chased over there, the same manufacturer?

Mr Carruthers: I think a lot of it is.

Mr Hansen: Because we have been told that a lot of products that are coming into the border towns are "scratch and dent" items also and lower quality.

Mr Carruthers: Those retailers who are doing that will find out very rapidly that Canadians will not accept that. Canadians want a better-quality product. That is a generalization which I try to stay away from, but I have been in both ball games and I can speak from experience. Some of the lower-end product that is produced in Mississippi, Louisiana just will not wash in Ontario; it is not what we are used to. Now what we have is a situation where the same product is on a retailer's floor in the Falls, US, and Stoney Creek Furniture. We try as much as we can to differentiate ourselves and eliminate that type of situation. I have shopped those stores. I have gone in. They do not know who I am. "What is the price on that sofa?" They give me the price. Then, upon being informed that I am Canadian, they go get the sales manager and they have to give me inside price for Canadians. It is found money to them; it is increased market share.

If you tried that at the manufacturing level, we could put a stop to it because it is called dumping. At the retail level there is no legislation—we have checked it out—it does not cover it.

Mr Hansen: This is what I am saying. On top of that they are saving the New York state sales tax, plus if it is being shipped in by that particular company they are saving 8% at the border, so you have got, say, another 12% to a top of that. That is where you have lost your competitive edge. This is what we are looking for, exactly all these things—that they are discounted because you are Canadian, and all these tax savings—so it winds up they will freeze you out sooner or later. This is what it looks like we are living here.

Mr Carruthers: If you take it one step further than that and you say that the person driving that truck, delivering that furniture out of upstate New York is making $8.50 an hour, I think we would all agree that you really could not enjoy a very good standard of living in Ontario at $8.50. That truck is also full of gas that was purchased at $1.20 a gallon. I have six trucks on the road today from Stoney Creek Furniture and they were all at 55 cents a litre. That opens every day of the week.

Mr Hansen: And the one problem is that the fellow driving the truck does not want to get sick and go in the hospital in New York state either.

Mr Carruthers: True.

Mr Sutherland: When you are talking about the retailing costs being a cheaper rate in Buffalo, have you gone further inland in the US to do any comparison there?

Mr Carruthers: Oh, sure.

Mr Sutherland: Is it equivalent or is it just selective, aggressive retailing and discounting at the border?

Mr Carruthers: I asked the merchandise manager for Sagan and Raymour. They have 26 stores in upstate New York. I met him in North Carolina last Sunday. He said: "Jim, we're exploiting a competitive advantage. That's all we're doing. It's business. It's not personal." Whether you go south, as a matter of fact, the cheaper the prices get down into the Carolinas.

Ms M. Ward: Is there still a duty on furniture? If so, what is it? Is it one of the ones that is reducing?

Mr Carruthers: It is 6% and it will be phased out over the next two years.

Ms M. Ward: What was it originally?

Mr Carruthers: It was 15%. Basically, what it meant to us as retailers three years ago was that we would not receive a price increase from American manufacturers for three years, assuming that their price increases would be around the 3% level, which has been fairly consistent, so that has been one of the reasons for the demise of the Canadian manufacturer. I do not think our inflation has been running at zero for the last five years.

Mr B. Ward: The manufacturing taxes too.

Mr Hansen: I have one other question. You were saying earlier that if the American dollar went down, that would hurt your business even more. But the other thing, looking at it, is that possibly a Canadian product could come back on the market produced here in Canada to compete with American furniture. Would you see that price-wise?

Mr Carruthers: No. As a Canadian I would like to see that, but my experience is that that would not happen. The margins that are available in manufacturing and the manufacturing industry do not justify going back into the business, spending all of that money, all that high technology that is available. It would be very expensive.

Mr Hansen: That 40% of the Canadian market, I do not know what is covering all furniture lines. If the Canadian dollar did drop, there is a possibility you could get an increase in Canadian sales. People would not be shopping across the border as much because of the lower Canadian dollar. The other thing is that they would be more likely to purchase a Canadian product because it would be a lower price than the competitive American product coming into your store.

Mr Carruthers: I doubt that. Again, I would like to see that but I would doubt it because the capacity would not be there in the Canadian industry to meet the demand. And once again, the economies of scale at the manufacturing level are quite different from those at the retail level, where you have open-shop states and a fabric cutter is making $6.75 to $7 an hour versus an upholsterer in Concord, Ontario, who is trying to hire at $23 and he cannot get anybody.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

Mr Carruthers: I promised the fellows back at the store I would bring one other thing to your attention, and I hope you will take the message back with you with the sincerity in which it is delivered. I walked in this morning and looked in my mailbox. Before the drivers and helpers had gone out on the road this morning they had left a little petition. I am sorry I left it back in my office. It is signed by everyone and it says: "Jim, do your best. We'd like to stay in Canada." Thank you very much.

Mr Phillips: Well done.

The Chair: Okay. Should we ask the Treasurer to come in and do a post-budget presentation next Thursday?

Mr Phillips: Agreed.

The Chair: It is a normal activity for this committee to ask the Treasurer to come in, since we did the pre-budget consultations.

Clerk of the Committee: We have no more witnesses scheduled on this.

The Chair: We actually have no more witnesses scheduled, so we can have the Treasurer come in next week to discuss the budget. It can be either in the morning or in the afternoon. In the other time slot we should discuss some of the recommendations and perhaps give direction to research and have those drawn up for us.

This committee is adjourned till next Thursday, 10 o'clock.

The committee adjourned at 1725.
